The house met at four o'clock. A number of petitions, on various subjects, were presented.—Lord JOHN RUSSELL, in answer to a question from Mr. Smith O'Brien with regard to the vote of thanks to the Governor-General of India, Sir R. PEEL said he held the papers to which the hon gentleman referred in his hand, and meant to lay a few minutes' statement before the house. From the r length, and the probability that the debate on the motion of which the noble lord the member for Sunderland had given notice would occupy some time, he asked the hon. gentleman if he could not postpone the vote of thanks, and he now intended to anticipate such a request by naming Monday instead of Friday for his motion. The right hon. baronet then brought the papers and documents to the table, and laid them upon the table.—Mr. E. GOLDSMID said he wished to ask a question of the right honourable baronet, of which he gave notice on Friday last. The hon. gentleman said that a treaty was entered into with the Ameers of Scinde, in 1838, by the Indian Government; and what he wished to know was, whether that treaty was still in force? He then enumerated some of the stipulations of the treaty, and asked whether any act of hostility had been committed by the Ameers of Scinde which could call for the interference of the Indian Government?—Sir R. PEEL said the relations of this country with the Ameers of Scinde had been disturbed. The Ameers of Scinde had been charged with infraction of the treaty entered into by Lord Auckland in 1839, by levying troops, and by other acts. In consequence of this infraction communications had been made to them with a view to a settlement. Sufficient time had not yet elapsed to enable the Government to receive any official account of the result of those communications; but they had by the last mail received accounts which led them to think that the Ameers of Scinde had expressed their willingness to accept the terms which had been submitted to them, as the basis of a future treaty.—In answer to a question from Mr. G. Wood, on the subject of banking, Sir R. PEEL said he believed that the present state of the law with respect to banking, so far at least as the Bank of England was concerned, was, that the charter of the Bank of England would not expire till the 1st of August, 1844; or rather, that it would then be competent for the Government to give notice of an intention to introduce a change in the charter of the Bank; of course, therefore, it would be impossible to touch the question of the renewal of the charter, but it was his intention that the Government might now give notice of an intention to effect an alteration in the law relating to private banks and joint-stock banks; but, upon consideration, her Majesty's Government did not think it advisable to call the attention of the Legislature to the subject during the present session of Parliament.—In reply to a complaint made by Mr. Hertal concerning the imperfect transmission of letters from the West Indies, Mr. S. HERBERT said he was quite ready to admit that there had been great irregularity in the transmission of the mails through the West India packets. That was now prevented.—The agreement in the system after the expiration of that which now prevailed.—The Admiralty would, in the meantime, take every means of effecting an improvement in the system after the expiration of that which now prevailed.—The house then went into committee on the subject of the forged Exchequer bills, and the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER rose to announce the views of Government respecting them. It was the wish of those who had been originally entertained a claim compensation had been materially diminished by the report of the commissioners appointed last year to investigate the case. They had divi'ed the sum-holders into three classes: of the first class the bands of Morgan, and a much more in the hands of Marmer. The amount was in itself a circumstance of suspicion: still more suspicious was it that they would not permit it to be made out of those mills. The general result would be, that of the £277,000 found in circulation, the public might properly be called on to make good an amount of £262,000. He had, of course, been unwilling to throw such a burden on the country; but he did not think that was not a case where any strict legal right existed, that it was one in which the circumstances were peculiar the person who committed the forgery having been high in a Government office, and intrusted by Government itself with the paper, the seal, and all the other materials and facilities which had enabled him to effect the deception.—Mr. WILLIAMS complained that the commissioners had taken the evidence in an imperfect and unsatisfactory way; and he thought that want of due caution was imputable to more of the parties than the one class whom the Government now proposed to exclude from the compensation.—Colonel SIBTHORP thought the loss ought to fall upon Lord Monteagle, and recommended an address to the crown for removing him from his situation.—Mr. HUME wished to know whether Government had not obtained some information from Rapallo which would not been communicated, but which pointed at other parties as having shared with Beaumont Smith, or contributed to the loss by their connivance or negligence?—Mr. ROBINUK required whether great part of the loss had not been incurred during a six months' absence of the Controller; and referred to the words of the Act of Parliament regulating his duties, which authorises only such absence as is occasional and temporary.—Mr. HUME desired to know if precautions had been taken to prevent future losses?—Mr. GOULBURN did not know at what points of time the losses had taken place, nor what had been the practice of the Comptroller's department. An Act of Parliament had passed to guard against such losses in future. Sir J. DUKE suggested that official persons, like Beaumont Smith, ought not to be permitted by Government to transact business with other persons than at their offices.—Mr. FERRAND and Lord Montreagle from the imputation of negligent absence. He approved the principle on which Mr. Goulburn had acted, and the line he had drawn between those who were and those who were not to receive compensation.—After a few words from Mr. Turner and Mr. Escott, Sir T. WILDE argued, that there was no one particular period to which the mischief was referable; the forgeries had taken place at all time in the course the exposures of the conspirators required a supply. He approved the compensation; the public could not have protected themselves by any vigilance. The true test was to treat the bills as if they had been stolen, in which case a holder would only have had to show his own title a fair one. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had drawn the proper line; but even the fourth class, who were now excluded, ought to have an opportunity afforded to them of proving their bona fides, if it were capable of proof.—A vote was then taken of Exchequer bills to the amount of £262,000, and the house resumed.—The Medical Charities Bill was read a second time.—Lord HOWICK then moved the following resolution:—"That this house do resolve itself into a committee of the whole house, to consider so much of her Majesty's speech as refers to that depression of the manufacturing industry of the country which has so long prevailed, and which her Majesty has so deeply lamented." He disclaimed any hostility to the Government in bringing forward this motion, but said that when he found no remedial measures were about to be proposed by the Government for the present most serious condition of the country, he felt it to be his duty, in concurrence with those friends who usually co-operated with him, to submit the present motion to the house. Unfortunately this duration of the distress of the people was not to be computed by months, but by years. The agricultural, manufacturing, mining, and shipping interests were all suffering under a most severe depression, and this depression extended itself from them to all other classes of the community. It was widely extended, and he feared there was no prospect of permanent improvement without the interference of the legislature; it clearly did not appear from the relation of things, on looking round us, that the condition of mankind should be one of permanent evil. Such could never have been the design of the Creator, but if the measures were adopted to be suggested that the conclusion was unavoidable that something was wrong in our social arrangements; for, with all the elements of prosperity about us, how came it that all classes were suffering? The noble lord then canvassed the various causes to which the distress had been attributed—the currency, over speculation, the Poor-law, &c., and contended that the real cause of the distress was a low rate of profit and a low rate of wages produced by immense competition, which competition was produced by the want of an adequate field for the employment of capital and labour. To remedy the evil, it was necessary to throw open additional fields for the industry of the country which was now confined by barriers and restrictions which should be done away with or ameliorated, by which means they would at once extend the demand for labour. Amongst the chief of these barriers he ranked the Corn-law, and argued at great length in support of the benefit which would accrue from the repeal of that and other restrictive duties. He would not enter into the discussion of any details, for the proper time for considering the details would be hereafter; his object at that moment being to come to a resolution that they would investigate the operation of these restrictions, in order to ascertain if their removal would not lead to an increased demand for the employment of the people.—Mr. GLADSTONE said he had little objection to the correctness of the picture of the distress drawn by the noble lord, though in some particulars it might have been a little overcharged without any offence to truth. He was most decidedly opposed to the motion of the noble lord, for he thought it would be most inconvenient to embark upon such an inquiry without a previous notice in order to consider by. No good could come from agreeing to such a resolution. It would excite alarm and mischief throughout the country, by unsettling everything, and it was aggravate the distress which he was so anxious to remedy. The practical mode of proceeding on the part of the noble lord would have been to have proposed a remedy himself to the house. The fact was, that the real offender amongst the restrictions complained of was the sliding-scale in the Corn-law; and why not bring forward a motion upon that subject, instead of leaving the house discussing a motion which it was impossible to understand? Indeed the motion did serve one purpose, which scarcely any motion could serve, that of uniting honourable gentlemen on the Opposition side so far as that on a division they might present to the country a decent appearance of unanimity and harmony amongst their own ranks. They were all agreed in the principles of relaxing restrictions as far as possible, but the whole question was as to the extent to which the country could bear the application of the principle. This was the course pursued by his right hon. friend (Mr. R. Peel), but he resolved to carry out the principle so gradually as not to give any violent shock to any particular interest; and in saying this he must also say that he did not think that the experience of last year could be received as any material effect in the depression of agricultural produce. The whole question of these restrictions was one of time and degree, and had been so considered by every Government for the last twenty-five years. No commercial law could be permanent; but that of protection to home agriculture was so, and he was not prepared to abandon it so long as protection was given to any other interest. He did not believe that iomic depression the tariffs could ultimately injure the trade and commerce of this country, but their immediate effect was detrimental; and he would ask if they were to go on without reference to the proceedings of other countries, in the course that we might teach them, when, instead of following our example, they were taking a course precisely the reverse? The right hon. gentleman concluded by resisting the motion in a speech full of disaster to every interest in the country.—Mr. LABOUCHERE said that the admissions made by the right hon. gentleman had very considerably narrowed the question. It was said by Sir R. Peel that the tariff was to compensate for the income-tax; and yet the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) asserted that he did not believe the tariff had produced any material effect upon the prices of agricultural produce. The right hon. gentleman then adverted to the article of sugar, the increased consumption of which was calculated to prove the decrease of the prevailing distress, and repeated some of his arguments of last session in favour of the reduction of the duties on foreign sugars. What it was as of by the right hon. gentleman that the principles he had down were a question of time, and that they could only be carried out as the country could bear their application, he left to the house, with a slight observation, that the true remedy was, that they could only be carried out by the present Government as the country gentlemen could bear their application. Mr. FERRAND said he knew no party out in country, and no interest in the general weal; and, therefore, heartily condemned both the late Government and the present Government for destroying the interests of the working-classes, by their adherence to the doctrine of free trade. He considered the passage occurring as an amendment the following addition to the motion of Viscount Howick:—"And also to inquire into the effects of machinery upon the moral and physical condition of the manufacturing classes: And also to inquire into the origin of the late outbreaks, which are thus alluded to in her Majesty's speech:—'Her Majesty regrets that, in the course of last year, the public peace in some of the manufacturing districts was disturbed, and the lives and property of her Majesty's subjects were endangered by tumultuous assemblages and acts of open violence.'"—Mr. EWART moved the adjournment of the debate, which was immediately agreed to.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

The Duke of WELLINGTON moved a vote of thanks to the officers and army engaged in the recent war in China, and in so doing gave a sketch of the military operations in that country, which he thought were marked by the greatest skill, energy, and bravery, and entitled those engaged in it to the gratitude of their countrymen, as well for the extraordinary efforts they had made, as for the success which attended their resolution and perseverance. The brilliant success it would have been impossible to achieve had it not been for the mutual co-operation of the two services, the naval and military, in support of each other's operations. The noble duke concluded by moving the following resolution:—"That the thanks of this house be given to Lieutenant General Sir Hugh Gough, G.C.B.; Vice-Admiral Sir W. Parker, G.C.B.; and Commodore Sir Gordon Bremer, K.C.B., for the able, judicious, and gallant manner in which they severally and jointly conducted the combined operations of her Majesty's naval and military forces on the coasts and on the inland waters of China, whereby a series of brilliant and successful enterprises were conducted by an honorable peace on the terms proposed by her Majesty. That the thanks of this house be given to Major-General George Burbett, Major-General Sir Saumarez Lambert, Major-General Sir James Holmes Shoedde, K.C.B., and the other officers of the navy, army, and royal marines, including those in the service of the East India Company, both European and native, for the energy, bravery, and gallantry with which they have executed the various services which they have been called upon to perform. That this house doth acknowledge and highly approve the gallantry, discipline, and unwearied exertions displayed by the petty officers, non-commissioned officers, and men of the navy, army, and royal marines, including the troops in the service of the East India Company, both European and native, the cordial good feeling which has subsisted between all the branches of the united services, and the honourable emulation exhibited by all in the discharge of the various duties required by the nature of the operations to be performed, and that the same be communicated to them by the commanders of the several ships and corps, who are desired to thank them for their gallant behaviour." And that the Lord Chancellor do communicate the said resolutions to the naval and military officers named therein.—Lord AUCKLAND concurred in every word that had fallen from the noble duke, and thought that no men were possessed of greater skill, intrepidity, and determination than the leaders of the late expedition against China. The noble lord passed a high eulogium on the conduct of the native troops also, who had served with the greatest cheerfulness and bravery.—The Marquis of LANSDOWNE supported the motion, and only regretted that, owing to technical considerations, the name of Sir Henry Pottinger was not included in the vote they were about to pass, although his conduct was above all praise throughout the whole of those brilliant operations.—The Duke of WELLINGTON said he concurred in everything that had been said respecting Sir Henry Pottinger; but, upon the general principle, the name of the gallant officer could not be included in the vote.—Lord BROUGHAM said that this vote of thanks must be infinitely enhanced by being proposed by the noble duke, to whose opening the agreeable duty of their lordships was little more than mere form; for his approbation must be more gratifying to the army in China than the thanks of either or of both houses of Parliament.—The Earl of Haddington and Earl Minto severally addressed the house, in eulogy of the services of the naval forces in China.—After a few observations from the Earl of Aberdeen, eulogising the conduct of Sir Henry Pottinger, the vote was agreed to and the house adjourned until Thursday.

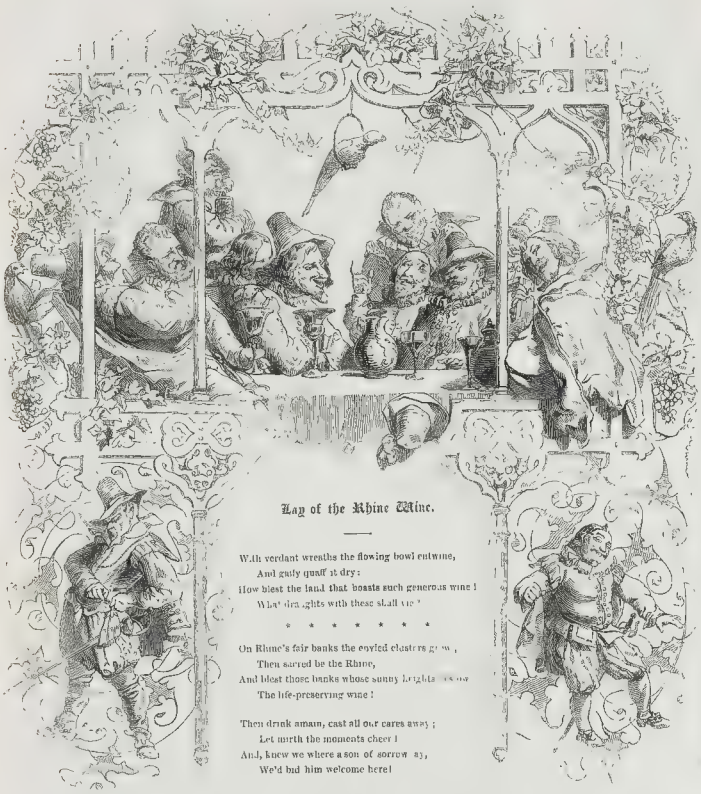
HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

Mr. Hamilton, the newly-elected representative of the University of Dublin, was introduced, and took the oaths and his seat. The SPEAKER informed the house that the clerk of recognisances had reported to him that the sureties for prosecuting the petition against the return of Mr. Walter for Nottingham were unobjectionable. Petitions against the union of the sees of St. Asaph and Bangor were presented by Mr. Estcourt, Sir J. Glynne, and Sir R. Inglis.—A question from Mr. Hardy led to an explanation from Lord Palmerston of the origin of our treaties with France, with a view to the establishment of the right of search for the suppression of the slave trade, and of the cause of the complaints of the French relative thereto.—Lord STANLEY moved a vote of thanks to the officers and men engaged in the military and naval operations against China, similar to that proposed by the Duke of Wellington in the House of Lords. The noble lord gave a narrative of these operations, which, from the nature of the difficulties to be encountered, required the greatest skill, energy, and perseverance on the part of the officers and men; qualities which they so fully evinced, that the most brilliant triumphs and ultimate peace followed their exertions.—Lord JOHN RUSSELL seconded the motion, and observed that the conduct of our troops was so conspicuous that the Chinese expressed their surprise that the English should take so much pains to reward their enemies, and that they took so much money in order to cut off their heads.—Sir R. PEEL was of opinion that the officers and men engaged in those operations were entitled to the thanks of the country. Sir H. STAUNTON could not [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

FINE ARTS.



Lay of the Rhine Wine.

With verdant wreaths the flowing bowl entwine,
And gaily quaff it dry:
How blest the land that boasts such generous wine!
What' dra ghts with these shall vie?

* * * * * * *

On Rhine's fair banks the envied clusters grow,
Then sacred be the Rhine,
And blest those banks whose sunny brights glow
The life-preserving wine!

Then drink amain, cast all our cares away;
Let mirth the moments cheer!
And, knew we where a son of sorrow ay,
We'd bid him welcome here!

The Lieder und Bilder has long been celebrated in Germany as a volume of national gems of song nationally illustrated. A companion work is now issuing from the press, under the title of "The Book of German Ballads," and the first part, now lying before us, tempted the extract, or rather the copying upon wood, of one of its etchings. No sooner thought than done, and the reader has before him a facsimile of the most characteristic of the illustrations of this German volume. In thus transferring to our columns another work of foreign art we pay no undeserved compliment to our brother illustrators of the Continent, whilst we afford all lovers of the fine arts an opportunity of contrasting the style of our native artists with that of other schools. The plate we have selected is by Schroedler, whom the Fatherland claims and prizes as a Cruikshank. He here illustrates a Wein-lied, and we have the poet of the party singing the song most melodious to German ear, "The Rhein-weilied"—the Lay of the Rhine Wine. And a right jovial set is gathered about him, with not one face in the party into which the artist has not quaintly though truly wrought a verification of the old saying, in vinô veritas. Each toper now speaks faithfully his feelings in his face as it shines through the arabesque framework, all clustered round about by the vine. And thick bunches hang rich and heavily here and there amid the leaves garlanding the Rhine wine-bibbers, as though Anacreon himself had searched them out the spot. The upper group tells of wine and song and argument—of quip and crank and merric jest—while the side supporters of the main picture are as perfect as though painted by Teniers himself; the one all life and merriment; the other, heavy, solemn, dull, and somewhat valiant withal, albeit unable to achieve the buckling of his sword-belt.

In place of the old untranslateable German which we found between these figures, we give three verses—the three best we think—from the Rhein-wein Lied, the only song which deserve, the illustration; and, not doubting but Mr. Hering will have reason for rejoicing that he introduced this work of art to the English public, we leave for the present "The Book of German Ballads," with its "Song of war to soothe the knight,

Lay of love for ladye bright;
Fairy song to soothe the heer,
Goblin grim the maids to scare."

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

DALE ABBEY, DERBYSHIRE.

Not an old ruin in all England but has its legend, and the one we sketch has of course a story, of which, as befits a monastic relic, visions, miracles, and pious devotedness, are the main ingredients. Seven miles from Derby still stand some remnants of the Abbey of Dale, or rather of its once magnificent church; the chief object being the arch of the east window, all mantled with ivy as a crumbling oriel should be.

Whole ages have fled and their works decayed,
And nations have scatter'd been;
But the stout old ivy shall never fade
From its hale and hearty green

The brave old plant in its lonely days
Shall fatten upon the past;
For the stateliest building man can raise
Is the ivy's food at last.
Creeping on where Time has been,
A rare old plant is the ivy green.

A small chapel also still defies the wrath of time; and beyond, upon a pleasant, woody knoll, is a hermitage or cave, to which is attached the story of the first holy tenant of the Dale, whose virtues and piety led to the foundation of the abbey. Overhung with trees, it is just the spot in which imagination would place an anchorite; and, as a monk of the order—the Premonstratensian,—who inhabited the building now in ruins, has left the history of the tenant of the hermitage, the visitor to Dale Abbey will do well to turn to Pilkington's "View of Derbyshire" for the legend, which is too long for extract here. He will there learn how a pious man of St. Mary's in Derby, called Baker from the calling he pursued, after displaying no ordinary amount of charity and devotion, had a dream, in which he was bidden to give up all worldly gear, to go to Depe-Dale, and lead a solitary life; of his starting, not knowing where the spot lay—how strangely, as though by chance, he was guided to the place—where he scooped from the rock on the hill side, far from human habitation, the cell, which bids fair to outlive the more splendid dwellings of which this humble one was the precursor—how the fool fiend tempted him, and of the struggles against the Evil One, which finally succeeded—of a baron who came hunting to the spot, and all angered at the intrusion upon his broad domain, approached the eremite's dwelling to scoff, and yet remained to pray. All these things does the old monkish legend tell, and many more of the varying fortunes of the first holy tenants of the spot thus selected; and when the story has been scanned, the ruin is at once invested with the associations which belong to it, and the visitor feels that the labour has not all been lost which brought him to the old ruin of DEPE DALE.

POPULAR PORTRAITS.—No. XXXI.

JOSEPH HUME, ESQ., M.P.

On any night when the House of Commons is in a committee of supply, and the army or navy estimates, or any other of the many estimates so complete in their totals, and so complex in the items by which those totals are arrived at, are under consideration, the visitor may see a rather stout and thick-set elderly gentleman, with a broad countenance and massive head, sitting about midway down the house, on the second Opposition bench from the floor, with a well-used copy of the said estimates in his hand, deeply and earnestly engaged in a task which, by common consent, seems conceded to him almost exclusively. We need scarcely say that the task is the narrow examination of the nature and amount of every vote, and that the man who performs it with such energy and goodwill is Mr. Joseph Hume, the member for Montrose. There he is, oftener on his legs than in his seat, badgering the Minister to the very verge of official endurance and parliamentary courtesy, not to be silenced by smooth or vague generalities, and with more inquisitiveness than an Income-tax commissioner. His name is one of the few that stand out before the public as known and familiar as a "household word," and associated throughout the empire with the principle of state economy. His reputation has been gained by the thorough-going manner with which he has applied himself to that branch of public business for which, from his peculiar qualities, he is best adapted. He has an intimate knowledge of business and accounts, and great dexterity in applying that knowledge to the affairs before him; while he possesses, also, three great requisites for any man who undertakes an almost individual opposition to the Government, prompted by the not very gracious motives of suspicion and distrust,—stout nerves, good common sense, and a strong constitution. Nothing can deter him, nothing tire him out, nothing can put him down; once resolved, he is the most immoveable of men who ever took a seat in the house or a stand on a principle. Abuse, even if the forms of Parliament tolerated it, would be of no avail; cajolery with him is not to be thought of; and to sarcasm or satire he is perfectly insensible; to the glittering shafts of wit his nature is as impervious as the hide of a rhinoceros is to the light dart of the African hunter. He can be met by nothing less than a thorough explanation, or a majority. As an orator he cannot rank high; for, though practice has made him a fluent speaker, his language is involved, and his sentences almost always incomplete. Though few men speak more frequently or at greater length, he can better manage the figures of arithmetic than figures of speech; and we should think him more likely to vote for an addition to the secret-service money than to give utterance to a metaphor. Of imagination he has not a spark, and as to poetry, anything resembling it is not in him. Should he ever quote it, it will probably be the "Thrift, thrift, Horatio," of Shakspere, who, by the way, has described a kindred spirit in the honest steward of the prodigal Timon of Athens, who says of himself—

"When chambers reeled
With drunken spirth of wine, when every room
Has blazed with light and brayed with minstrelsy,
I have retired me to a wasteful cock,
And set mine eyes at flow."

Our steward, however, is made of rather sterner stuff, and his more practical bent of mind would have led him, in the above situation, not to have wept, but simply to have turned the cock and stopped the extravagant effusion in the most unsympathising manner possible.

PORTRAIT OF MR. HUME.

Mr. Hume must be now verging to sixty years of age, but he is still hale and hardy; time can scarcely alter his ingrained complexion; even his hair is as thick and bushy as that on heads that might belong to his sons, though its hue is a decided grizzle. He seems to have been in Parliament half a life-time; he is a legislative evergreen; he was in the house when many of its present members were in their cradles, and yet when looking at him he does not impress you with any idea of age. He has never held office himself, but he has politically outlived,—we should be afraid to say how many administrations. And, to do Joseph justice, he has been very impartial in denouncing the financial doings of all of them. He has made no distinction between Tyrian and Trojan; they were ministers, and therefore to be watched; they spent money, and therefore were to be called to account for the same whenever they

Attempted to dispense with Cockers' rigours,
And grew quite figurative with their figures.

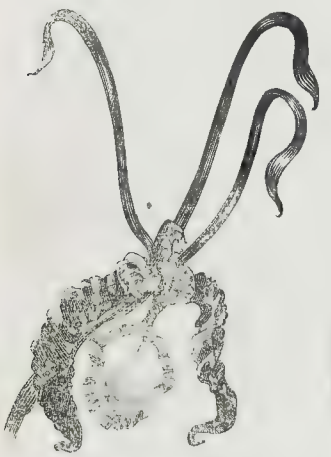
Unless the present ministry proves very long-lived indeed, he bids fair to do the same for several Governments to come, and he has bothered so many different Chancellors of the Exchequer, that we can see no reason why he should not continue to do so. Braham has just taken a new lease of his voice after more than half a century's use of it; Joseph's is not so sweet certainly, but it is rather an additional chance for its durability. As he has sat in many Parliaments, so he has represented many places. He was long fixed in Middlesex, but since he lost his seat for that metropolitan county he has been rather unsettled, wandering from Ireland to England and to Scotland, where he is at present returned for Montrose. During his absence from the house for a part of last session his place and duties were attempted to be filled by Mr. Williams, of Coventry; but he was immediately sent to the place he sits for; he had not Joseph's calibre; and the house, though tolerant to power and originality of any kind, could not permit what was felt to be a decided imitation.

NEW TRANSATLANTIC STEAMER.—The splendid new steam-ship Hibernia, intended to run in conjunction with the Columbia, Acadia, Britannia, and Caledonia, between Liverpool and Halifax and Boston, arrived in Liverpool on Thursday week from Glasgow, having made her passage from Greenock in little more than sixteen hours.

FLORICULTURE.

THE BUTTERFLY ORCHIS.
(Oncidium Papilio.)

This singular and, comparatively speaking, newly-discovered (at least to any extent) family of plants, the Orchideæ, of which we have given several of the varieties, is remarkable for the curious forms of its inflorescence, and the exquisite fragrance of many of its species. The flowers are not the only curiosities; the plants themselves present conformations unlike any other tribe of vegetables: some of the stems are attenuated, almost as fine as many grasses, while others present to the eye gouty and club like pseudo bulbs. Many of the flowers have been likened to the heads of birds and insects. The most remarkable amongst these curious interesting plants is the Oncidium Papilio, a native of Trinidad, the sepals of which are elongated so as to look like the antennæ of a large butterfly, while the two petals are spread out right and left like its wings; the labellum or lip and column form its body, and two processes on the top of the column look exactly like eyes, the whole being placed upon the top of a very slender stem two or three feet high away from the plant, looking like the showy insect after which it is named the butterfly of the Papilio genus, just alighted upon the tall stem of the plant. Another species—the Peristeria elata, or dove plant—has been compared to a white dove with spotted wings. The Brunthus grandiflorus is like an overgrown spider with long feelers. The genus Maxillaria takes its name from the likeness of its column to the maxillæ of some insects. The genus Cycnoches takes its name also from the column having the appearance of the head and neck of the graceful swan. Cypripedium is named from its flowers forming a fancied resemblance to a lady's slipper. Ophrys Apifera, a species found in the chalky pasture, is so like a bee that it would alarm a nervous lady from gathering its curious flowers lest she should be stung. These instances may suffice to point out these interesting and novel plants as well worthy the study of the lover of nature. Orchideæ are placed by Linnæus in his twentieth class, Gynandria; order, Monandria. Their place in the Jussieuian or Natural system is in Vasculares. Orchideous plants are found in all the four quarters of the globe, but the most beautiful are in the Asiatic islands and continent lying under or near to the tropics. Many fine species are from central America and the Brazils. The whole number of described species amounts to nearly two thousand, and are distributed as follows:—Europe, rather more than 100 species; America, North and South, about 650; Asia, including New Holland, about 1000; and Africa, including the islands of Madagascar, the Mauritius, &c., the remainder. The generic characters of Oncidium Papilio are: sepals and petals spreading, generally six, sometimes only four; column winged; labellum expanded, tubercled at the base, lobed; pollen masses two, lobed behind, fixed by the middle to the two processes of the stigma. Specific character: an epiphytal plant with solitary leaves, oval shaped, of a dark green colour with numerous irregular brown spots; scape articulated, two edged, few-flowered; upper petals longest, linear; lower ones distinct, ovate-lanceolate, wavy at the margins; column two-horned. This species is best grown in a pot, not too large, in turfy peat and chopped sphagnum well drained, that is to say, the pot ought to be half filled with large stones. As it is always growing, and flowers through the year, it requires constant watering, but in very moderate quantities. It will live in a low temperature, but will thrive and flower best in a heat of from 65 to 70 deg. Fahrenheit. It is a very fine species, and may be had at the nurseries for a moderate price.



FOX-HUNTING.

Tally ho! Tally ho! all unconsciously shouts the reader as he glances at our sketch of the thoroughly English sport of fox-hunting. Tally ho! echo we; and the cheerful sound wakes a feeling, strong, fresh, and invigorating, in the hearts of all true lovers of the chase.

See how he steals along! Now, if he lasts forty-five minutes, with huntsman and hounds at him upon such good terms at starting, and then a check should come, the odds are in favour of pug. Note the pace of the fox! It is extraordinary—he does not seem to go fast, or to be alarmed, or in a hurry; for the first field or so you fancy that the leading hounds would pick him up, but the nearest hedge-row settles that point; you lose sight of him there and the chances are that you do not see him again that day, if you have anything less than a first-rate horse. With a good scent for the first half-hour you have little to think of but to keep as near as you can to your hounds, without distressing your horse, for at this season especially foxes travel a long way from home, they do not ring about or wait, and if baffled at one point quickly make for another. The first thirty minutes weed off the majority of a large field, and then begin the joys of the chase; pace is settled down to a steady rate when horse and hound can live together, and the fury of the onset has ceased.

But who shall tell of fox-hunting or Melton, while Nimrod himself is in the field? Hark to him:—

"The pencil of a painter is now wanting; and unless the painter should be a sportsman, even his pencil would be worth little. What a country is before him! what a panorama does it present! Not a field of less than forty—some a hundred acres—and no more signs of the plough than in the wilds of Siberia. See the hounds in a body that might be covered by a damask tablecloth—every stern down, and every head up, for there is no need of stooping, the scent lying breast-high. But the crash! the music! how to describe these? Reader, there is no crash now, and not much music. It is the tinker that makes great noise over a little work; but at the pace these hounds are going there is no time for babbling. Perchance one hound in five may throw his tongue as he goes to inform his comrades, as it were, that the villain is on before them, and most musically do the light notes of Vocal and Venus fall on the ear of those who may be within reach to catch them. But who is so fortunate in this second burst, nearly as terrible as the first? Our fancy supplies us again, and we think we could name them all. If we look to the left, nearly abreast of the pack, we see six men going gallantly, and quite as straight as the hounds themselves are going; and on the right are four more, riding equally well, though the former have rather the best of it, owing to having had the inside of the hounds at the last two turns, which must be placed to the chapter of accidents. A short way in the rear, by no means too much so to enjoy this brilliant run, are the rest of the élite of the field, who had come up at the first check; and a few who, thanks to the goodness of their steeds, and their determination to be with the hounds, appear as if dropped from the clouds. Some, however, begin to show symptoms of distress. Two horses are seen loose in the distance—a report is flying about that one of the field is badly hurt, and something is heard of a collar-bone being broken, others say it is a leg; but the pace is too good to inquire. A cracking of rails is now heard, and one gentleman's horse is to be seen resting, nearly balanced, across one of them, his rider being on his back in the ditch, which is on the landing side. 'Who is he?' says Lord Brudenel to Jack Stevens. 'Can't tell, my lord; but I thought it was a queerish place when I came o'er it before him.'"

And so the pace goes on, the field growing thinner and thinner; but place for words of wisdom, worth their weight in gold to the "Snob" who first seeks the flavour of Melton. Nimrod again:—

"'I think, Sir, you are a stranger in this part of the world.' 'Certainly,' replied Snob, 'it is my first appearance in Leicestershire.' 'I observed you in the run,' continued the wounded sportsman; 'and very well you went up to the time I fell, but particularly so to the first check. You then rode to a leader, and made an excellent choice, but after that period, I saw you not only attempting a line of your own, but taking liberties with your horse, and anticipated the fate you have met with. If you remain with us long, you will be sure to find out that riding to hounds in Leicestershire is different from what it is in most other countries in England, and requires a little apprenticeship. There is much choice of ground; and if this choice be not judiciously made, and coupled with a cautious observance of pace, a horse is beaten in a very short time. If you doubt my creed, look to the events of this memorable day.' Snob thanks him for his hints, and notes them in his book of memory."

Have we led your imagination, good reader, into the sport? If so, we can but wish you a good place in the fray, and the ability to keep it

VIEW OF PORT NATAL.

PORT NATAL AND THE REBEL BOERS.

The intelligence recently received from the Cape of Good Hope, narrating the rebellious movements of 600 armed Boers in declaring the territory from Allman's Drift, on the east bank of the Orange River, to Port Natal, the property of the Volksraad and the emigrant Boers (as noticed in our paper of the 28th ult.), renders a few descriptive details of these people and the coast they inhabit of peculiar interest. It is true that these disturbances have been suppressed by the vigilance of the authorities in the colony, and additional troops are forthwith to proceed thither to strengthen the British force; but the disposition of the native chiefs to join the refractory Boers, and the tempting prospects held out to emigrants of all classes, may render our pacific retention of the country an uncertain matter. The tract is certainly an important one; and Mr. Isaacs, in his "Travels," published in 1836, predicted that the south-eastern coast of Africa, and the bay of Natal in particular, would hereafter occupy some share of the consideration of mercantile men; and that the time was not far distant when the Government of Great Britain might view the advantages which the Port of Natal offered for commercial enterprise; and that she might, on adverting to her Indian possessions, perceive how valuable an acquisition to her colonial dependencies such a position must be, from its being within the general course of her vessels bound to the eastern portion of her empire. The correctness of these views appears to be in some measure corroborated by the recent news, which seems to point to Port Natal as a most desirable locality for aiding the maintenance of British authority throughout the colony.

The coast of Natal extends along the eastern side of Africa, from the boundary line of the Cape colony, which, since the last war with the Amatrosas, has been formed by the Kei river (32 deg. 30 min. S. lat.), to Dalagoa Bay (26 deg. S. lat.), and constitutes the shores of Kaffirland. Along the sea it is low, but the country inland rises rather rapidly, averaging 300 or 1000 feet above the sea-level, presenting a hilly plain with occasional swamps, but mostly intersected by narrow deep valleys, through which the rivers run to the sea; but they abound with cataracts and sand-banks, so as to render them useless as harbours. The declivities are partly covered with forests and bushes, and partly bare and red with iron ore; the elevated country mostly serves as pasture-ground, and is always covered with grass. Here is generally a cool and refreshing breeze; but in the villages, which are built in the deep valleys, the heat is oppressive. The soil is rich, especially on the river-flats and along the hill sides, where pumpkins, melons, millet, maize, sweet potatoes, and tobacco are cultivated by the natives. The missionaries have introduced grapes, figs, oranges, lemons, apricots, peaches, nectarines, and some other fruits, as well as several vegetables, which, in many places, grow luxuriantly. The domestic animals are horned cattle, goats, sheep, and a few horses. Elephants are occasionally found in the large forests near the port.

Of the Caffre natives, the tribes who live in the lowlands, round Dalagoa Bay, are said by Capt. Owen to be industrious, well-behaved, and favourably disposed to trade with strangers. He mentions the arrival here of a caravan from the interior, consisting of one thousand natives, with from three hundred to four hundred elephants' tusks, and a great quantity of cattle. Captain Owen represents the people as honest in their dealings; their prudence not allowing them to give their merchandise for the momentary gratification of rum or tobacco; but they have a great desire for cloth. The Zoolus, with their sanguinary chief, Chaka, have already allowed Englishmen to settle in their dominions, near Port Natal, and granted them a large extent of country, and men to assist them in cultivating it. Mr. Isaacs considers the Zoolus to be the finest race in southern or eastern Africa. They have long known the use of iron and of muskets, which they obtained from American traders at Port Natal. Their chief articles of commerce are ivory, gold-dust, gum arabic and copal, tortoise-shell, hides, pearls, coral, and marble; indigo, cotton, and silk, with sugar, might also be produced. English goods alone are required in barter: cotton and woollen stuffs, beads, and hardware, earthenware, looking-glasses, checked shirts, coloured handkerchiefs, &c. Mr. Isaacs remarks that the contiguity of Port Natal to Mozambique, to Madagascar, and the Comoro and other islands, renders it advantageous as the site of a commercial factory for coast-trading, for which purpose the King of the Zoolus would not, it is presumed, dispute the possession of the coast by Europeans, as he is favourable to them generally, and anxious to preserve a friendly relation with the British authorities at the Cape.

The Boers, or Dutch farmers, who have of late stirred up the Caffres to insurrection, and driven from the land all who would not join them, are of unamiable character. Placed in a country where not only the necessaries, but almost every luxury, of life might by industry be procured, the Dutch Boer cares for the enjoyment of none of them. Though he has cattle in abundance, he makes very little use of milk or butter; he drinks no wine, though on a soil most favourable to vine culture; he uses few or no vegetables or roots. His pipe never quits his mouth, except when he takes his glass of brandy, or eats three meals of mutton, soaked in the fat of the large-tailed sheep. The mistress of the house, in like manner, remains almost immoveable in her chair, with hot coffee on a table always before her. The house is open to the roof, or covered only with rough poles and turf; the earthen floors swarm with insects; the rooms are almost destitute of furniture; two or three chests contain all the moveables; and the chair-bottoms are of thongs cut from a bullock's hide. But the Boer has his enjoyments. He is absolute master of a domain several miles in extent, and he lords it over his slaves. He is almost constantly above the law in the remoter parts of the colony; and, relying on his gun, as the magistrate alike of his house and his district, he resists, often with impunity, the payment of his rent, or any other demand which justice or social claims may tend to make upon him. Such are the lawless people with whom the British may hereafter have to deal in a military point of view, should not the strong arm of British law have already convinced them of their error.

It will be remembered that Captain T. C. Smith of the 27th Regiment sustained a most gallant struggle against the Boers in the recent revolt, and we may now inform our readers that that distinguished officer is not less a pleasing poet than a brave soldier.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1843.

In the outset of this journal, although strongly and steadily abjuring party, and addressing ourselves to a careful watchfulness of the administration of domestic justice—of whatever touched the home happiness of families and worked its influence upon the comforts and privileges of the people—we still marked out for ourselves a stern and independent line of conduct which left, and retains for us the liberty of an earnest expression of political opinion whenever called for by the circumstances of the time. We have all along given vent to such opinion, no matter how forcible its meaning, or deep and unmistakeable its colours, whenever occasion called; and it was one of the earliest and, we believe, best of our vindications of this principle which applied itself to an attack upon the cruelties of the Poor-law Bill. We then, however, confined our observations to its administration in England; and this we assailed as being, what we most sincerely though sorrowfully believe it to be, in direct opposition to the purer dictates of humanity—unmerciful, unrelenting, and unjust. We contemplated with true grief the cruelties which legislation was found practising upon poverty; converting the intention of good into a means of injury, and neutralizing the spirit of charity by administering it with a mocking voice and heart. The clauses affecting illegitimacy, out-door relief, and the separation of man and wife were the themes of our especial abhorrence; and against these we will still enlist whatever humble eloquence may be at our command. But, while thus opposing the fundamental principles of the new English Poor-law, we believed that a wise enactment for Ireland would be productive of a most beneficial effect. When Bacon advised Elizabeth to strike at the root of national poverty and affliction by administering national relief, his wise and clever sovereign originated a law, which, although recently abrogated on account of the corruptions that had crept around it, has made her name immortal. She established the first natural palliation by a community of the sufferings of its poor. We believed, and believe still, that such a beautiful principle as is here involved deserves its application in all the lands of the earth; and, although politicians of all parties differed over the speculation, we thought that Ireland was indeed the fairest spot for its introduction. A poor-law for Ireland we imagined could not be otherwise than good. The enactment, however, which was then made, and which has been two years since in operation, has disappointed us in that country nearly as much as the cruelties of our new-fangled system have disgusted us in this. The monies exacted from the people to support the poor have rather increased than diminished the amount of destitution. The erection of workhouses has swallowed up the funds which might wholesomely and naturally have been applied to a charitable relief of distress—and even these funds have been expended with wanton extravagance by the commissioners, who have arrogated to themselves the right of contract for their own tradesmen, in the teeth of lower tenders from the local boards. Upon this subject—which exhibits the wickedness of wasting the tribute of national benevolence—we must quote a portion of the speech of a Mr. Lendrum, at the Omagh meeting:—

"The Poor-laws were now nearly two years in existence, and the result of their operations was, that the expense attending the erection of the houses and the payment of the different officers was so great, that some of the unions were reduced to a state of bankruptcy before the houses were ready for the admission of the paupers. Mr. Lendrum, in showing that the commissioners paid no attention to the guardians, when the latter endeavoured to make the expense of the fitting up of the houses a light upon the union as possible, referred to the treatment which the guardians of the Strabane union had received at the hands of the commissioners. Though the guardians of this union proposed to have the furniture provided for one third less than the contractor required, yet their proposal was scouted by the commissioners, and when the guardians attempted to resist the imposition, they were coerced into compliance by a writ of mandamus issued against them by the Court of Queen's Bench."

This fact is an infamous record against the working of the law, for it would seem that many people paying the rates of relief have since so partaken of the very destitution they were forced to succour as to be urged to put in claims upon the ground of miserable poverty for even a return of their wretched contributions. And yet money exacted from such distressed sources has gone to meet a wanton expenditure in the erection of central prisons for the poor. This, however, is only one of the many iniquities of the system, which we are not sorry to find the Duke of Wellington declaring the intention of Government to amend; and we felt it incumbent upon us thus briefly to fix the attention of our readers upon the theme, lest we should be charged with neglecting the interests of humanity or fearing to use the weapon of censure with a firm and manly hand. Moreover, we would not willingly incur the thought that we did not sympathise as warmly with the Irish as with the English poor, or that we would not, so far as we were able, support the equal distribution of some measure of combined justice and generosity to all.

Our foreign news this week is of a varied and interesting nature. The most important item our readers will have been prepared for by the valuable communications of our Paris correspondent. We allude to the satisfactory adjustment of the misunderstanding between the Spanish and French Governments touching the conduct of their respective agents. This quarrel of subalterns, which at one time assumed a very serious attitude, has been arranged through the tact and judgment exercised by our ambassador in Paris, Lord Cowley, who took upon himself the onerous responsibility of mediator at a critical moment; and by his well-judged instructions to Mr. Aston, our envoy in Madrid, the Spanish Cabinet has been prevailed upon to withdraw, in the Madrid Official Gazette of the 10th inst., certain charges brought by Senor Guttierez, the political agent at Barcelona, against M. de Lesseps, the French consul. This result reflects the highest credit on Lord Cowley's diplomatic skill. It is pleasing to find the pacific intervention of the brother of the Duke of Wellington as effective as the stern warfare of the warrior in the Peninsula, and that a stroke of the pen now effects what the sword was formerly required to accomplish. It is the noblest homage of European civilization.

Another evidence of British influence is afforded in our Levant intelligence. A serious dispute was in progress between the Austrian Government and that of the Porte, respecting the rights of navigation of merchant steamers in the Ottoman waters. When the quarrel had taken almost its ultima ratio, the contending parties simultaneously proposed the arbitration of our ambassador, Sir Stratford Canning, to arrange the affair; and it is Great Britain who thus wards off a collision in the East, which, if once commenced, however slight the pretext, would extend to all the European Governments. Conjointly with Russia, we are also settling the dispute between Persia and the Porte. The King of Prussia has undertaken the arrangement of our difference with France as to the Portendic claims; so that proof pours in from all sides of the growing indisposition of the great powers to resort to any other means of adjusting national disputes but those of the most pacific tendency.

We are gratified to be enabled to notice these pleasing demonstrations of the universal desire for peace; and although we fear the doctrine of St. Pierre for its lasting duration is but a dreamy speculation, it is a great advance to find that the chances of collision are becoming so much reduced by the prudential policy of the leading European statesmen. With these principles as their guide much might be done to bring nations into close contact by commercial treaties concluded on broad and generous bases. We trust that our present Government is seizing every occasion to extend our trade in Europe. Much may be effected by judicious negociations. Why is not the treaty of commerce with France signed? There is nothing more to settle. The treaty is in existence, ready drawn up, requiring only signature, for the clauses have long since been agreed upon. Whence, then, this delay? France requires our iron for her railroads, and her wines and brandies have so far entered into the general consumption in this country as to promise an immense increase thereof when the present overwhelming restrictions by heavy duties are removed. We are given to understand that we are quite ready to sign, but that the French Cabinet, fearing the Anglophobia in the country, hesitates. Our belief is that, rabid as the French are against England, that a majority would be found in the present Chambers for the signature of a commercial treaty. The French wine and brandy growers are in the most depressed state, and their interest is powerful, very powerful, in the Legislature—sufficiently strong to overpower the voice of factions. Two kinds of courage are required in a Minister—the one that is derived from the consciousness of having a majority to back him, and the other, from the conviction of right, in resisting a majority. M. Guizot has displayed great judgment in leading the former, but he has yet to prove that he can control the latter when it is in the wrong. Had M. Guizot staked his Ministerial existence on the last debates in the Deputies, on the right of search question, there never would have been the necessity to refuse the ratification of the treaty of 1841, and still less the passing of the iniquitous paragraph calling for the abrogation of the treaties of 1831 and 1833. Great as is the respect we entertain for the Minister for Foreign Affairs, if he be an obstacle to the signing of a commercial treaty with this country, we should prefer his removal to his remaining in office; for if any measures are at all calculated to avert an eventual war between England and France, they are precisely those which shall bring the two countries more closely together by mercantile interests and sympathies.

FOREIGN POLITICS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Feb. 15, 1843.

My anticipations as to the satisfactory settlement of the dispute between this country and Spain have been completely realised. On Sunday the anxiously-expected courier from Madrid arrived with despatches from M. de Sinckaberg, the chargé des affaires (not chargé d'affaires) of the French embassy in the Spanish capital. These despatches afforded no definitive information, but their contents were not the less deemed satisfactory; and on Monday, about noon, the Bayonne telegraph communicated to the Minister of Foreign Affairs that all was settled. I give you the result, in preference, from the official Messager of Monday night, which had the annexed article:—"The King's Government having called on the Spanish Government for the disavowal of the imputation made by the ex-political chief of Barcelona, Senor Guttierez, against the French consul, M. de Lesseps, the Madrid Official Gazette of the 10th inst. contains this disavowal in the shape of a letter addressed to the Minister of the Interior by the Minister of War, and of which the last paragraph is drawn up in the following terms:—'Consequently, her Majesty's Government, which always acts with justice and impartiality, deems it right to declare that the assertion of the political chief was not accurate, and had, without doubt, no other foundation than the rumours circulated by persons flying from Barcelona—rumours which the inquiries of the Captain-General had dissipated.'" Tuesday's Monsieur copied the Messager's article. Thus much for the public information on this point; but I am enabled to supply you with some additional details as to the mode and manner of arrangement. The Regent, as you are aware, took very high ground in the beginning, but, as Lord Cowley's offer to act as negotiator had been accepted by M. Guizot, and authorised by Lord Aberdeen, the Spanish Cabinet was much puzzled by the new instructions given to Mr. Aston. I need scarcely inform you that although the assertions contained in the report of Baron Gutierez against M. de Lesseps, the French consul, and printed in the Madrid Gazette, in which they have been disavowed, could not be all officially proved, yet that sufficient evidence was collected to demonstrate the active intervention of the French consular agent in favour of the Barcelona insurgents. It would be tiresome to go through the details of the negotiations, but before the Regent yielded he received a distinct pledge that M. de Lesseps should be removed from Barcelona. The French Cabinet will not, however, disgrace him. Tout au contraire. The pretext, to satisfy France, will be a diplomatic promotion; and so the comedy or farce is to end until the next quarrel arises between the two countries. Louis Philippe feels confident in the fall of Es-partero, and adheres to his family projects with undisguised pertinacity. The Spanish question, and the prospects of the Ministry, occupy all the attention of our political and diplomatic rulers. The Cabinet is excessively ricketty, and I find no reason to modify the opinion I expressed in my last communication, that it will not weather the session. The truth is, that many moderate Conservatives think that M. Guizot has gone his time and has had his day. They regard him as an obstacle in the way of reconciliation of parties. Whilst he remains at the helm, say they, our foreign affairs must be at a stand-still, for he dares not sign a treaty after the experience of the non-ratification of the slave suppression convention. The Chamber of Deputies would take from a less unpopular minister what they feel bound, by the voices of their constituencies, to refuse to M. Guizot. The election for one of the Paris Colleges, in which an Opposition candidate has just been returned, is referred to as evidence of the popular feeling against him. The bourgeoisie is as much opposed to M. Guizot as the roturocracy. I am not arguing how unjust is this unpopularity, but I state the facts for your guidance. The qualities which render M. Guizot so deservedly estimable in England, and I may add in Europe, are precisely those which cause him to be hated here. Take, for instance, an incident which occurred at a large reading-room—the Palais Royale—where the last number of the LONDON ILLUSTRATED NEWS, containing a portrait of M. Guizot, was made the subject of gibes and jeers. One excitable Frenchman, with flowing locks, and bearded like the pard, was about to tear up the journal. "Ah! mon Dieu!" exclaimed a bystander, "ne le déchirez pas, ne le déchirez pas; il est si laid." So M. Guizot's portrait in your paper was saved because of a joke that the minister was so ugly—a strange qualification of his finely philosophical head, the features of which have been so accurately given by your artist.

A NEW PIANIST.—A young performer has just appeared in Paris, under the anti-musical name of Dreyschock, who, according to the dilettanti of that city, is neither a Liszt nor a Thalberg, but these "two in one," to use the canon phrase of counterpoint. The music published by him seems to be hopeless of attainment by the fingers of any other performer. We have seen some of it, and will merely state that it abounds in passages of arpeggio full chords in both hands, a tenus sustained meanwhile, which, it is said, he plays with all the rapidity, precision, and légèreté, that in their single-note succession so astounded the hearers of the above-mentioned rivals! What a treat for our young pianists! But they are sure to be at it.

INCENDIARY FIRES IN THE COUNTRY.—On Sunday last a fire broke out on the farm belonging to Mr. Christopher Waddell, coach proprietor, at Littlemore, about three miles from Oxford, which was attended with considerable destruction of property, and which, there is reason to believe, was the act of an incendiary. The country people and the Oxonians cheerfully lent a hand to work the engines. Two young men are in custody.

FIRES IN THE METROPOLIS.—On Wednesday morning, between the hours of one and two, a fire broke out on the premises of Mr. Barnett, gun-manufacturer, situate at 134, Minories. An alarm was raised and an express was despatched to the different engine stations. On their arrival the manufactory, which was about five stories high, and occupied an immense area of ground at the rear of the dwelling-houses, and extending a considerable distance along Vine-street, Crutched-friars, was one complete body of fire. By dint of extraordinary exertions on the part of the firemen the ravages of the fire were confined to Mr. Barnett's premises, all danger of the same extending being at an end about half-past two o'clock, and no further destruction of property took place. The origin of the fire could not be ascertained.

Between 10 and 11 o'clock on Monday night the inhabitants and passengers who were passing Plough-court, Whitechapel, were alarmed by hearing the most terrific cries and shrieks issuing from the upper part of the house, No. 10, which is occupied by numerous poor families. On looking up, the persons who were drawn to the spot, seeing a strong light in the attic, rushed up stairs, when on opening the room door they found the place filled with a dense smoke, and in the middle of the room they saw a poor old creature, of the name of Elizabeth Burrell, 71, entirely enveloped in flames. The poor creature was so completely enveloped in flames that it was found necessary to throw several pails full of water over her before she could be touched, when she was got out and placed in a cab, but before the vehicle reached the London Hospital death put an end to her sufferings. The eyes of the poor woman were literally burned out of her head. Another old woman, named Taylor, aged 75, lost her life in a similar way in Brewer-street, Pimlico, a few days previously.——On Wednesday morning at two o'clock a fire broke out on the premises of Mr. Case, oil and Italian warehouseman, of No. 2, Holborn-bars, and no doubt its ravages would have been extensive had it not been for the fortunate circumstance of the passing by of two firemen just at the nick of time. The engines soon arrived, and the fire was extinguished, but not before all the furniture in the room was consumed, and the flames had penetrated through the floor into the cellar, and ignited a barrel of pitch. The origin of the fire remains as yet unknown.

Several outrages of this kind occurred during the past week, when the toll-houses were robbed and the keepers severely beaten.——The St. Louis Republican of last month contains a frightful account of a fatal rencontre between four persons in the higher walks of life (doubtless calling themselves gentlemen), which forcibly depicts the wretched state of society in that country. Two of the parties, named Farr and Walker, having quarrelled in a ball-room, met afterwards casually at the Post-office, when each drew a pistol and fired at the other. Walker's pistol had revolving barrels, and the lands took effect on the breast and face. One of the balls entered the face above the mouth and below the nose; the other entered the chest a little below the nipple of the left breast. After receiving Mr. Walker's fire, Mr. Farr drew a second pistol, which he fired, but without effect. About the same time that Mr. Walker fired, Mr. M'Kinlay, seeing a pistol in the hands of Mr. Eustace, and presented, fired at Eustace, but without effect; and Mr. Eustace fired also without doing any injury.——The poor-box of St. Alphage Church, Greenwich, was robbed of its contents on Sunday evening last.——The Manchester Guardian states that Mrs. Wood, the celebrated vocalist, has become a convert to the Roman Catholic religion. As the tenets of the Catholic church do not recognise the English law of divorce, such as Lord William Lennox, Mrs. Wood's former husband, is still alive, she has been compelled to separate from Mr. Wood before she could be received into the communion of the Catholic church. To this separation Mr. Wood has consented, and has likewise generously provided for her maintenance. PROCESSION OF THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF INDIA.

INDIA.

The magnificent series of events having reference to Indian affairs which we this day present to our readers will be considered as making an appropriate appearance at a time when the political world is all agog about the acts of Lord Ellenborough and his government, and when interesting debates upon the whole subject may be daily expected in the two houses of Legislature. Monday next will be a great field day to begin.

For many months the eyes of Europe have been directed to the East, and as each mail became due expectation was on tiptoe to glean the tidings of victory or defeat—to learn whether the power of the merchant-monarchs of Leadenhall-street was to receive a check, or whether their dominion was to spread as it had hitherto done; province after province increasing the vastness of its extent, and tribe after tribe swelling its millions of subjects. The war in Afghanistan having closed,—we stay not now to debate how wisely or how well,—the interest of each Overland despatch is scarcely diminished. The hurry of conflict is over, and national feeling has assumed a quieter aspect; yet inquiry is still rife upon East Indian affairs, and with the double object of gratifying the public curiosity in this respect, and of completing our illustrations of eastern politics, we give a few more sketches allied to the subject.

The world affords no parallel to the history of the East India Company; and its rise and position must always be a source of national gratification. A mere company of merchants, they have obtained possession of regions into which their predecessors humbly sought admission,—trampling down thrones around which all the magnificence and the power of eastern despotism was assembled. To the student the history of the rise of our empire in the east is an instructive narrative of splendid events following quickly upon each other; to the statesman, it offers evidence of a succession of acquisitions never before equalled under similar circumstances, whilst the moralist finds in it a lesson, less pleasant perhaps to contemplate than fruitful in topics of thoughtful speculation. The commercial enterprise of Europe was early directed to the East Indies; but the power of the Arabian Caliphs, and subsequently of the Turkish and Persian monarchies, cut off from Hindostan the trade of the north by the occupation of the intervening country. Venice, in her days of power and pride, partially overcame this; and the desire to share in similar advantages led the Portuguese and Spaniards, in attempting the sea passage, to the discovery of the New World. Vasco de Gama having established the route to India by the Cape of Good Hope, his countrymen monopolised the commerce of India for a century. The Spaniards and the Dutch in turn enriched themselves, and the success of these powerful England [illegible] to take steps for [illegible] the advantage. In 1589 the first association was formed [illegible] London for trading between England and the East, for which purpose they obtained special license, and from this time dates the rise of the company. Not long after, the profits amounted from one to two hundred per cent. upon the capital; while at the same time its factories increased in number, but chiefly in the states of the Mogul, whose favour was assiduously cultivated. The monopoly enjoyed by the company was [illegible] disputed to [illegible] all, and [illegible] to others to trade to India. [illegible] incorporation was eventually obtained. [illegible] in 1744 was considered of [illegible] moment [illegible] the foundation of that ascendancy which was to rise upon the ruins of the Mogul empire, and the establishment of Fort

St. George in 1640, and subsequently the grant of Bombay and Calcutta, afforded secure starting-points for the power which has since extended itself over Hindostan, and eventually claimed as its tributaries one hundred and fifty millions of people. This power the company still possesses, although the Act of 1833, which deprived them of their exclusive trading privileges, fixed 1854 as the date when they were to lose the territorial government.

Our view of the East India House represents the front as seen from Leadenhall-street, but this portion gives little idea of the extent of the building, although its appearance is decidedly imposing—an effect in a great measure produced by the elevation of the portico, which consists of Ionic columns supporting a handsomely sculptured entablature. The interior contains many handsome apartments, but the most interesting is where a pleasant morning may be spent. The public are admitted gratuitously, and curators and servants are engaged to point out and explain the various articles which form the treasures of the collection. In one apartment will be found, as chief officer of the departments of library and museum, Professor Wilson,—in the realms of Asiatic lore a worthy follower of those splendid scholars whom England has heretofore produced. In a case, on the left hand upon entering, and closed in the same cabinet which has been appropriated for the reception of the Ramal or holy handkerchief, and other relics pertaining to the late Tippoo Sultan, will be found the five new medals, engraved in our last week's paper, and intended to represent the several orders of honour and merit among the native officers of British India. The first class of the first order, that of British India, is a large gold medal, in the form of an irradiated star, in the centre of which is embossed, upon a cerulean enamelled ground, a lion passant in gold. It is suspended by a crown, the whole being surrounded by a wreath of laurel pattern. The periphery of the medallion bears the following inscription:—"The Military Order of British India." No. 2 is precisely the same in character as No. 1, save and except that in the latter the crown is dispensed with. No. 3 is defined by a gold octo-radiated star, but instead of the lion being introduced into the centre, as in the former instances, two swords crossed, erect, are substituted. No. 4 is exemplified by a silver star, similar in form to that of No. 3, but the wreath is composed of gold, the symbols and letters of silver. No. 5 is the same in every respect as No. 4, save that the medal is silver throughout. The first two medallions denote the orders of "honour," the following three those of "merit." The inscription on the latter is "Reward of valour." They are all exquisitely executed.

THE SEPOYS,

or native troops, for whom these decorations are exclusively intended, are worthy of every reward which may be bestowed upon them. Composing the mass of the army, without them our immense Indian empire could not be retained, yet they have ever manifested the greatest fidelity, and when led by European officers have been found equal to all those emergencies which a state of active warfare presents. During our late campaigns in Affghanistan the Sepoys played a conspicuous part, and there, as elsewhere, behaved well. If here and there a single incident be pointed out to qualify this general commendation of the native Indian army, inquiry would discover that when they have been found wanting the defect has rather been the fault of the leader than of his men. The non-commissioned officers are selected from the natives—the commissioned officers being all Europeans; and when the latter are at all deserving, they quickly gain the confidence and affection of the men, who will then follow them wherever led, despite all dangers or difficulties.

The sects and shades of religious belief of the sepoys are numerous, and as varied as the countries and districts in which the regiments are raised and recruited. The strength of the native army in 1826 was two hundred and ninety-six thousand men! In 1833 this had been reduced to two hundred and twenty-four thousand, but has since increased to about three hundred thousand men. The amount of the force now at the disposal of the Governor-General in addition to the British regiments serving in India. The appearance of the Sepoys being familiar only to those who have journeyed in Hindostan, a group has been selected as a subject for illustration. Their number and importance,—their valour and fidelity, deserve the compliment thus paid them, no less than that which the Parliament has bestowed upon the Sepoy regiments now serving in China in common with their European brethren.

TIPPOO'S TIGER.

Such of our readers as may feel inclined to pay a visit to the museum will not fail to notice "Tippoo's Tiger," which for the benefit of those residing away from the metropolis we engrave. It is a piece of mechanism displaying at once the ingenuity and barbarism of the artist who produced it, no less than the ferocity of nature which could induce a prince to esteem it as a favourite toy. By turning a crank like the handle of an organ—sounds are emitted resembling the shrieks of a man in the jaws of a tiger—while ever and anon a deeper tone is heard, intended to represent the roar of the animal.

By an easy transition we pass from the house of the Directors in London to that of the director on the scene of action from the East India House in London to the palace of the Governor-General in Calcutta. Of this the views will give a far better idea than would be afforded by verbal description.

PROCESSION OF THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL.

Our engraving is from a sketch taken at the moment the Governor is leaving the palace, surrounded by his European and native officers; and, as a suitable companion picture, we give a state procession, to convey an idea of the general style and splendour of these Eastern ceremonials. The representative of England in India is the successor of the Mogul Emperors, and supports a power more perfect and compact than theirs, surrounded by almost equal magnificence. Our last gave the particulars of a procession to meet the army upon its return from Affghanistan—but this display was only the forerunner of others, of which our illustration conveys the character and spirit as well as the detail.

TOMB OF MAHMOUD.

The tomb of the conqueror Mahmoud—the gates of which, after centuries of neglect, have again become of importance—still stands near Ghuznee. It is a large building, now boasting few adornments, surrounded by a wall and surmounted by a dome in the style represented by our engraving. In the apartments connected with the building are many remarkable sculptures in stone; lions, tigers, and other animals being the most prominent subjects. Upon the marble sarcophagus which contains the ashes of the monarch choice passages from the Koran are inscribed, with other Arabic quotations suitable to the place of interment and in reference to the departed conqueror, whilst the ponderous mace of the Iconoclaust of Indian history still remains at the head of his tomb, as token and memorial of his prowess.

THE THUGS.

For many years past India has suffered from one of those associations, equally strange, cruel, and deadly, of which history affords us several examples. The Thugs are a native tribe whose daily avocations are assassination and robbery, and in these they excel any of their predecessors. The Old Man of the Mountain, who figures in the history of the Crusades, the Assassins, who gave their name to the cowardly crime they followed as a trade, none of those whose murderous deeds are chronicled during the world's past experience can stand any comparison with the skill and murderous dexterity of the Thugs. Our readers will all remember the volumes from the pen of a gallant officer, which, in giving many curious particulars of this tribe, invested them with an atmosphere of romance. To this course we cannot award our commendation, since murder and robbery, being among the deadliest crimes which man can commit, should in no case be clothed in the colours of poetry, or receive the illusive interest of fictio n. With this reservation, however, the volumes may be sought advantageously for the history of Thuggism; and the Indian papers having brought us information of the capture of the chief of the tribe we have thought the subject worthy of illustration. When time and civilization shall have rendered such associations mere matter of history, not of real occurrence, the portrait of the chief of the Thugs may then, as now, be turned to with a philosopic eye to scan the lineaments of one capable of making murder and spoliation the common business of his career. The fact of the capture was thus referred to in our last: —

"Captain Vallancey has again been successful in Thug capturing, having secured one of great note in Northern Arcot. Being the only one left of his profession in the north, and as his influence was great among the fraternity in the south, Vallancey had kept up a vigilant search after him. Besides this important capture, other two noted Thugs are reported as having been shot. He is now off in pursuit of the three sons of the late celebrated female Thug, Jugdamah, and other parties who have emigrated to the south, and who have turned their steps in a direction where they are little expected. Vallancey has captured ten noted Thugs within twenty months."

Our engraving displays him as he appeared when taken disguised as a traveller's escort, the upper part of his face painted white after the usual fashion of the country with commercial travellers. He holds in his hand the charmed axe of Deera, the sanguine goddess of his idolatry.

THE PROPOSED NEW LAW COURTS, LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS.

By a stupid and wholly unaccountable blunder there last week appeared in this paper, appended to an engraving representing the proposed new law courts, Lincoln's Inn Fields, a description belonging to an entirely different edifice, and we proceed to give the proper description of the building in question: —

The expediency of erecting in the neighbourhood of the Inns of Court new courts for the sitting of law and equity, in lieu of the present courts adjoining Westminster Hall, has been mooted in Parliament during the last two sessions, when select committees were appointed to inquire into the subject. From their report and minutes of evidence we gather that the classical structure engraved in our last paper has been designed by Sir Charles Barry, the architect of the new houses of Parliament. Sir Charles considers the site of Lincoln's Inn Fields to be the most desirable; the projected building for the law courts would occupy about two acres and one third, or somewhat more than one third of the area within the walls of Lincoln's Inn Fields, or between one eighth and one ninth of the open space in the Fields, the gardens, and the New-square. The height of the proposed building would be about 50 feet, which would not materially impede the circulation of air, which would be much improved by the proposed enlargement of the various approaches, whilst the courts themselves would be belted with a plantation, averaging 100 feet in width, and at an average distance of 200 feet from the surrounding houses.

The design is quadrangular in plan, the entrance porticoes for the public facing Lincoln's Inn-gardens and the block of houses between Duke-street and Great Queen-street. In the two other sides are private entrance porticoes for the judges and barristers; and to these as well as the public porticoes, are inclined carriage-roads and footpaths; and at each outer angle of the plan is a lodge; and around the buildings are an open area and colonnade. In the centre of the design is a public hall, 200 feet long, 8 feet wide, and 60 feet high, or nearly equal to the area of Westminster-hall. Around this hall, and communicating with it by lobbies, are twelve courts lighted from above; the largest 55 feet long by 45 feet wide; the others 35 feet long by 25 feet wide. Each court is to have attached rooms for the judges and their clerks, with rooms for barristers, solicitors, and witnesses, and the means of access to the witness-box in the court, without interruption from the public. On the same floor will be retiring rooms for juries, rooms for grand juries, for the grand inquest, for refreshments, &c.; and a library at each angle. On the floor also and the basements Sir C. Barry proposes to arrange the whole of the records of the country, with sufficient space for an increase of about one third of their present number. The basement story is to be vaulted and rendered fire-proof, and well lighted and ventilated from the area. Another story is proposed above the ground-floor, to be lighted entirely from within, above the top of the courts; and here might be accommodated the Masters in Chancery, resident court-keepers, &c.

The accesses proposed to the new courts are, from the west-end of the town, by removal of the houses adjoining Little-turnstile; from the City, viâ Holborn, by removal of the houses on the west side of Great-turnstile; from Westminster, by means of a new street from the end of Catherine-street, through White-hart-yard, and Blackmore and Clare-streets; and the approach from the City, viâ Fleet-street, might be much improved by widening Carey-street, at its junction with Chancery-lane. Sir Charles Barry has also directed his attention to two other sites for the new courts, one between Lincoln's-inn New-square and the Temple, or the block of houses from Bell-yard to Boswell-court; and the other a portion of the Rolls estates, between Chancery-lane and Fetter-lane, but Sir Charles decidedly prefers the area of Lincoln's Inn Fields, especially if the record establishment is to be united with the courts. It should be added, that in the architect's plan for the New Houses of Parliament the only alteration contemplated is a change in the elevations towards old Palace-yard and St. Margaret-street, to harmonize those fronts with the rest of the building; whereas, by the entire removal of the courts, additional accommodation would be afforded for the business of Parliament, so that the scheme embraces two objects.

Sir Charles Barry has prepared his plan at the instance of Mr. Vizard, and in consequence of resolutions passed at a meeting of solicitors. He roughly estimates the cost of the building at about £200,000; and Sir Charles's "vague opinion" is that the cost of the approaches would be considerably under a million.

Meanwhile, the opinions of the great law officers on the expediency of the removal of the law courts from Westminster are somewhat conflicting. Lord Abinger states that no fault has been found with the present site until lately, after nearly 1000 years' experience, though his lordship acknowledges his partiality for Westminster may be "a foolish prejudice" he has against "change with all its accompaniments;" and the walk from the inns of court to Westminster he considers but an imaginary inconvenience. The Lord Chancellor, the Vice-Chancellor, and the Master of the Rolls are favourable to the concentration of the courts, the grand feature of the new building. The Lord Chief Justice inclines to this opinion, which was the original principle of Westminster Hall, to which site also "a feeling of religio loci exists among the judges." The Lord Chancellor considers that Lincoln's Inn Fields would be the best site, it being near the chambers and law offices; although his lordship will not countenance the application of the Suitors' Fund to the expense of the new building; and the means, therefore, remain to be provided. Lincoln's Inn Fields is decidedly in "the law quarter of the town," and the desire on the part of the profession for the removal of the courts there is increasing; the West-end solicitors complaining of the inconvenience of Westminster as much as the attorneys resident elsewhere in the metropolis. Among the objections is the blocking-up an open space like Lincoln's Inn Fields; Mr. M. D. Hill having heard of persons who considered this area as their "country walk," and that "they had been in the country, when they had been round Lincoln's Inn Fields."

ORIGINAL POETRY.

SONNET.

Even as the roses Summer leaves behind
Are prized the most, though once they were not fairest—
Or, when high joy is absent from the mind,
Inferior pleasure's counted as the rarest:
Or as the bird that loves her brood, save one,
Will tend him dearly when the rest are gone!
Thus do I know, when they, who in thy heart
Now revel on its fondness, shall ere long
Prove their light vows are frailty and depart,
Leaving thee weeping o'er their fabled song—
Thou'lt turn to me and kindly here approve
The true sincerity of my slighted love!
But thou shalt find me not—an early grave
My love—my wrongs—my broken heart shall have!—W.

A COMPARISON!

WRITTEN ON THE LAST LEAF OF A LADY'S ALBUM.

With all the best poetic skill
My art may own:
It is the last one in the book—
Let us turn back, my Muse! and look
At what's foregone.

Sonnets to lips and eyes are here—
Vows, sworn at least to be sincere,
A goodly tribe:—
A goddess truly must she be,
In mind and form all symmetry,
They here describe!

Pansies and faded violets
Are mingled with the honey'd sweets
Of flatt'ring words:—*
On ev'ry page "Forget-me-not"
Doth leave a trace—sometimes a blot—
As chance affords!

And here's a wither'd rose, all pale,
But scented sweet as when the gale
First woo'd its breath:—
There's not a storied line to tell,
Was it the gift of Love's farewell
Or friend's in death!

But yet 'tis cradled in the nook,
The prettiest of this tiny book;
A jetty tress
Is all that binds it to the leaf;
It seems a flow'ret strewn by grief
Some grave to dress!

Oh! thus in woman's heart will dwell
The ling'ring of some broken spell
In gayest hour;
And sweetly sad 'mid revelry,
Breathe forth the sigh of memory,
Like this dead flow'r!

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

SUNDAY.—Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert took walking exercise both this morning and afternoon. Her Majesty, his Royal Highness Prince Albert, and the whole of the court, attended divine service in the private chapel within the castle: the Rev. John Vane officiated.

MONDAY.—Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert took their usual walking exercise. His Royal Highness Prince Albert afterwards, attended by Colonel Wylde and Mr. Anson, left the castle in a carriage and four for Swinley, where saddle-horses had been sent forward in readiness. His Royal Highness then rode round the extensive cover lands at Swinley, Rapley, and Bagshot, and visited the old Roman encampment on the heath. The royal party returned to the castle to luncheon. This afternoon her Majesty rode out in a pony phaeton, driven by his Royal Highness Prince Albert. Colonel Arbuthnot and Colonel Wylde were in attendance on horseback. The Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal were taken an airing. Lord Melbourne and the Hon. C. A. Murray united with her Majesty's staghounds to-day; the meet being at Thorpe.

TUESDAY.—The usual routine was observed by her Majesty and her royal consort. The royal dinner party included the following personages:—The Countess of Charlemont, the Hon. the Misses Stanley and Hamilton, the Earl of Liverpool, the Earl of Lincoln, Viscount and Viscountess Emlyn, Lord Hawarden, Sir Robert Otway, Colonel Wylde, Colonel Arbuthnot, the Hon. C. A. Murray, and Dr. Pretorius. Covers were laid for fifteen.

The court leaves Windsor this morning (Friday) for Buckingham Palace, the presence of Prince Albert being required at the Duchy of Cornwall Office at Somerset House. It is expected that her Majesty and the Prince (who, with the royal suite, will proceed to Paddington by a special train from Slough) will leave the castle in the course of the morning, so as to enable his Royal Highness to reach Somerset House about noon. The Prince of Wales and Princess Royal, who are in excellent health, will accompany their illustrious parents to town.

We have heard that her Majesty has been pleased to grant the Marchioness Wellesley apartments in Hampton court Palace, as a mark of royal favour. Her ladyship's health has much improved, and it is expected she will resume her duties as one of the ladies of the bedchamber of her Majesty the Queen Dowager.

The Earl of Dunmore, cousin of the noble marquis, and several members of the ducal family, departed at the close of the past week for Germany, to be present at the festivities preceding the solemnity.

We regret to record the demise of Sir Thomas Hesketh, Bart., who expired on Friday se'nnight after a short illness. His only son, Mr. T. G. Hesketh, succeeds to the title and estates.

COUNTRY NEWS.

CAMBRIDGE.—ANOTHER MURDER.—It will be recollected by our readers that in last January twelvemonths a gentleman named John James Hopwood, a graduate of St. Peter's College, Cambridge, was found nearly dead, in a ditch near Chesterton, under circumstances which excited suspicion that he had not been fairly dealt with. He breathed and groaned when first discovered, but died without ever uttering a word. An inquest was held upon his body, and in the absence of evidence of foul play, a verdict of "Died by the Visitation of God" was returned. It appears, however, that a young woman, who is suffering imprisonment in Cambridge jail for robbery, has made a confession, from which it appears that Mr. Hopwood was murdered for the sake of robbing him. The woman in question states that she was at Milton feast, in company with other young women and two men, and that the latter, on their return murdered a man, by smothering him in the snow, in Cottenham fields. The names of the parties implicated by this confession are at present withheld, for the purposes of justice. But if the girl's statements be true, it will probably not be long before the guilty parties are brought to trial.

GLOUCESTER. A CLERGYMAN SHOT BY HIS STEP-SON.—On Monday morning last, a young man, about eighteen years of age, of genteel appearance, was brought to the Gloucester county gaol, charged with having intentionally shot the Rev. Hugh Percy Rennett, perpetual curate of Norton, a parish situated four miles from this city, on the road to Tewkesbury. The circumstances under which the outrage was committed are reported to be as follow: — Mr. Rennett, who is related to the Northumberland family, married a Mrs. Clarke, the mother of the young man committed. The marriage was a very unhappy one, scarcely a day passing without some brawl or other occurring. As was natural, the young man took part with his mother, and it is alleged that the combined power of the mother and son was too powerful for the single-handed vicar. On Friday se'nnight there was a quarrel, and on Saturday night another, in the course of which the vicar threatened to strike his wife. This, it is said, roused the passions of the son to an ungovernable pitch, and, seizing a loaded pistol, he fired at his step-father. The ball entered the neck, and, the serious nature of the wound becoming instantly apparent, surgical aid was sent for, and the most persevering efforts made to extract the ball, but without effect. William Cother, Esq., surgeon, of this city, was sent for express on Sunday, and ascertained that the ball, after penetrating the throat, through the centre of the stock worn by the unfortunate gentleman, passed by the larynx, taking an oblique direction towards what is called the painter's muscle, and then descending downwards towards the shoulder. As may be supposed, the reverend gentleman remains in a very precarious state. The son stated to the magistrates that his step-father had frequently threatened his life, and that, as a measure of self-defence, he kept a loaded pistol at all times within his reach. In the course of the brawl on Saturday night Mr. Rennett (he says) struck him on the head with a life-preserver, and this led to the firing of the pistol. It is said that the wounded man gives a very different account of the transaction.

MANCHESTER.—The twenty-second annual general meeting of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce and Manufactures was held at the office, Town-hall Buildings, King-street, on Monday last, for the purposes of receiving the annual report of the board of directors, and of electing the directors for the ensuing year. Holland Hoole, Esq., vice-president of the chamber, took the chair. In accordance with annual custom, the directors of the chamber proceeded to lay before the members a digest of the principal subjects to which their attention had been directed during the past year, amongst which the Cornlaws and the tariff occupied no inconsiderable portion of their attention. The report of the directors was unanimously approved of and adopted.

NEWCASTLE.—A remarkable case of death from hydrophobia has this week occurred in Newcastle. The sufferer was a labouring man, named Richard Oxley, who about two years ago was bitten by a mad dog in two places on the left arm. The wounds were at the time dressed by Mr. Walker, surgeon, and in due course healed. No further inconvenience was felt by Oxley until Saturday week, when he suddenly became ill, and during Sunday manifested decided symptoms of this dreadful disease—failing into violent fits whenever water or any other liquid was presented to him. Medical assistance was procured prior to the exhibition of these symptoms, but without effect; he expired in great agony on the Tuesday morning following.

IRELAND.

COLLEGE ELECTION.—The election for the Dublin University took place on Friday week, when Mr. George Alexander Hamilton was returned without opposition. This is the gentleman who several times stood for the county of Dublin, and, for a short time, represented its city on Conservative principles. He was put in nomination by the Vice-Provost, Dr. Prior, and Mr. George Ogle Moore.

DEATH OF SIR JOHN NEWPORT.—We deeply regret to announce the death of the venerated Sir John Newport, Bart., which took place on Thursday se'nnight, at his seat, Newpark, near Waterford, for which city he had been long the zealous and faithful representative.

The Wexford Conservative enters the following circumstance on record as an event worthy of an annus mirabilis:—On the opening of the Farmers' Arms Hotel, at Gorey, on the 26th ult., one hundred gentlemen of that neighbourhood, without any political or religious distinction, dined together in perfect harmony!!

The Dublin Monitor says that the members of the Sackville-street Club, in that city, have invited the Lord-Lieutenant to a grand ball, for the 21st of this month; and that his Excellency has requested the judges to postpone the circuits, for the convenience of numerous invited guests, barristers and country gentlemen. Two of the learned judges, Ball and Jackson, are stated to have yielded to the mandate, and postponed the commencement of the Munster Circuit to the 25th. But others, not so courtly, refuse to delay the public business for a day.

The case of George O'Malley Irwin, Esq., barrister-at-law, v. Major-General George O'Malley, was tried last week (for the second time) before the Chief Baron and a special jury. On the former trial (before a common jury) the jury disagreed, and one of them was withdrawn. The plaintiff, who is a barrister, was residing in Dublin in April, 1840, at which time Captain Cotherby, Captain William Irwin, was on leave from his regiment in Dublin. The defendant, who was then unwell, and colonel of the captain's regiment, was quartered in London, from whence he wrote a letter to the captain, upon the 23rd of April, 1840. This letter constituted the ground of the plaintiff's action.—Mr. Whiteside stated the case for the plaintiff, and a number of witnesses were examined, whose testimony seemed to make much more for the defendant than for the plaintuff.—Mr. Sergeant Keating was heard at great length for the defendant. He contended that the letter written by the general was a privileged communication, such as he, in either of his capacities of colonel of his nephew's regiment, or as his uncle, he should and ought to have written. The letter in question was a matter of advice to him and his family, as to what course of conduct they should pursue towards the plaintiff, who could not be associated with by gentlemen, or introduced into the company of gentlemen, having been found guilty, and having undergone imprisonment for forgery.—The Chief Baron charged the jury. He said they should consider the relation in which the general stood towards the parties to whom he wrote the letter and to the plaintiff—uncle and colonel to the former, and uncle to the latter—in considering the feelings which prompted the writing of the letter. The question for their consideration was, whether the communication was made with a malicious intent, for the purpose of damaging the plaintiff's character. They had evidence given to show that the general had received a communication at the period of his sister's death which might be supposed to draw from him the letter in question. The feelings by which it was dictated was a matter for their consideration; and from the evidence adduced they should come to the conclusion—was it written with a malicious intent or not. They would consider the evidence upon that subject, and if they thought it was that honest, fair, warranted, or privileged communication, not going beyond in language what the circumstances would require, they ought to find a verdict for the defendant. If, on the contrary, they considered it was not that fair, bonâ fide communication, they would find for the plaintiff and consider what damages he was entitled to at their hands.—The jury, without leaving the box, found for the defendant, with 6d. costs.

The Clare Journal states that cattle, which had been seized for poor rates, under decrees granted at the last Killaloe Sessions, were set up to auction in the town of Tulla last week, and that—as no one could be got to purchase—they were given back to the owners.

EVERY BODY'S COLUMN.

THE MADMAN'S CAVE.

'Mid the blue heath and fern,
Where mountain oaks yearn
Their branches to twine o'er the cleft
Of a deep river's gloom,
There's a green spot of bloom,
For which the low world I have left!

There I've nothing to fear,
I've nothing to hear,
But the huge hanging crags and the flood
The crags they have hung
Since the waterfall sung
Its first foamy song to the wood! *

The wood, the greenwood,
That for ages has stood
A-fringing the stream and its rocks —
The stream—the hoarse stream
That joins in the scream
Of the wild birds that dwell there in flocks!

In flocks where they dwell,
In the mountain or dell,
Be sure there is loneliness too :—
I would not be found
In the low vulgar ground,
Where the eagle or heath-cock ne'er flew!

Around my high nest
There is stillness and rest,
Save waters that tumble for aye!
Though the tempest may rave
There's a calm in my cave,
And a twilight that's better than day!

A twilight that loves
The sad tint of the groves—
The groves that love twilight as well.
For they close 'round about
To keep the day out :
The day never yet saw my cell!

In the warm summer night,
I have let the moonlight,
Just peep for awhile in my bow'r:
And the star-lights so blue
Have oft twinkled through
The chinks of my airy-built tower!

But daylight I shun,
And when evening's begun,
I wander all lonely and sad:—
My sadness to lose
In the sweets of the dews—
The dews love me best when I'm mad!

For they shed their soft rain
On the heat of my brain,
And then in my tears they run down
To cool my hot cheek :—
If their freshness could speak
Its words would be kind as my own.

As my own, when I say
To the wild birds that play
Afar in the distance from me,
" Come nigh—fear me not—
'Mid these hills I've forgot
All the war that between us might be!

" Look at the wild flowers,
That in the taught bowers
Of art never fear easily spring: —
See here they intrude
With their fanciful brood,
Like children they clamber and cling!

" For the life I am worth
I would not pluck forth
One leaf or one blossom they bear: —
Then, birds! be as free,
There's no danger in me—
At your rivulets drink without fear!"

Without fear, will they?—No!
For when near them I go
To befriend or their beauty to see,—
Up -up in the sky,
From the vallevs they fly,
And leave them all lonely to me!

All lonely I love
To be left in the grove,
To ponder on life and its gloom;
A sorrowful dream
Of a straw on a stream—
A little procession—a tomb!

* In this and some following stanzas an attempt has been made to imitate the Con-a-clon, or iterative style of the ancient Irish poets.

RELIGIOUS QUIBBLES.

The inquisition punished heretics by fire, to elude the maxim, Ecclesia non sovit sanguinem; for burning a heretic, say they, does not shed his blood. Otho, the bishop, at the Norman invasion, in the tapestry worked by Matilda, the Queen of William the Conqueror, is represented with a mace in his hand, for the purpose that when he despatched his antagonist he might not spill blood but only break his bones. Religion had her quibbles as well as law.

John Aurelio Augurello, an Italian poet, who was professor of the belles lettres at Treviso, where he died in 1524, wrote a Latin poem, entitled "Chrysopoeia, or the Art of making Gold." This he dedicated to Leo the Tenth; upon which the pontiff presented him with a large empty purse, and said, that "as he could make gold he best knew how to fill it"

DISCONTENT.

However paradoxical it may appear, we are more indebted to a man's discontent than to his nobler qualities for the comforts we enjoy; since had he remained content society would have made little advance.

THE RESTORATION OF THE GATES OF SOMNAUTH BY LORD ELLEN BOROUGH.

The gates of Gaza, which, in days of yore,
The mighty Samson on his shoulders bore,
Prostrate remained—no sacred hand
Dared to erect them in the Holy Land.
Not so of Somnauth: these the Christian Lord,
With heathen rites, to Brahma's shrine restored.
Strange contrast! Yet alike their fate appears;
For Samson pulled a house about his ears.—Times.

GEORGE THE FOURTH'S DOMESTIC HABITS.

He usually received me at from ten to eleven o'clock, in his bed. He chatted with me for half an hour, and was generally very agreeable, although now and then irritable. He was not strictly attentive to facts, but embel ished all his stories, to render them more amusing, so that it would not answer always to repeat his sayings of others. When ill, the King would never allow that it had been caused by his own imprudence. One morning his tongue was white, and he was much heated. "By God," said he, "it is very extraordinary that I should be thus heated, for I lived very abstemiously, and went to bed in good time. I must have some beaume de vie, Sir." When we went out of the room, W—— said, "You must not professionally act upon what his Majesty said; he was drinking Maraschino at two o'clock this morning." He was a good judge of the medicine which would best suit him. [This is a strong admission for a medical authority.] He bore enormous doses of opiates—one hundred drops of laudanum, for instance. In bleeding, also, I have known from twenty to twenty five ounces taken from him several times. [Probably on that very account.] The King was irregular in his times for eating and drinking. "Bring me cold chicken," he would say at eleven before he rose. "Yes, sire." "Bring it, and give me a goblet of soda water." Soon after he ate again, and at dinner largely; but he did not, in general, drink much at dinner, unless tempted by the society of men that he liked. He suffered much from rheumatism and gout, but the colchicum relieved him. One morning when he had rheumatism in his hip, and there was a doubt about the propriety of giving him colchicum, he said, "Gentlemen, I have borne your half measures long enough to please you—now I will please myself, and take colchicum," which he did, and was soon relieved, &c.—Life of Sir Astley Cooper.

Opinion and belief are influenced by affection as well as by propensity. The noted story of a fine lady and a curate viewing the moon through a telescope, is a pleasant illustration. "I perceive," says the lady, "two mountains inclining to each other; they are certainly two happy lovers." "Not at all," replies the curate; "they are two steeples of a cathedral."

OUR FIRST FRIEND.

As morning tears on summer flowers,
As pearls in ocean cave,
As sunlet on the waves,
As moonlight on the wave, -
Not even dreams of bliss, above,
Are purer than a mother's love!

In helpless childhood's shadowy hour,
When all seems dim and scarce defined,
On her hath God bestowed the power,
To mould the young Immortal's mind:
And could dear this world would prove,
Without a Mother's watchful love!

And when maturity hath brought,
Its train of kind affections seared,
Its worm of care and cankering thought,
To blight the flowers gay hope had reared;
The balm of peace is poured on us,
Through thine—a Mother's soothing voice!

Yes, e'en though error track our way,
And tongues speak lightly of our fame,
And thy false friends—prosperity—
Have fled with fortune's fitful flame; —
One bright star still the Lord hath given,
To guide the wanderer home—to heaven!—Mrs. La Mont.

VALENTINE'S DAY.

The practice of "choosing a Valentine," as it is called, on this day (Feb. 14) is too well known to need explanation. The origin of the custom has been much controverted; it is antiquarian of very ancient date. Valentine was a presbyter of the church, who suffered martyrdom under Claudius II., at Rome, A.D. 271. It is said that on this day the birds choose their mates; whence probably came the custom of young people choosing Valentines, or particular friends, on the feast of Valentine.

PRUDERY.

Women who are the least bashful are not unfrequently the most modest; and we are never more deceived than when we would infer any laxity of principle from that freedom of demeanour which often arises from a total ignorance of vice. Prudery, on the contrary, is often assumed rather to keep off the suspicion of criminality than criminality itself; and is resorted to to defend the fair wearer, not from the whispers of the male sex, but of her own; but it is a cumbersome panoply; and, like heavy armour, is seldom worn except by those who attire themselves for the combat, or who have received a wound.

THE THEATRES.

DRURY LANE.

"Der Freyschütz" has been revived at this house as an afterpiece, but with little or no difference in its first production, save that the "getting up" is generally inferior. Horn's Caspar, which was the soul of the piece in acting and singing, is sadly missed, and Allen's pure style seems feeble and not at home in the passionate music of Weber. Occasionally there were sweet little morceaux, but on the whole it wanted vigour. Miss Romer sang very well, and Miss P. Horton was excellent. There was nothing of revival about the scenery save a little retouching: the additions or alterations of the incantation scene are more grotesque than awfully supernatural.

COVENT GARDEN THEATRE.

On Monday evening last a Mr. Gregory (of some repute amon the Shakesperian Histrionic Society) debuted for the part of Hamlet, and appeared on these boards ready and willing to go through that arduous character: but, owing to something or other, the audience would not allow him to be heard; and, although he for a considerable time "brunted their fury with undaunted mien," he was ultimately obliged to retire, amidst a very general shout of execration! Of course, as to his merits as an actor we cannot presume to offer an opinion; but we hear that he has often played successfully at the semi-reduits exhibitions given by the above society at her Majesty's Theatre and elsewhere. We have heard his Othello commended; and good judges assure us that in Lago also his delivery of the following passages is particularly striking :—

Iago.—Good name in man and woman, my dear lord,
Is the immediate jewel of their souls.
Who steals my purse steals trash; 'tis something, nothing;
But he that filches from me my good name
Robs me of that which not much enriches him,
And makes me poor indeed!

ST. JAMES'S THEATRE.
RETURN OF BRAHAM!

After an absence of more than two years from his native land, we hail with the most heartfelt delight the return of England's greatest vocal ornament, once the primo tenore of Europe—Mr. Braham. We have nothing to do with the motives which threatened us with an exile sagge ad morirem to our national artiste: we have but to felicitate him on the glorious success which has attended him throughout the United States, and congratulate ourselves upon his safe return home, bettered in health, spirits, and circumstances. In conjunction with his youngest son (of whom anon), Mr. Braham has given a concert at the St. James's Theatre, which was literally crammed to the ceiling by a greater crowd of dilettanti than it is usual to see congregated on any musical occasion. But this was no ordinary one—the name of Braham was but tradition to many who had never been delighted by his strains, while those who remembered the greener beauty of his florid song thronged with a melancholy foreboding that the aged tree would cast its shadow with its trunk, not with foliage :—

Truncô, non frondibus, effecit umbram!

But how agreeable the disappointment to both parties! They who heard Braham for the first time on Thursday week heard recitative given in a manner which they never met with before; while the apprehensions of his former friends and enthusiastic admirers were soon dissipated on finding that time and absence had done but little to impair the magical powers of his voice, and if that little were at any time perceptible, it was amply atoned for by a more rigid attention to pathos, purity of style, and grace, than when, in other days, he luxuriated in careless freedom through the varieties of a vocal physique that in him knew no bounds. Perhaps the seeming deprivation in power was occasioned by the constraint of accompanying himself (and admirably, too) on the pianoforte. Be this as it may, it afforded more opportunity of hearing him sing than shout—of appreciating his finished style rather than being astounded by the force and duration of his voice; and, lastly and above all, of following him closely through the subtle subdivisions of his eloquent intonation, of hearing the faithful echo to every particular phrase—nay, word —on which feeling might pause to bestow expression and effect.

"Deeper and deeper still," that sublime piece of musical tragic poetry, is yet Braham's own: no other singer can interpret so eloquently, so faithfully, that master monument of the mighty Handel's genius.

The selections of the evening afforded but few novelties, but these were not looked for; the all-absorbing anxiety was to hear "the re-appearance of the world" ("as Miss Porter introduces him in her "Thaddeus of Warsaw"), once more in his native land, and to afford an audience that he had a thousand times roused to greater enthusiasm than any singer in the world.

Mr. Charles Braham is yet but the Ascanius puer led on by his pater Æneas, but promises to be a worthy scion of the parent stock. His physical advantages are of a high order, and whether or not he belong to them are only such as time and skill cannot fail to eradicate.

Another concert was announced for last Thursday of which, and with more particulars relative to the master of English song, we will treat in another notice.

ADELPHI THEATRE.

—A genuine Adelphi farce, bearing the name of "Buiks the Bagman," and written by Mr. S. Coyne, was produced for the first time at this theatre on Monday evening. It literally overflowed with a closely-sustained and smartly-written stream of equivoque, that kept the audience in a fit of hysterical merriment from its commencement to its close.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL CHIT-CHAT.

GRAND CONCERT IN THE CITY.—On Monday next a concert on an unusually splendid scale will be given at the Universal Hall of Commerce, for the relief of the widows and orphans of those unfortunates who were lately lost in the Reliance East Indiaman and the Conqueror, on the coast of France. Amongst the host of celebrated names announced in the programme are those of Mrs. Alfred Shaw, Madame Caradori Allen, Miss Rainforth, Miss Birch, M. Benedict, and Sir George Smart, under whose direction the performances will be conducted. Her Majesty, the Queen Dowager, and several of the highest noblesse of the land, have already made the most munificent contributions to the praiseworthy undertaking.

GREENWICH SOCIETY.—Monday night the lecture-room, in connexion with the above Society, was opened, for the first time, to the public. The room is large and commodious, constructed with a view to effect, without losing sight of convenience. The arrangements are such, that when the room is crowded—and it is capable of containing about 1000 persons—no one can complain of either obstruction to the eye or impediment to the ear. Many of those who have eminently distinguished themselves in the promotion of popular education honoured the occasion with their presence. The room was crowded to excess with a large and attentive audience of both sexes.

LITERATURE.

THE TRADUCED. An Historical Romance; by N. MICHELL, Author of "The Fatalist, or the Fortunes of Godolphin." In three volumes. T. and W. Boone.

JOANNA, Queen of Naples from 1343 to 1381, was one of the most remarkable women of the middle ages. A volume would be required to detail with any particularity the incidents of her various and troubled life, and the fortunes of the four husbands who successively shared her love and her kingdom, nor, if the truth were severely told, without taint or shadow of colour, would it be a very edifying detail. Some degree of mystery rests on various portions of her strange story, but although we always wish to lean to the side of charity, it would require a far more ample share of undoubting faith than we can lay claim to to believe her a guiltless, or even a very estimable personage. Still, she was no doubt sinned against as well as sinning; and although she is more than suspected of having made away with her first husband, Andrew of Hungary, we must allow that he was a man of brutal manners, and that she was exposed, amidst the anarchy of those barbarous times of feudality, and in the horrid atmosphere of vice and cruelty which then filled Naples, to temptations which might have proved too great for even a stronger vessel than the frail Joanna. Few portions of modern history have given rise to more furious controversy than the tale of her life, and the question of her guilt or innocence. Boccaccio, Petrarch, and an authority of far more weight than either, Giannone, in his learned history of Naples, stoutly maintain the latter: the former appears from the chroniclers of the day, and from an impartial consideration of her general character, as well as the circumstances of the times; and to this view of the case the late acute and judicious Sismondi, who probably knew more of Italian history than any other man of his day, perhaps we may say, than any man now living, has given his sanction. This difference of witnesses and obscurity of testimony may well give us pause when the truth of historical relations is agitated. Annalists and historians are no more infallible, nor inaccessible to the influence of those sinister motives which pervert the judgment and clothe the mind with the foul crust of prejudice, than meaner men. Thus it is that we are made the fools of time, and that "the spirits of the wise sit in the clouds, and laugh at us" and our trivial affairs. For who can pretend to foretel how it may please the writers of some future day to tell the story of our own times, or how the events of this passing scene, which now appear so clear, certain, and indubitable, may look to the prying gaze of posterity! Actions, and occurrences, and the names of parties, may remain to future ages, but how curiously misinterpreted, how strangely distorted!

The romance of "The Traduced" is concerned with the earliest part of Joanna's life; her unhappy union with Andrea, the conspiracy against him and murder, and her second marriage with her lover and cousin, Prince Louis of Tarentum. The author has chosen to view her as an injured, guiltless, slandered heroine, whether really believing her so, or for the purposes of his novel. To this we have little or no objection to make. It matters nothing to the general public of the present day whether she was so or not, so long as the means exist of satisfying inquirers after truth, who are not content to take their notions of history from the pages of romancers, and are anxious to read its priceless lessons in a less turbid and polluted source. The book then, as a romance, is a very fair production, and may be read with pleasure, although not belonging to the first class. We trust the author will not take the latter portion of the sentence to heart. For ourselves, there is nothing that could happen to us we should so much deprecate as being the author of a first-rate novel or romance—we mean as such things go at the present day. In the judgment of the discerning, no small portion of criminality may fairly be thought to attach to such a character. Your first-class novel is now a companion for Newgate, and the fitting hand-book of Goods and Greenacres. It is generally occupied with the doings of swindlers, thieves, and cut-throats, than whom the author can scarcely be held a more respectable person, and among whom he has doubtless studied and taken his degree. Or it is taken up with the frauds and follies of fashionable life, and the flutterings of the insect tribe who pay their devotions to the fickle goddess who has her shrine at Almack's, and presides over the purlieus of St. James's. Or, if to be assigned to neither of these classes, it is a bundle of maudlin sentiment and unnatural cant, pandering to the depraved taste of a reading public glutted with monstrosities, yet eager after excitement, with characters such as never existed in nature, or anywhere except in the diseased brain of the writer—the impure goblet of Circe, in short, without the sugared charms which mask the rank draught palateable. We confess our aversion to drink of such steaming, and infinitely prefer resigning ourselves to an hour or two of quiet enjoyment, or even, on occasion, of placid and composed indifference.

There is not much new material in "The Traduced;" the characters belong to old types, the incidents have little of novelty, and the style is somewhat inartificial and unpractised. But the author has been at much pains to make himself acquainted with the character of the times and the Italian manners of the period, of which he has succeeded in giving us what is in the main a faithful picture. He is best in description; his portraits want minuteness of outline and distinctness of colouring. There is the usual quantum of monks, knights, princes, princesses, maids of honour, black-browed conspirators, astrologers and their dwarfs, with which romance-readers are long been familiar. It is, however, not inferior to many of the fictions of James, which are made up of very much the same materials. There is, on the whole, room for congratulation at the disappearance of the Minerva-press school of romances. These were books far inferior in worth and talent to nursery tales—dealing in the most vulgar class of melo-dramatic elements -banditti, sorcerers, ghosts, fiends, and blue fire. It was only in the hands of a Radcliffe that such a style could be even tolerable. They have been replaced by a better class of works, of which the present may be taken as a specimen—works generally founded on history, and which have, at least, the merit of credibility in the story, probability in the characters, and respectability in point of composition, with an avoidance of immoral sentiment.

We annex two extracts, in order that our readers may judge o the author's manner. Our first shall be a hawking-party :—

The party pressed forwards, full of spirits and good humour. The scene of the open car,—and with the arrangement we have perceived Durazzo had made himself acquainted, was to be along by the Mare Morto, the ancient Campi Elysii, and thence by the Lake of Averno home.—They crossed beath land, single paths and now the plains so celebrated by Virgil, covered with cypresses, mouldering temples, and tombs, spread before them. The spot, which would have awakened a thousand remembrances in the bosom of the classic scholar, had little influence, with the exception of two or three individuals, on any present. They only looked out, where by pond or rushy stream, might lurk heron or crane. It was not long before game was discovered. In the middle of a brook, the head bent down, intent on his manœuvres that might be sporting around him, stood at a short distance a tall heron. The party halted; the falconers stepped forwards, and unhooding their birds, which were of the true falco gentilis breed, and shouting aloud, the heron began to mount. "Not too quick, falconers! allow him time for fair sweep!" cried Prince Andrea.—"By our ladye! a noble fellow—ful. five feet between his extremities!" roared the high Constable. The doomed bird, as if aware by instinct of what was going forwards, having gained a sufficient altitude, careered away before the wind. "Fly them!" cried Andrea. In an instant the men slipped the leather pieces from the legs of their falcons, and onward like lightning darted the impatient birds. The heron wheeled around to ascertain in what direction his enemies were approaching; but the well-trained falcons soared high above him, and "waiting on," prepared to "stoop." Down came one like a shooting star, aiming at the head of the huge quarry; but the wary heron eluded the stroke by suddenly turning his long neck under his wing. Another followed up the attack, but here the old marsh-bird had the advantage, for, raising his sharp beak as his enemy stooped, he pierced him through the bosom, and the falcon, with a sharp cry, fell lifeless to the ground. "Perdition on the fellow!" cried Andrea; "he has killed my favourite Leda."

The following is a fair specimen of the reflections :—

Brightly, majestically, the sun wheeled from the Levantine wave; the diamond dew glittered upon leaf and flower; and, in the olive groves, the birds sang jubilee. Morning! what hour is like unto thine? thou scatterest from thy wing freshness and fragrance: thou revivest all nature from the death of night. —Shall not a morning also come for the soul of man? Must he, when the day-star of life is set, for ever lie in his dark and narrow cell? No, for some high purpose, known only to the infinite Mind, are we created; and not for the few brief hours of pain and sorrow which we pass in a perishing world. This our mortal existence must share the fate of you bodiless vapour that skirts the horizon—melt away, as if it had never been.—Yet, man! doubt not—tremble not—all nature, from the reviving flower in the valley, to the sun flushing over the mountain-top, cries aloud, "Thus shall spring thy unquenchable spirit; and thus shall a morn of immortality burst upon the night of the tomb!"

LITERATURE.

MILTON'S POETICAL WORKS, WITH A MEMOIR, BY JAMES MONTGOMERY, and One Hundred and Twenty Engravings. Two vols. 8vo. Tilt and Bogue.

This is the most splendid and sumptuous edition of Milton ever published. It reflects the highest honour on the taste and enterprise of the spirited publishers that they should have presented to the public in so becoming a garb the immortal poems of "the old man eloquent." The greatest talent has been brought to bear on the illustration of these imperishable efforts of genius, in whose praise men of all nations, creeds, ranks, and characters have so often poured themselves forth, that nothing now remains but the duty of reverential homage and admiration, hardly stopping short on this side of idolatry. Much, however, is to be learned from the eloquent memoir which is prefixed from the pen of James Montgomery, himself a great poet. It is always interesting to learn the views of one eminent man on the life or writings of another; and this interest is greatly heightened in the present instance by the fact that in the personal characters of Milton and Montgomery there are many strong points of resemblance. Lofty principle, unshaken integrity, and

A love of right, a scorn of wrong,
Of coward and of base, are the attributes of both. The memoir and accompanying criticisms are every way worthy of the high reputation of the gentle-minded and amiable poet. But how shall we speak of the beautiful wood-engravings which ornament the book, so rich and various in their beauty? Perhaps it would be enough to say that Thompson, Williams, Smith, and Linton, are the artists, and that the designs are from the graphic pencil of Harvey. The gorgeous effect of some of them is beyond anything in this style we have witnessed, accustomed as our readers know we are to the wonders of this branch of art, which it forms our pride and gratification to know that we have contributed by our humble efforts to extend and improve. The kindness of the publishers has placed at our disposal several of the choicest gems which adorn the volumes, and we gladly avail ourselves of their courtesy to present them to the wide circle of our readers, who will hail with ourselves a new triumph of our favourite art. Our first engraving is one of an ambitious subject, embodying the grand conception of Milton's arch-fiend, as he sate exalted above his peers at Pandemonium:—

knows not whether most to admire the fearful form of our common mother—the direful reptile, fit dwelling-place for the evil spirit—or the surpassing loveliness of the forest glade. Last comes the onslaught of the lion on the unwary bull, with its ready ambush-place, so well sung by the poet, and so gorgeously delineated by the artist. There is a luscious beauty about the trees and foliage of the deep dell which makes this specimen our favourite. For exquisite delicacy of outline, combined with breadth and richness of general effect, it probably never has been equalled. We shall conclude our present notice of this admirable edition (to which we intend to return) by saying that all admirers of Milton ought, by the immediate purchase of a copy, to testify their sense of the service which the publishers, Messrs. Tilt and Bogue, have rendered by it to art and literature.

INTERMENT and DISINTERMENT; or, a further Exposition of the practices pursued in the Metropolitan places of Sepulture, and the Results as affecting the Health of the Living. By G. A. WALKER, Surgeon. Longman and Co.

The author of this pamphlet has deserved well of his fellow-citizens, and is entitled to thanks, praise, and more substantial rewards, for the valuable services he has rendered to humanity. Although the object at which he aims has not been yet achieved, owing to the sloth and stupidity of the public authorities, whom he is endeavouring to enlighten, there can be no doubt that it will soon be effected. The revolting practice of interring the dead among the living, and converting the densely-peopled city of animated men, the hive of industry and focus of exertion, into a festering necropolis of the dead, cannot be sufficiently reprobated. It is a subject on which one would think argument could only be thrown away; for Mr. Walker's propositions are self-evident, and must commend themselves to any intelligent and unprejudiced mind. Could any one, arriving from a far country—the distant east, the far west, the frozen north, or the torrid south—a stranger to our customs, imagine that a people like the English would tolerate among themselves the existence of so many foul receptacles of disease and pestilence as are presented by the grave-yards, church-vaults, and crypts of every parish church? In those horrid places are engendered the seeds of the plagues which thin and desolate the land, and extend their ravages even to another soil. There the destroying angel seems to have taken up his abode, and to have fixed his shrine. If our readers doubt this, let them peruse Mr. Walker's pamphlet, and there they will see the awful proofs in an accumulation of numberless facts which cannot be gainsayed. It is a loathsome subject, and our friends would not forgive us for entering into details in the pages of the NEWS. Not Mezentius himself, that tyrant of ancient times, whom the imagination of the Latin poet represented as having devised the most frightful of tormenta—ever practised a more cruel or disgusting enormity than is to be found in the custom which exists under our own eyes, by which the corrupted remains of the dead are brought into contiguity, and almost into contact, with the quick who breathe and move in the crowded streets of the metropolis. The custom prevails in England to a greater extent than in any other European country, and, if we would not presently make ourselves a byword, we must wipe out this stain on the boasted civilization of the age.

Our own attention has been more particularly drawn to the vile practice of which we are speaking, and its pernicious effects, by the scenes we have witnessed in the churchyard of St. Clement's Danes, in the very centre of the busiest thoroughfare of the town, through which pours the full tide of London population, and before the very windows of our own office. We shall not shock our readers by detailing the particulars of the process of disinterment, and the fresh interment in the same grave of persons who have recently died, with its horrid adjuncts of the exposure of corpses, and those mouldering remains of mortality which decency requires to be concealed with an impenetrable veil, and on which the mind refuses to dwell. But what can equal the blindness and criminality (for it deserves no better phrase) of those with whom rests the power of permitting or preventing this practice? We speak of those authorities, whether clerical or parochial, who are the constituted guardians of public health and morals, and who yet sanction a usage which breeds and propagates disease, and outrages every feeling of decency. This too, in the most populous district of the great metropolis of the British empire! Shame upon them, we say, for they are traitors to their trust, and dumb dogs in Israel, so long as they allow it to continue. For what do they draw their ample salaries, and make their purses heavy with the money of the people, if they will not stir a finger to help them in ridding themselves of a proved nuisance? We will not suffer ourselves to be drawn, even by the feeling of just indignation we at present experience, into any language disrespectful to constituted authorities, but they may rest satisfied that if they do not listen to the wishes of the public on this subject, people will ere long begin to ask themselves what they are about, and to talk of "setting their houses in order." If the practice of interment in churches and grave-yards in towns is not discontinued, it will speedily become so intolerable that there will be a general outcry against burials, burial fees, and the other abuses connected with it. Many great men have been of opinion that the cremation, or burning of the dead, which prevailed among the ancients, would be a usage more consonant both to true views of philosophy and the spirit of Christianity.

Mr. Walker is entitled to the greatest credit for the labour, zeal, and ability he has brought to bear on this subject. He was, we believe, the first to awaken and direct public attention to the evils resulting from the practice against which he has so well written. The following extract is a good summary of his views, but for the mass of facts and arguments by which they are supported, his publication itself must be consulted:

Let any one look with an unprejudiced eye at the actual state of the metropolitan burying-places, densely surrounded, as they too generally are, with a swarming living population. Let him examine the vaults crowded with dead, over which frequently, divided by a thin covering, he must sit during divine service. Let him reflect that in the body and aisles of many churches and chapels graves and vaults are employed for the interment of the previous living worshippers, and that the occasional opening of such vaults, charged with deadly products, has produced serious, and even fatal, disease. Let him further reflect, that the entire practice is left to the management of the lowest class of the community, whose brutal foolhardiness is stimulated by drink, and by the consciousness that their lives are worth little to themselves, and less to society. Let him think of these things, and let him ask himself whether alteration of the present system be not imperatively required, and that immediately. The subject is one which has called forth a parliamentary investigation. Certain parties complain that this inquiry has been too partial, and they desire a "re-opening" of the inquiry. Be it so. They have connected me with the previous one. I shrink not from identifying myself with a second; and I hereby pledge myself that I will furnish material for some further disclosures of a most extraordinary character, connected with spots which I am prepared to specify; and as the testimony of grave-diggers does not content them, perhaps the evidence of an entire neighbourhood may.

The more one contemplates the serious injury done to the population of our large towns by our present system of internal sepulture, the more is he lost in wonder that the people, generally sufficiently alive to a perception of what they consider prejudicial to their interest, do not arise en masse, and demand, as an act of justice, and as a matter of right, that many, if not all, these places should cease to be employed. If the necessity of suppressing the nuisance complained of has years since been by others tacitly admitted, how much more necessary is it that, as time progresses, and population continually increases, whilst the burial-places are comparatively decreasing, all who are interested in the well-being of the community should be up and doing. The history of the burial-places, and the modes of burial adopted by the ancients, proves that although they infinitely surpassed us in their veneration for their deceased friends, yet, with a wise prudence, they would not permit the dead to inconvenience the living. Upwards of 3000 years since, the Decemviri prohibited in the following words the burying or burning of any dead body in the city:—

"Hominem mortuum in urbe ne sepelito neve urito."

The notices of several books which have been received must, from the pressure of matter, be deferred.

THE FASHIONS.

Paris, Rue Chaussée d'Antin, Feb. 14, 1843.

Mon cher Monsieur,—The reign of pleasure and gaiety still continues here, and causes such innumerable shades and changes in our fashions that it becomes somewhat difficult to follow or describe them. Let me, in the first place, remark that robes for full dress are made longer every day both in the skirt and the corsage, the latter of which are brought very low down, to a long point in front, and descend equally low at the back, to which they are rounded. These corsages are called à la Marie Antoinette. Some of them are cut out in such a manner that the rounded part, in descending, may retain the gathers of the skirt. In these same corsets, also, the gussets of the bosom are disposed in such a way as to leave the neck much uncovered in front, and, at the same time, they ascend very high at the sides. At one of our late evening parties I remarked two ladies whose dresses seemed to create much sensation: the one of them wore a crêpe robe of bright green, with a triple petticoat, relieved on either side by bouquets of roses, and having the corsage draped in a very tasty manner: the other was dressed in a robe of white tulle, trimmed upon the front of the petticoat with fine garnitures of bouillon de tulle (tulle puffing), through which was passed a rose satin ribbon, and on both sides a little blonde ruling. Both these toilettes were very much admired, and were equally pretty and becoming to the wearers; but the most distinguished and the richest robes now worn are those trimmed with two or three falls of Alençon point lace, placed over mohair or rose-coloured satin, being of a progressive height from the spring of the hips to the hem of the skirt. It will be seen that in this description of dress there are three petticoats of lace worn over them, and when these lace skirts are ornamented on one side by a garland of roses, and a single rose is worn on the head, interlaced in a coiffure of diamonds, I assure you that the tout ensemble is most superb. I should remark that there is a sort of embroidered tulle, which seems to be much worn here, called tulle fontange, which, while it is perfectly transparent, is embroidered with patterns in relief, which gives it an effect which really surpasses the finest lace. I have remarked this tulle employed as a double or triple fall on robes of rose-coloured mohair for ball-dresses and coiffures. There is also a sort of lace, composed of silver and pearls, much used, and which, when placed round a tunic of white crepe, or at the bottom of a double skirt of blue brocade, has a very handsome appearance. At all our balls, and in all our saloons, the fan is perfectly indispensable; but it must be adorned with elegant painting, and must be richly mounted. At the present the Spanish patterns are the rage; and perhaps the most distinguished of these is what is called the Alhambra. Yet I almost doubt whether the French artist has not surpassed his Spanish master in this description of article, as nothing can be imagined more beautiful and tasty than those worn here; and in fact numbers of them are being sent to Madrid itself, where they are said to be quite a passion with the Spanish ladies. Our gloves, as now worn, are really bijoux of their kind: fancy them trimmed with a fringe of gold lace or pearls, with Mosaic tassels, surrounded with corals or cameos. But the fashion in Paris, and which is really the most liked and adopted by the Parisians, is a sort of mittens of embroidered velvet—some of these in black velvet, and embroidered and laced with bugle; others, violet or green, have tassels and borders of gold fringe; some of them, on the other hand, are trimmed with Gothic pattern lace, or with embroidery in silk. Any of these agree extremely well both with the arm and the hand, to both of which they give an extremely pretty form, and do great justice to a white skin. I do not know that I have any very great change to remark in head-dresses; the coiffure Lamballe, described in one of my former letters, still continues to be much worn, with but very slight variations in its form, and it is found to agree extremely well with the masses of hair which are worn in England by ladies. I must, therefore, in default of further novelty, postpone my observations until my next communication. Adieu.

HENRIETTE DE B.

PORTRAIT OF SIR HUGH GOUGH.

Our parliamentary columns contain this day full particulars of one of the most gratifying scenes which a legislative assembly can display—the representatives of a great country offering the thanks of the nation to the leaders of her victorious forces upon the conclusion of a war. Had this compliment been omitted, the gallant services in China would fully entitle those in command to niches in Our Gallery; but the Parliament having delighted to honour them, a second reason is afforded for adding to the portrait illustrations of our paper a sketch which we feel certain must be welcome to our readers. The British regiments in China, according to the last statement published in the United Service Journal, are the 18th., the 26th., the 40th., the 57th., and the 98th. Our engraving of their gallant commander Sir Hugh Gough, for which alone we can find space at present, we may speak of with confidence as regards the likeness; the original being carved in ivory, and remarkable for its fidelity. The events of the Chinese campaign are too recent to require recapitulation beyond that which the Secretary for the Colonies, Lord Stanley, thought fit to introduce in the House of Commons on Tuesday last; a summary of which will be found in our parliamentary digest. One portion, however, of the noble lord's speech must have space here as giving an eloquent description of the position of the force under the command of the gallant General whose portrait we give. "I turn much more gladly to contemplate the triumphant position in which England and the British forces then stood. A force consisting of 4,500 effective men, under Sir H. Gough; a fleet of 73 sail, including 1 line-of-battle ship, 16 vessels of war of different descriptions, and ten war steamers, had forced their unassisted way, conquering as they went, up this mighty and unknown stream (hear, hear), and penetrated the Yung-tse-Keang, for a distance of 170 miles, to the centre of the Chinese empire. They had achieved the conquest of towns and fortresses mounting in all above 2,000 guns, which they had captured or destroyed. They had subdued cities containing a population varying from one million down to 60,000 or 70,000. (Cheers.) They had continually routed armies four or five, and sometimes ten times their own number; and they had done all this at a great distance from their own resources, and in the heart of an enemy's dominions, half across the globe from their own native country. (Cheers.) They now occupied the proud position of having surmounted all the innumerable toils and difficulties of their warfare, and holding with one hand, in their formidable grasp, the main artery of Chinese commerce—the intersection of China's mightiest river with that great canal which traverses the country, and supplies the upper provinces with the products of the south. (Cheers.) Thus they had China and its commerce at their feet. They had made their dispositions, which circumstances fortunately rendered unnecessary, for the capture of Nankin, which they were ready to storm when Sir H. Gough should give the word. They would have captured the second city of the empire, with a population of 1,500,000 inhabitants. In the course of all these proceedings they had maintained, not only constant and uninterrupted gallantry, but a soldier-like temperance and discipline, which reflected on them a glory of the purest character—on them, and on their leaders, Sir H. Gough and Sir W. Parker; and now at length they enabled her Majesty's plenipotentiary, at the head of a powerful fleet and of a not inconsiderable and highly-disciplined army, to dictate peace on the terms prescribed by his sovereign, and they had obtained this peace on terms of entire equality, at the hands of the Emperor of China. (Cheers.) There may have been operations, sir, in which more blood was shed, or in which a more obstinate resistance was made; but I will venture to say that, for a combination of all the qualities which the circumstances of various services required from all the officers and men of the force, there never was an army which better deserved, as I am confident they will receive, the expression of the thanks and gratitude of this House and of Parliament. (Loud cheers.) The vote of thanks I now propose is in one respect, perhaps, couched in rather an unusual form. It has been usual separately to thank the officers and men of the naval and military service. It is not from any neglect, or omission to consult former precedents, that her Majesty's Government have adopted the form in which they now offer a vote for the thanks of this House to their consideration. It is because, from the commencement to the end of this war, on every occasion, navy and army concurred in the most thorough co-operation; because there was hardly an action in which their combined efforts were not called for, nor one occasion on which the thanks of Parliament could be voted to the one service, where they would not be justly due to the other. (Hear, hear.) And in speaking of the army and the navy, I desire to include in the expression of the public gratitude, and the proposal of the thanks of Parliament, not only the officers and men of the East India Company's military force, but also the officers and men of the Infant navy of the East India Company." Lord Palmerston followed Lord Stanley in speaking upon the question, and the thanks of the House of Commons were awarded as the just reward of the sevices rendered in China. The Duke of Wellington proposed the vote in the House of Lords.

Such as desire more complete particulars we refer to the past numbers of our paper, in which the various operations of the campaign have been fully detailed; and we do so with the more satisfaction, since we seized the opportunity afforded by the passage of our forces into this hitherto mysterious country to obtain and present in our pages a series of illustrations of the cities, the arts, the arms, and the inhabitants of China.

TABLEAU FROM THE "LADY OF THE LAKE."

We here present to our readers a morceau of pictorial grouping from the opera of "The Lady of the Lake," now performing with so much attention and éclat at Covent Garden, with the part of Malcolm beautifully sustained by Mrs. Alfred Shaw, whose portrait may appropriately accompany the tableau. The scene selected is that of the interview between King James and Rhoderick Dhu (played respectively by Mr. Manvers and Mr. Harrison), in which Rhoderick discloses his followers, and avows himself before the King. Rhoderick asks the monarch why he is there without the chieftain's pass? to which the King replies

My pass in danger hangs in my belt.

Rhod.: But wherefore art thou here? Whence thy enmity to Vich Alpine

King: Let the red stone of Holyrood be my answer.

Rhod.: Ha! know'st thou why Rhoderick dares his hate, Heard'st thou the shameful word and blow that provoke it? Answer, coward! Lulled cradled he then if he stood on Highland heath or holy ground.

King: Then his robber-life, wrenching from the ruined Lowlander his herds and harvest.

Rhod.: Those waving fields, those fertile plains, were once the birthright of the Gael. The Saxon reft them from my fathers. Where dwell the race now? See! where rise crag over crag, and fell o'er fell. What can make fertile such rude scenes as these? Nothing but the sword. Rhoderick seeks but for retribution.

King: Enough! twice have I sought Clan Alpine's country in peace, when I return again it shall be as his mortal foe: and never did love-lorn swain sigh for his bridal hour as I to meet this rebel and his band.

Rhod.: Have then thy wish. (Sounds his horn.

The rocks, heather, &c., are filled with armed men.

These are Clan Alpine's warriors true,
And, Saxon, I am Rhoderick Dhu."

It will be seen by our portrait that Mrs. Shaw sustains the character of Malcolm Græme, to which she lends no small grace and fascination, adding a powerful charm of voice to the natural attraction of the young chieftain's part. In our dramatic notices, however, we have recorded our high opinion of Mrs. Shaw's performance in the "Lady of the Lake," and therefore have now simply to present her to our readers in the warrior costume of the Scottish chief.

MRS. ALFRED SHAW.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

The Marquis of Exeter has appointed the Rev. William Webb Ellis, M.A., of Brasenose College, Oxford, Minister of St. George's Chapel, Albemarle-street, Piccadilly, to the rectory of St. Clement's Danes, Strand, vacant by the death of the Rev. W. Gurney, M.A.

CONFIRMATIONS.—His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury has announced his intention of holding a confirmation at the parish church of St. Mary-le-bow, Cheapside, on Friday, April 13. The Bishop of London's annual course of confirmations will take place in May and June.

The Lord Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol has instituted the Rev. Arthur Ramsy Ludlow, M.A., to the rectory of Littleton-on-Severn, in the county of Gloucester, vacant by the death of the Rev. Frederick Luke D'Arville, on the nomination of R. Bourchier Savage, Esq.

The Lord Bishop of Chester has announced his intention of holding a general ordination in the cathedral church of his diocese on Sunday, the 8th inst.

CAMBRIDGE.—The senior wrangler of the present year, Mr. Adams, is the son of a farmer on the estate of J. King Lethbridge, Esq. He received his education at a village school, and was afterwards placed under the tuition of the Rev. Mr. Martin, at Exeter. Eventually he entered St. John's College as a sizar, and by strict attention to the duties imposed on him passed a college career of unusual brilliancy.

The rectory of Augmering, in the diocese of Chichester, has become vacant by the death of the Rev. John Usborne, M.A.

SPORTING INTELLIGENCE.

PRINCE ALBERT'S HARRIERS.—The Prince, during the past week, has hunted twice with his excellent little pack of harriers, in their immediate neighbourhood of Windsor. The pack, which now consists, as usual, very select, comprised, in addition to the Prince and his Royal Highness's suite, the Earl of Rosslyn, Lord Paget, Lord Kimbolton, Captain Hanaster, and about forty of the neighbouring gentry and yeomen, with a sprinkling of metropolitans. After drawing two or three fields on the farm of Mr. Goodwin, near Wraysbury, without success, they shortly afterwards found a fine hare on the adjoining land of Mr. Pullen, which made away for Datchet Common, heading back again to Mr. Pullen's farm, almost to the church, from whence it again doubled back to Horton, crossing the Datchet road, on nearly to Lord Montague's, at Upton Park, to Wraysbury, where it was lost. Another hare was almost immediately afterwards started, which afforded a beautiful half-hour's run over the same line of country traversed by the former one, and was killed close to the village of Horton. Several very awkward ditches and double fences offered themselves in the course of the first run, which the Prince took in his usual excellent style. As the hunting season is now fast approaching its termination, the Prince's harriers will hunt twice a week until its close.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

WOOLWICH.—The Rhadamanthus steam-vessel, Master Commander Thomas Laen, has been ordered to proceed immediately from Woolwich to Plymouth, to take masts and gear from Devonport Dockyard to Pembroke, for the Victoria and Albert steam-vessel, building at the latter place for her Majesty's especial use. The Rhadamanthus will then proceed from Pembroke to Cork to embark the 45th Regiment, and bring that corps round to Portsmouth, previous to the departure of the regiment for the Cape of Good Hope.

Captain Sir Thomas Fellowes, C.B., has been appointed Superintendent of the Victualling Department at Plymouth, in the room of Captain Coode, whose period of service has expired.

The Commander-in-Chief has recommended to her Majesty that a colonel be added to the establishment of the 3rd West India Regiment; the Duke of Wellington has accordingly selected for that honour Lieut.-General Sir Charles William Maxwell, K.C.H.

Lieut.-General Master has applied to be relieved from the command of the Windward and Leeward Islands, and his request having been acceded to, he is to be replaced by Lieut.-General Middlemore.

We understand that the 26th Regiment has, by a strange mistake, been ordered from China to England, instead of the 55th; and though counter-orders have been sent by the Overland mail, it is generally thought that the 26th will have sailed, agreeably to the orders which were sent with the ratification of the treaty, before the counter-order can reach China. The 55th left England in 1821, the 26th in 1828.

On the 31st ult. the sight-seeing folks of Malta had an opportunity of witnessing a spectacle as magnificent as, happily, it is rare, at least in Malta—namely, the heaving down of her Majesty's ship Formidable, of 84 guns. A little before nine Sir Edward Owen commenced operations in the dockyard, and the operations immediately commenced. It seemed as the attack of myriads of pigmies to force a huge giant to yield to their united power, upwards of 900 men being employed in the operation. For an incredibly short space of time she yielded to their power, and gracefully fell into the desired position.

Early on the morning of the 3rd instant the Maltese ship Tagliaferro, belonging to Emmanuel Tagliaferro and Sons, was discovered to be on fire by the captain of the brig Flora, who immediately reported it to the flag-ship, when a signal was made for boats to be sent from the ships of war in port. This was responded to with the most praiseworthy diligence, and the fire was soon extinguished by getting engines to play upon it, and partially sinking her. The origin of the fire has not been ascertained. She was surrounded by vessels of all nations, and close to several building-yards, which renders the early discovery of the fire a fortunate circumstance. The crews of the ships-of-war worked nobly, but we regret to notice that some few got hold of a cask of wine and some bad spirits, which they indulged in so freely as to cause the death of one seaman belonging to the Monarch, and one or two others are seriously ill from the like intemperance. It is supposed that they must have also drank of some bottles of spirits of turpentine!

NAVAL INTELLIGENCE AND MOVEMENTS.—On the 20th the Geyser arrived from the Piræus, and on the 3rd instant she was unexpectedly despatched to Messina for the purpose, it is reported, of conveying from thence to Corfu the lady and daughter of Sir Hugh Hon. Seymour M'Kenzie, late lord high commissioner of the Ionian Islands. She has orders to return forthwith, and will then probably be sent to Barcelona; for which port the Lizard took her departure on the 1st. If matters are quiet there, she is to proceed to Gibraltar, but, if otherwise (which is the more likely, for the French are said to be sending thither Admiral Hugon, in the Ocean, ship of the line, and several armaments), she is to return to Malta with the intelligence. The Resistance, troop-ship, which reached Corfu within 48 hours' sail from Malta, has landed the 19th, and left again for Jamaica with the 77th Regiment. The Boyne, transport, with a battalion of the 42nd Highlanders, is hourly looked for from Corfu, to relieve the Rifles, which regiment will be conveyed to Corfu in the Boyne. The Rodney is said to have been ordered to England from Lisbon, whither the Inconstant is to repair from Barce one, if everything is tranquil at this latter port. The Indus, from Vouria; L'Aigle, from Corfu; the Locust, from Constantinople; and the Acheron, steamer, and Pestonjee Bomanjee, transport, from England, are daily looked for at Malta.

DISTRIBUTION OF THE MEDITERRANEAN FLEET.—In harbour, the Queen, 110, bearing the flag of Vice-Admiral Sir E. W. C. R. Owen, commander-in-chief in the Mediterranean; the Ceylon, receiving-ship, bearing the flag of Rear-Admiral Sir John Louis, superintendent of Malta dockyard; Impregnable, 104; Formidable, 84; Monarch, 84; Vengeance, 84; Snake, 16; Beacon and Magpie, surveying vessels; Devastation and Hecate, war steamers; and Polyphemus, steam-packet. At Lisbon, the Rodney, 92. At Gibraltar, the Belvidera, 36; Savage, 10; and Owen Glendower, convict-ship. At Barcelona, the Inconstant, 36; and Lizard, steam-tender. At Marseilles, the Prometheus, steam-packet. At Corfu, L'Aigle, 24; Scout, 18, and Arco, steam-vessel. At Malta, the Queen, with a battalion of the 42nd Highlanders, is hourly looked for from Corfu, to relieve the Rifles, which regiment will be conveyed to Corfu in the Boyne. SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

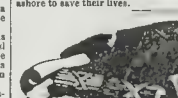
A letter from Brest states that the five steam-frigates which are intended for the Transatlantic navigation between France and the United States are ready for sea, and will commence service in the spring.

DREADFUL SHIPWRECK.—ALL HANDS LOST.—Intelligence has just reached us of the loss of the schooner Rob Roy, of Leith, which sailed from Sunderland a few days ago. This unfortunate circumstance occurred on Wednesday morning week, at two o'clock, on Newbiggen Rocks, near Blyth. The details are dreadful. The cries of the crew were heard amid the roaring of the storm; and on persons going down to the beach, the vessel with her unfortunate crew was discerned in the utmost distress. The vessel went to pieces immediately, and a female was seen among the surf with her hand stretched out for aid, waving a glove as a signal for assistance; but no human efforts could help her, and the back sweep of the sea carried her away. The rest of the crew were all drowned. Two of the bodies have been washed ashore; and a second female, and other two bodies, tog together with two silver spoons, have also washed up. It is supposed that the crew had been exhausted and worn out, and had run the vessel ashore to save their lives.



LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH, TUESDAY.

(Sittings before Mr. Justice Wightman and a Special Jury.)

PALMER'S LESSEE V. SANDERSON.

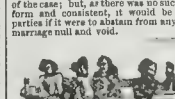
This was an action for ejectment brought for an alleged forfeiture. The plaintiff had leased out to another person, who had assigned to the defendant certain premises in Seymour-street, Euston-square, and the defendant had used them in his business of a melter and tallow-chandler. The lease contained the usual covenants against the use of the premises in any noxious business, and the defendant had, on taking the assignment, bound himself to observe the covenants of the lease, one of which was that the business of "a melting tallow-chandler" should not be carried on upon the premises. The alleged forfeiture was, that he had carried on the business of a candle-maker, and had thereby created a nuisance to the neighbourhood. Several witnesses, some of whom were neighbours of the defendant, were called to prove the sort of business carried on by the defendant, and the powerful, disagreeable, and unwholesome stench that arose from it. On the part of the defendant, other witnesses, also neighbours, were called, who deposed that the defendant's business, from the way in which it was carried on, never occasioned any inconvenience to them. Persons in his employ were also sent into the witness box, and they stated that he did not melt fat or tallow, but made up his candles from tallow obtained from a melter, which he then "dissolved" on the premises. Persons in the trade were called to prove that there was a very material distinction between the trade of making candles from tallow obtained from a melter, and that of rack, and those from fat melted on the premises. They said that the defendant was a tallow-chandler only, and not a melter. They admitted that fat-melting was sometimes disagreeable, but that the business of a tallow-chandler was extremely sweet and pleasant; and one of them declared that he would far rather be in a candle manufactory than in the court. Others went still further, and said that fat-melting was not a nuisance, and that St. Paul's Churchyard never had a disagreeable smell in it from that cause; in which, however, they were not quite supported by the testimony of Mr. Davies, one among their number, and who described himself as the largest candle-maker in London. Mr. Justice Wightman having summed up, the jury retired to consider the verdict, and ultimately returned a verdict for the defendant.

CONSISTORY COURT, WEDNESDAY.

(Before Dr. Lushington.)

TIMMS BY HIS COMMITTEE V. WILLIAMS, FALSELY CALLING HERSELF FINNE.

This was a suit of nullity of marriage on the ground of the insanity of the husband. The facts were not entered into. Dr. Lushington said there could be no doubt of the fact that the gentleman was of unsound mind at the time of the marriage, namely, in 1839. If there had been any conflict of evidence the court would have felt it its duty to enter minutely into the facts of the case; but, as there was no such conflict, and as the evidence was uniform and consistent, it would be more consonant to the feelings of the parties if it were to abstain from any comment, and simply to pronounce the marriage null and void.



POLICE.

MANSION HOUSE.—"TAKING IT ON."—A well-dressed man, of plausible address, named George Hewit, alias Hunter, was, in the mayoralty of Sir John Pirie, charged upon suspicion of having robbed chambers in Bishopsgate-street, but was discharged in consequence of the character given of him by a person named Mansion House, who said that he had left business in the commission line, and was possessed of private property, was put to the bar on a charge of felony. The prisoner, whose appearance was that of a man of fashion, endeavoured to hide his face, but was immediately recognised. Mrs. Jane Kohn, wife of Mr. Kohn, of No. 16, Lawrence-Pountney-lane, stated that she and her husband occupied the first floor of the house, and, on the day mentioned in the indictment, at two o'clock, she heard a creaking of the bedroom door, and, upon going to the room, she saw the prisoner, whom she had never seen before, putting her husband's coat on. He immediately ran by her, and, as she tried to grasp him, threw his stick at her, and ran out of the house. She followed, calling as loud as she could, "Stop thief," and the prisoner was soon apprehended. —The prisoner was committed for trial.

MARRIAGE BY PROXY.—A young man, named John Lyon, was charged with having thrown stones at the windows of a Mr. Moses. The complainant said the defendant laboured under the most extraordinary delusion, and fancied that the city magistrates alone were able to solve the difficulty on which he described himself as having been placed. He supposed that he had been married by proxy to a young lady of the name of Caroline Harris, who had been dead seven last six years, and he prowled about London in quest of his imaginary bride. It was in vain that he was informed of the absurdity of the supposition, and that the SILVER SUPERSEDED, and those corrosive and injurious Salts of Lead, Steel, and German Silver, superseded by the introduction of a new and perfectly matchless ALBATA PLATE. C. WATSON (late Aldridge and Watson), Burlington, called by a person of science in the amalgamation of metals, has succeeded in bringing to public notice the most beautiful article ever yet offered. In appearance and richness of silver in appearance, with all its durability and hardness, with its perfect sweetness in use, not wearing as it does in the old chemical process, by which all that is precious in inland metals is entirely extracted, resisting all acids, may be cleaned as silver, and is manufactured into every article for the table and sideboard.

C. Watson begs to state with confidence, that this metal will not change by hot cow, and that silver is not more different from gold than his metal is from all others; the public will therefore be the best Portunity in removing the nuisance which has been the virulent attacks made against him by a party who is daily suffering from the unparalleled success which has marked the progress of his New Plate since its introduction. C. W., unlike this party, courts examination, feeling confident that the result will establish its superiority.—Entire services of plate purchased.—41, and 42, Burlington, and at 8, Norton Folgate.

THE CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS—No. XXVII.

HIGHGATE NEW CHURCH.

The suburbs of London are in themselves pleasant beyond those of many other cities, and gain additional grace and deserve higher praise from contrast with the dense mass of men and buildings they encircle. To rush from the steaming streets—from the jostle and throng of the hurrying thoroughfare, from the hot and sickly odour of the human mass which makes up London—to the pure, elastic, and health-giving breath of Highgate-hill, is a pleasure which those only can appreciate who have enjoyed it. The senses are all sharpened by the change. Visions of old Izaak Walton, with his quaint pictures of rural life, flout over the memory—never birds sang more blithely, never did wild hedge-plant or field-daisy give to poet or to painter more perfect pleasure than now they render, all quiet and unobtrusively, to the smoke-dried searcher for fresh air and the picturesque. The "great wen," as Cobbett loved to call it, is left, not only behind, but beneath; lying in the valley, enshrouded in its own murky cloud, and stretched out, a spectacle such as the world cannot equal—which the moralist and philosopher never tire of as a theme pregnant of thought and overflowing in abundance of association. The eye scans its domes and spires and warehouses, with, afar off, the queenly river—"the silent highway" threading its course by the royal towers of Greenwich to the sea; and the recollection of the smoke and din and vice and misery and bodily toil and mental anxiety makes the heart leap again in the consciousness of surrounding influences, and the lungs of the disgust thirstily drink up another fill of the pure oxygen, as, in heart gladness, he exclaims, "God made the country, and man made the town."

And, as the hill-top is gained, what a goodly grove of noble elms—and the old gate-house is near and, not far off, stands Cromwell House, pointed to as once the abode of the Protector and near by another spot, where dwelt a bold and pure spirit, at whom England may well be proud—old Andrew Marvell. Nor are its admirers and residents all bygones. Goldsmith knew and loved and immortalized the spot; and in his steps came Washington Irving and his crayon sketches, overflowing with perfect perceptions and appreciation of English feeling—and Leigh Hunt—and Charles Knight, whose "Shakspere" will help him to a humble, yet honourable niche in the temple which the genius of the dramatist has reared for all time—and, last and greatest, COLERIDGE, whose tomb forms the centre-spot of interest in the church.

Johnson has dilated upon the general want of striking events in the lives of literary men, and the observation has been echoed and re-echoed again and again. But to the philosopher, no less than the casual reader, the career of Coleridge affords much matter of thoughtful interest. His early metaphysical studies—his enlistment—his acquaintance with Southey and Lovell their wild impracticable plan of a Pantisocracy, broken off by a simultaneous attachment on the part of the three enthusiasts for three sisters, with the subsequent marriage—his German studies, his literary peculiarities and conversational immensity, render Coleridge's biography one of the most interesting of our time. Leaving the lakes (the neighbourhood of Southey and birth-place of "Christabel") he took up his abode near the spot where, after nineteen years' sojourn, his bones are now deposited. "He breathed his last on Friday, 15th July, 1834, and was interred in the vault of Highgate Church, on the 2nd August. The fatal change was sudden and decisive; and six days before his death he knew, assuredly, that his hour was come. His few worldly affairs had been long settled, and, after many tender adieus, he expressed a wish that he might be as little interrupted as possible. His sufferings were severe and constant till within thirty-six hours of his end; but they had no power to affect the deep tranquillity of his mind, or the wonted sweetness of his address. His prayer from the beginning was that God would not withdraw his spirit; and that by the way in which he would bear the last struggle he might be able to evince the sincerity of his faith.

It was a saying of Wordsworth that many men of this age had done wonderful things, as Davy, Scott, and Cuvier; but that Coleridge was the only wonderful man he ever knew. Something, of course, must be allowed in this, as in all other such cases, for the antithesis; but that the greater part of those who occasionally visited Coleridge left him with a feeling akin to the same judgment. They admired the man more than his works, or they forgot the works in the absorbing impression made by the living author. And no wonder. Those who remember him in his more vigorous days can bear testimony to the peculiarity and transcendant power of his conversational eloquence. It was unlike anything that could be heard elsewhere; the kind, the manner, were different. The boundless information, and the everlasting music of his tones,—all went to make up the image and to constitute the living presence of the man. When no longer young, and bodily infirmities pressed heavily upon him, his natural force was indeed abated; but his eye was not dim, neither was his mind enfeebled. "O youth!" he says in one of the most exquisitely finished of his later poem—

"O youth! for years so many and so sweet,
'Tis known that thou and I were one,
I'll think it but a fond conceit—
It cannot be that thou art gone:
Thy vesper-bell hath not yet tolled:
And thou wert aye a masker bold!
What strange disguise hast now put on,
To make believe that thou art gone?
I see these locks in silvery slips,
This drooping gait, this altered size:
But springtide blossoms on thy lips,
And tears take sunshine from thine eyes:
Life is but thought: so think I will
That youth and I are house-mates still."

And Coleridge wrote his own epitaph:

Stop, Christian passer-by: Stop, child of God,
And read, with gentle breast. Beneath this sod
A poet lies, or that which once seemed he.
O, lift a thought in prayer for S. T. C.—
That he who many a year with toil of breath
Found death in life, may here find life in death.
Mercy for praise—to be forgiven for fame
He asked, and hoped, through Christ. Do thou the same.

It was, however, thought inapplicable to the place in which he was buried, and the handsome tablet, erected in Highgate New Church bears another inscription.

Our engraving displays the style of the church—the situation in which it stands is worthy the picturesque proportions of the building. On the brow of the hill it forms an elegant object in the landscape for miles round, whilst immediately beneath it is the cemetery, with its terraced walks, flower-strewed greenswards, and gloomy cedars—

——— the trees of Lebanon,
Wa ch best best the spot where Death has laid
The victims of his power.

Lord John Russell has been indisposed these last few days from the effects of a cold. The noble Lord, we are glad to say, is now better.

It having been determined on by the Secretary at War that a reduction shall take place in that portion of the army, the Infantry of the Line, nearly sixty regiments are to be gradually reduced to their original establishment. An official order has been issued from the Horse Guards to this effect.

SUDDEN DEATH OF THE VICAR OF ST. SEPULCHRE'S CHURCH.—The parish of St. Sepulchre has sustained a severe loss in the death of its truly excellent vicar, the Rev. J. Natt, B.D. It appears that the Rev. gentleman went through his duties at the parish church on Sunday morning, apparently in his usual health, and shortly after five o'clock in the afternoon was found dead in his drawing-room. The deceased was universally respected, and was distinguished for his deep sympathy with the poor and his princely liberality.

WOOD PAVING.—On Tuesday a special meeting of the court of Commissioners of Sewers took place at Guildhall for the purpose of considering the motion, of which Sir Peter Laurie had given notice, with respect to the question of wood paving, on the subject of which, for some time past, so much excitement has been created, and, for the first time, this court was thrown open to the public. Sir Peter Laurie, in a speech of considerable length, moved the following resolution:—"That it is the opinion of the court that the wood pavement in the Poultry is dangerous and inconvenient to the public, and ought to be at once taken up and replaced with granite paving." A long debate ensued, in the course of which great earnestness was exhibited by the various speakers, and some circumstances of a very startling nature were related as facts by gentlemen who described themselves as having been eye-witnesses of them. Mr. Deputy Godson seconded the motion. Mr. R. L. Jones moved the previous question. The previous question was carried, on a division, by a large majority; and at the close of the proceedings Sir Peter Laurie gave notice of his intention to move that the future sittings of the court be open to the public. The court then broke up.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—Fresh up to Mark lane the receipts of English wheat since our last report have been extremely scanty, owing to the unfavourable winds having kept back the vessels laden with grain. Although the show of samples has, in consequence, proved small, the demand for all descriptions of that article has ruled inactive. The finest red and white, however, have sold at prices about equal to those noted on this day se'nnight; but the value of the middling and out-of-condition sorts has had a downward tendency. Very little foreign wheat has been on offer, yet the transactions in that article have been on a very limited scale, at barely, if not declining quotable beneath, late rates. We have had fair arrivals of barley and malt, the value of which has remained unvaried. Good sound oats have gone off at full currencies, but other descriptions have receded about 6d per quarter. Beans, peas, and flour as last noted.

ARRIVALS. English: wheat, 1410; barley, 2190; oats, 1080; and malt, 2270 quarters. Flour, 2980 sacks. Foreign oats, 500 quarters.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 46s to 52s; ditto white, 57s to 59s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 49s to 57s; do. white, 51s to 58; rye, 34s to 38s; grinding barley, 27s to 29s; malting do., 30s to 32s; Chevalier, 32s to 34s; Suffolk and Norfolk malt, 56s to 62s; brown do., 50s to 54s; Kingston and Ware, 56s to 62s; Chevalier, 63s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 23s to 24s; potato do., 25s to 26s; Youghal and Cork, black, 17s to 18s; do. white, 19s to 20s; tick beans, new, 34s to 36s; do. old, 34s to 38s; grey peas, 36s to 38s; maple, 33s to 34s; white, 30s to 35s; boilers, 32s to 37s; per quarter. Town-made flour, 44s to 46s; Suffolk, 38s to 40s; Stockton and Yorkshire, 36s to 38s; per 280 lbs. Foreign—Free wheat, 50s to 58s. In bond.—Barley, 20s; oats, new, 15s to 17s; do. feed, 14s to 16s; beans, 20s to 26s; peas, 23s to 27s; per quarter. Flour, America, 22s to 24s; Baltic 22s per barrel.

The Seed Market.—Clover and canary seeds may be called, from their scarcity, quite as dear, but all other kinds of seeds are nominally unaltered.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed, English, sowing, 48s to 57s; Baltic, crushing, 40s to 45s; Mediterranean and Odessa, 43s to 46s; hempseed, 35s to 46s; per quarter; coriander, 10s to 18s per cwt.; brown mustard seed, 10s to 11s; white do., 10s to 10s 6d; tares, 5s 0d to 5s 9d per bushel; English rapeseed, new, 23l to 23l per 1 of ten quarters. Linseed cakes, English, 10l to 10l 10s; do. foreign, 7l to 7l 10s per 1000; rapeseed cakes, 5l 5s. to 6l per ton.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 47s 5d; barley, 27s 1d; oats, 16s 11d; rye, 30s 1d; beans, 27s 5d; peas, 30s 1d.

Imperial Average of Six Weeks which govern Duty.—Wheat, 48s 1d; Barley, 27s 0d; Oats, 16s 11d; Rye, 29s 7d; Beans, 27s 7d; Peas, 29s 11d per quarter.

Duty on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 20s 0d; Barley, 9s 0d; Oats, 8s 0d; Rye, 11s 6d; Beans, 11s 6d; Peas, 11s 6d.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread are from 7d to 7½d; of household ditto, 6d to 6½d for the 4lb loaf.

Tea.—At the public sales held this week—and at which 90,800 packages have been offered—there has been a fair attendance of the trade. The importers having shown considerable firmness the biddings have been far from active, while only about one-fifth of the quantity has found buyers, at about previous rates. By private contract next to nothing is doing.

Sugar.—All kinds of sugar have gone off slowly since our last report, and we have no variation whatever to notice in their value.

Coffee.—The transactions in this article have been again very limited, and prices have had a downward tendency.

Cocoa.—Little doing, at late rates.

Pimento.—Prices are firm, but without any improvement in the demand.

Saltpetre.—The market rules flat, yet the holders are not disposed to submit to any reduction in prices.

Rum.—We have a quiet sale, yet quotations are rather lower. Sales have been made in Common Leewards at is 6d to is 7d per proof gallon.

Oils.—Several public sales have taken place since our last, and full rates have been realised without difficulty.

Tallow.—The market remains quiet, with sellers of P.Y.C. on the spot at 44s 6d per cwt. Little doing for forward delivery.

Hops.—There has been less demand for hops, yet their rates may be considered about stationary, with a fair supply on offer.

Wool.—Only a moderate arrival of wool has taken place in the port of London; yet the demand is very dull. The public sales are now attracting the attention of the staplers.

Potatoes.—We have a better sale for potatoes, and prices have advanced, in consequence of the cold weather, from 2s to 3s per ton, the best York reds producing 6l.

Coals.—Chester Main, 15s 9d; Hetton Main, 15s; Old Tanfield, 15s; Tanfield Moor, 17s 9d; West Wylam, 15s 6d; Hetton, 20s 3d; Stewart's, 20s; Lambton, 20s; Caradoc, 20s 3d; Adelaide, 19s 6d; Hartley, 15s 6d per ton.

Smithfield.—Each kind of fat stock has been in moderate supply and steady demand this week, at an advance of 2d per 8 lbs. Beef from 3s 2d to 4s 4d; mutton, 3s 4d to 4s 6d; veal, 4s 2d to 5s 6d; and pork, 3s 4d to 4s 6d per 8 lbs., to sink the offal. No foreign beasts or sheep have been on sale.

Newgate and Leadenhall.—Owing to the limited arrivals of country slaughtered meat, a firm inquiry has been experienced this week, at the following quotations:—Beef from 3s 2d to 3s 8d; mutton, 3s 4d to 4s; veal, 3s 10d to 5s; and pork, 3s 2d to 4s 2d per 8 lbs. by the carcass.

ROBERT HERBERT.

COMMERCE AND MONEY.

The information which we have received from the manufacturing and mining districts since our last publication, is less satisfactory than it has been since the turn of the year. In the iron trade much depression prevails, and the few sales which can be effected are at prices very considerably under the cost of the production. Unless some demand spring up soon somewhere or other, therefore, we fear much that many of the miners must be again either thrown out of employment or their wages be materially reduced, even under the late rates. The stocks on hand are large, and they must be reduced previous to the restoration of soundness in this great and important branch of our internal industry. In Manchester the operatives are still fairly employed in the cotton trade, at wages adequate to the present [illegible] depressed [illegible] [illegible] necessary for the consumption, and, although the sales made of it during this week have been quite as large as they have been in any week since the turn of the year, still prices are unfavourable to the dealer, and are thus enabling the manufacturers to produce their goods at lower rates than would have been possible under different circumstances.

The intelligence received from Glasgow, and, indeed, from all the cotton manufacturing places, coincides not too closely with that from Manchester, all of them attributing the unlooked for depression in trade at this time of the year to the great decrease in the home consumption of goods, when compared with that of former seasons, to which they are now subjected. From Leeds and the woollen districts the news of this week is likewise not, on the whole, satisfactory. For the fine qualities of woollen cloth the demand was then exceedingly dull, occasioned entirely by the diminished consumption in the home markets but for the coarser descriptions there was a fair demand in all the leading manufacturing prices, and one good sign of the times, at all events, is visible in this trade, for the demand for sheep's wool is quite equal to the supply, and its prices consequently have been well maintained, from which it may fairly be inferred, that more prosperous times are expected by the purchasers. Colonial products have not improved in value during this week.

In East India products a good deal of business continues to be done, and prices, generally, during this week, have been fairly supported. An unusually large quantity of tea was brought forward by public sale on Tuesday last, and as the trade generally was short of stock, buyers were numerous on that and on the succeeding days of sale. A good deal was sold to consumers, and prices generally being considered low, a decline of only one farthing per lb. was submitted to by the sellers from the prices obtained at the previous public sale, but the prices by private bargain since that sale have been fairly supported at the present time. In the drug market, and more particularly in opium, little animation has been observed this week. The operations in the latter article are wanting the sanie of the Chinese tariff of duty. Indigo, and all descriptions of dyeing substance in demand, and in private contracts their late values is fully supported.

In the money market the complaint of want of profitable employment for capital is rife on the increase than otherwise, and it certainly is rather paradoxical that this should be the case at a period when large masses of the people are in want of work. To invest money on Government securities at present does not yield an income equal to the risk of the loss of capital which may occur by a fall in their present value. The demand for Consols, therefore, has not been so large this week as it was during the many throws on the market for sale, and scarcely any variation has therefore occurred in their prices during this week, 3½ to 85 having been the two extreme quotations made of their value. Exchequer bills carry the purchaser without the payment of a premium of from 63s to 67s., and therefore to invest money in these securities yields but a very paltry annual income. Of commercial and bankers' accommodations, the same state is to be met for discounts as at present is exceedingly small, that, to cash those of real character, an interest of from 2 to 4 per cent. per annum is only required. This has been the case now for many months in the money market, and no amendment whatever in the demand for money for these purposes can be noted during the week. The rates of the foreign exchanges are still in favour of this country, and specie continues to be extensively imported.

In the share market the transactions during this week have been unimportant, and no marked alteration has occurred in the value of any description of railway shares, with the exception of Brighton shares, which are gradually recovering from the depressions to which they are usually subjected [illegible]

DISCUSSIONS IN THE LEGISLATURE.

JOURNALISTS have ever held it a duty to watch carefully and critically the progress of all legislative discussions which lead to the record of national opinion upon the acts of public men, or to the enactment of laws that affect the spirit of the constitution and the happiness of the people. A sense of this duty, strongly impressed upon our conviction, impels us to turn the attention of our readers upon the recent debates, which have stirred the active spirit of party in the House of Commons, and wakened men's energies to the consideration of important topics of public discussion. And, as the order of the themes is of less consequence than their matter and substance, we may, perhaps, be permitted to inverse the rotation of the debates, and to commence with that upon the character of judicial charges on civil or criminal trials, which occupied the attention of Parliament on Tuesday night.

The motion upon which this important discussion was founded originated with Mr. Thomas Duncombe, and proposed an inquiring into the charges made against Lord Abinger by politicians and the press, for his addresses to jurics on the special commission at the trials which arose out of the riots in the manufacturing districts. The motion was brought forward with great spirit, discussed with much animation, and finally rejected, on a division, by a large majority. We may be thought inconsistent and, perhaps, enigmatical in our declaration, that we approve of the motion (that is, of the fact of its being made), we approve of the debate which sprang out of it, and we approve very heartily of its rejection. Let us briefly state our reasons for taking this course.

We remember well, on the occasion of the trials for sedition, being particularly struck with the lucid, moderate, and beautiful charge of Chief Justice Tindal to the juries of his district; and, on the other hand, having occasion to express a strong and emphatic dissatisfaction at one made on the same occasion, though in another quarter, by Lord Abinger, which took, in our humble judgment, a tone of intemperance, dictation, and political feeling, little compatible in spirit with the mild, beneficent, and exhortative oratory which should adorn and dignify the bench of justice, and shed the light of security upon the liberties of the land. We confess that, viewing that particular charge most impartially, and even with the supposition that our own opinions upon public affairs were coincident with those of the noble lord, we must still have considered it as decidedly and unnecessarily political—as an essay upon public affairs, rather than a luminous and gentle exposition of the subject of the most responsible inquiry in which the jurors had to engage; and this opinion we expressed with fearless conviction upon one of the leading pages of this work.

We still hold to our opinion. We conceive Lord Abinger, with the utmost respect for his great abilities, to be a warm partisan, and one who, in his zeal for the maintenance of the constitution, may think himself justified, as his son intimated, in using his elevated position to invest it with a political as well as a judicial strength; but we refuse to go with him this length. We think, too, that, despite of the retained freshness and virility of his mental powers, age and a constant infliction of irritating bodily pain (with which the friends and foes of the learned judge should sincerely sympathise alike) probably beget a fretfulness which Lord Abinger no doubt struggles against with fortitude, but which no man could entirely overcome, and that this fretfulness diminishes, if it does not destroy, the dignified toleration and amenity of temper which ought to be essential to the judicial character. On the other hand, society is naturally unwilling to lose the services of an eminent and capable man on account of physical infirmities or afflictions, which are not blemishes of the heart. We therefore waive the point of inefficiency on such a score, and return to that of "political colouring to judicial charges," which certainly involves a culpability deserving of grave disapprobation—deserving of some proper rebuke by public opinion, showing that men do not pass such offences lightly over—deserving, in a word, of just such moderate condemnation as it has received—deserving, not that such a motion as Mr. Duncombe's should be carried, but that such a motion should be made, to enable public men to record their impressions, for the benefit of society, of the accusers, and of the accused. But censure should not be carried or implied farther than this, except in cases of much more flagrant wrong. The function of the judge is one of the most beautiful, sacred, and independent of any that derive power from the English constitution. Monarchs, parliaments, and people should regard it with reverence, and approach it only in a delicate and respectful spirit—and, save when it is absolutely outraged in the persons of those who perform it, it should be neither scorned, nor scourged, nor assailed with a vindictive rebuke. We therefore rejoice that the voice of Parliament did not proclaim more censure against Lord Abinger than the mere permission to discuss his conduct has fairly and moderately implied.

With regard to the debate itself we approve of it on two accounts, first, as having given rise to some fine, virtuous, and manly opinions upon the proper duty and demeanour of a judge in his office—and secondly, as eliciting so large an amount of high and honourable testimony to the learned judge, as must indeed mingle much of most consoling gratification with any mortifying feelings to which the aspersions (and perhaps even a lingering fear approaching to conviction of their justice when applied not to intention but to fact) may have given rise. There was something chivalrous in the eloquent tribute with which Mr. Thesiger concluded his speech:—"He had watched the noble lord's rising course, and had witnessed his meridian splendour. As one of the first advocates of the day, he had exhibited high powers and great qualities, in which none could surpass him; and, when raised to the bench, though by a too late elevation, he won the admiration and respect of all who had watched his conduct, for the devotedness with which he applied all his high powers and vast acquirements to the service of the public in the faithful and unremitting discharge of his duties (cheers); and now, at a period of life at which it was granted to but few to arrive—at a period of life when, in most men, the high intellectual faculties were usually impaired, those of the noble lord were still as strong, as bright, as clear, and as active as they were in his younger days, and were devoted with the same unabated zeal to the service of his country. (Loud cheers.) He would admit that he was jealous with respect to the exalted reputation which the noble lord had so long enjoyed. He was anxious, at this late period of the noble lord's existence, that not the slightest stain should deface a character which through so long a course had remained pure and untarnished, and that after many years more of new services rendered to his country the noble lord should go down to his grave with the same unblemished reputation which he had hitherto enjoyed." (Loud cheers.)

On the other hand there is no denying the premises of Sergeant Murphy, who immediately followed—and who, by comparison greatly justified the inferences we had drawn, and the principles we have been proud to set up. If Lord Abinger was right, Chief Justice Tindal was wrong:

"If the example of Lord Abinger was one which should be adopted, ought not Lord Chief Justice Tindal to have followed the same course? He (Mr. Murphy) had not, until that night, read the charge of Lord Abinger; but he had read the charge of Lord Chief Justice Tindal in his own country, which was not remarkable for the absence of political bias in its judges when there happened to be a convulsion, and he thought that charge a model upon which any judge might well form himself. He (Mr. Murphy) reverenced the judges of the land, and he did so because if any one quality exalted them higher than another it was the absence of all political feeling. (Hear, hear.) This should ever be the character of the bench. They should be utterly divested of all political feeling, and, as was said of the late Chief Justice Tenterden, have no more bias on a question involving sedition than on one relating to a bill of exchange. (Cheers.) That was the true principle. No judge should introduce into his charge anything extraneous to the subject matter of inquiry. To do so was utterly inconsistent with the character of a judge, who in mounting the bench was supposed to lay down every political feeling on the threshold of the temple of justice. (Cheers from the Opposition.)"

We have endeavoured to treat this question with the same temper which we are arguing for from the judicial bench—with justice and without acrimony, and having an anxious regard to all the interests and liberties involved. Perhaps we have by this time brought our readers to our own conclusion—that the motion was useful as one of agitation, the debate excellent as a barometer of opinion, but that to have allowed the subject to have proceeded further would have been neither safe, generous, nor just.

By the way, we must not omit to remark upon the winning demeanour, modest anxiety, temperate address, and affectionate solicitude of Mr. Scarlett, while seeking to defend and vindicate his noble father. It was quite in the most gentlemanly spirit of good taste, and was much applauded by the house.

The other discussions to which we were about to direct the attention of our readers were the votes of thanks to Lord Ellenborough and our commanders in India, and to the five nights' debate upon the distress of the country, which terminated in the defeat of Lord Howick's motion by a majority of a hundred and fifteen! On the first of these topics we have little remark to make as the thanks of Parliament were confined to the military operation, of the India Governor-General and his chiefs, which were unquestionably crowned with glorious and brilliant successes. The second is of too much vital importance to be dismissed hastily at the end of an article, and therefore we shall take a better opportunity of engaging in its discussion. One thing, however, we may say, and that is, that the scene of excitement enacted towards its finale between Mr. Cobden, the Prime Minister, Mr. Roebuck, and indeed by the whole house, was one which everybody anxious to see upheld the honour, temper, and dignity of the British Senate must regard with sorrowful feelings of humiliation and regret. The tumult of the French Deputies, and the bear-garden of American Congress, are surely not subjects for the imitation of a British deliberative assembly.

ASTORIA—OREGON COUNTRY.

The frequent mention of "the occupation and settlement of the territory of Oregon" in the recent American papers, and the claim of the United States, in opposition to the title of Great Britain to the same, will, doubtless, render the physical geography of the district peculiarly attractive to our readers.

The territory lies west of the Rocky Mountains, the vast "provisional boundary" of the United States of North America. It is bounded north by the British and American possessions; south, by the Mexican territories; and west, by the Pacific Ocean. "It extends from 42 deg. to 54 deg. N. lat., and from 107 deg. to 130 deg.

W. long., and contains 300,000 square miles."—(Goodrich's "Universal Geography," Boston, 1832.)

The main ridges of the Rocky Mountains form the eastern boundary of this long-disputed country. Between these ridges and the Pacific is another high and extensive chain of mountains, in which are the great falls of the Columbia river. Still west of these, running parallel with the coast, is the third chain. The peaks of all these heights are above the regions of perpetual snow.

The chief rivers of this region are the Oregon or Columbia, with its numerous large branches, 1000 miles in length. It rises in the Rocky Mountains, at about a mile distant from the source of the Missouri, on the other side, on the west; and, receiving a broad river [illegible] having received the waters of Lewis and Clarke's rivers, it forms a [illegible] and [illegible] breaks through the second chain of mountains: 130 miles below are the Great Falls, where the river descends in one rapid 57 feet; and in passing through the third chain of mountains it is compressed to the width of 150 yards.

It has been said that few countries have a climate more agreeable than this region to the west of the Rocky Mountains. The breezes from the west are softened by traversing an immense extent of sea, and the mountain ridges afford shelter from the cold winds of the north. The Spring is early, though the Winter is rainy, and occasionally severe.

The summits of the mountains are composed of rough rocks, and covered with snow the greater part of the year; but some sheltered and fertile valleys are found between, and the slopes of ridges bordering upon the Oregon and its branches has a fertile soil. The prairies are covered with grass, and spangled with beautiful flowers. There are among the plants two or three roots which the Indians eat with their salmon. Wild sage grows to the size of a small tree, and forms one of the principal articles of fuel. The timber in the mountains is spruce, pine, and fir. The sea-shore for some distance to the interior is covered with forests of pine and hemlock; and many of the trees grow to an enormous height. The prairies, however, must be the most attractive ground. In the Spring of the year they are covered with a profusion of pale pink flowers, rearing their delicate stalks among the rough blades of the wild grass: these are too fragile to withstand the scorching heat of Summer; but they are succeeded by gorgeous flowers of red, yellow, purple, and crimson, sometimes growing singly, and at others spreading in beds of several acres in extent. "Like many beauties in real life, they make up in the glare of their colours what they want in delicacy; they dazzle but at a distance, and will not bear close scrutiny." Throughout this region hill follows hill and hollow succeeds hollow, with the same regularity as the sweeping billows of the ocean. Occasionally a high broken bluff rears its solitary head in the midst, like some lonely sentinel overlooking the country; upon the top of which may frequently be seen an Indian, standing in bold relief against the sky, or seated upon some pleasant spot on its summit, and basking in the sunshine with that lazy air of enjoyment which characterizes the race.

Sometimes the traveller issues from the forest upon a beautiful prairie, spreading out, as far as the eye can reach, an undulating carpet of green, enamelled with flowers, and lit up by the golden rays of the setting sun. Occasionally, a frightened grouse bustles from among the high grass, and flies whirring over the tops of the neighbouring hills; and when the heat of the afternoon has yielded to the cool breezes of sunset, the deer, which, during the scorching mid-day, had nestled among the thickest groves which dot the prairie, begin to steal from their hiding places, and are seen bounding over the greensward, or standing buried up to their heads among the tall flowers, and gazing wildly and fearfully at some exploring party. The Indians often set fire to these prairies, when the flames spread with tremendous rapidity, and are said to present one of the grandest and most terrible spectacles in nature. The fire rushes through the long grass with a noise like thunder; dense clouds of smoke arise, and the sky itself appears almost in flames. So prejudice at one time prevailed against the prairies as not fit for cultivation; but this has been found erroneous, and they are the more in request as it is a most important object to save the labour of clearing away the wood.

The number of Indians of the different tribes in this country is estimated at 140,000. They retain, still unaltered, most of the features of the savage character. They procure food almost solely by hunting; and to surprise a hostile tribe, to massacre them with every exercise of savage cruelty, and to carry off their scalps as trophies, is their highest ambition. To every other behaviour, however, is orderly and peaceable, and whether from fear or friendship, they seldom kill or rob a white man, even when opportunity offers! Considerable attempts have been made to civilize them, and with some success, but the honour of converting the race has not been given to war and hunting they have instantly thrown up every other pursuit, and reverted to their original habits.

The country was first discovered by the Spaniards. In 1794 Captain Gray, of Boston, visited it, and called it Columbia, from the name of his ship. In 1805 Captain Clark descended the river Columbia from the mountains to the Pacific, and spent the winter on its shore. In 1811 a trading establishment was formed by some Americans at Astoria, near the mouth of the Columbia river, where Washington Irving held an official position a few years since, whence he wrote his truthful romance of "Astoria," and drew in its pages the picturesque luxuriance of the district, and the primitive simplicity of the lives of the natives, and their homes in the forest and prairie. Of this settlement we gather from Captain Sir E. Belcher's Narratives of the Voyage of H.M.S. Sulphur," just published, that it has dwindled considerably since the Hudson's Bay Company took charge, who removed their chief establishment to Fort Vancouver, and allowed it to run to utter ruin. A small house, two or three sheds for the Canadians, about six or eight in number, and a pine stick with a red ensign, now constitute Fort George, Astoria. Not a gun or warlike appearance of any kind remains. The scenery is similar to that of all the northern coast—wooded to the water's edge, and differing little except in the varieties of pine. The outline is pleasing, but the snow suffers no coast of "lists for the poetry" in the navigation is cramped, and it is surprising that, with so much capital at stake in shipping, &c., the company should not have brought up a set of pilots.

From the bil. recently introduced into Congress, and the speeches of [illegible] supporters, we gather that the portion of the territory claimed by the United States extends from the 42d to the 49th degree of N. latitude, and from the Pacific Ocean to the American territory east of the Rocky Mountains. This is stated to comprise a fertile region, 700 miles wide at one extremity, and 500 at the other, running through seven degrees of latitude, and embracing nearly 200,000,000 acres of land—"enough to form four or five new states." The anxiety of the Americans to possess this district is that they may thereby have the control of those Indian tribes which infest their western borders; but it is believed that they would rather employ "the occupation" on the offensive than the defensive, by annoying the British possessions on the north. Meanwhile the consideration of the measure has been postponed for a time.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

SPAIN.—The Regent Espartero has issued an address to the Spanish nation with regard to the impending elections, which has been signed by all the Ministers. The angry tone in which the Duke of Victory adverts to the plots, threats, insults, and calumnies he has been subject to since "the present, may serve to dispose all those who really love their country to unite in one common object, and rally round its interests. You have seen with what perfidiously our enemies labour to divide us—in wrong us, so much so, that we are unable for business, and to make us first disgusted with men, and next with political affairs themselves. From this perseverance of our enemies flows the abuse of the press, personal calumny, corruption extending to all parts of society, discord introduced amongst the successful supporters of the revolution of September, so united in important political objects, and yet so strangely and unfortunately opposed to one another in secondary points of order and administration. Hence have arisen those serious events which disturbed the peace of the kingdom during the last two years, and in which the enemies of our institutions have tasked their hatred, and demonstrated to the world the endearingness of their perversity. * * * *

Selecting the wealthy and populous city of Barcelona as the centre and support of their designs, they there established their arsenal of intrigue and perdition; and to that point of rendezvous crowded as auxiliaries the vagabonds of the rest of Europe, the scum of every nation, who, without home, without country, and free from all social ties, became the ready instruments of the guilty hand which directed them. But if in those events the national cause has triumphed over the danger to which it was exposed, not so of the moral effects which these events left behind them. These events have produced between the nation and its representatives a disjunction which appears to day entirely different, and presents another character than that which they wore in the March of 1841, at the opening of the Cortes, which have been just dissolved. Of my manifesto, or solemn declaration, which preceded the convocation of a new Cortes, in which would be placed in evidence the real wishes of the nation with respect to the wants and remedies required by the new position of affairs. Actuated by the spirit, and by the object alone, I made use of that prerogative granted me by the constitution, and, with the advice of the Council of Ministers, I dissolved the Chambers and called new ones. It is therefore necessary to anticipate the elections, and return you consider well whom you name as your deputies, and whether they are worthy of, and competent to, the sacred objects to which their labours will be devoted. I by no means pretend, nor does it belong to me to dictate to you the class of persons, of opinions, or of party, you choose to select for the purposes stated. No, fellow-countrymen, Spaniards, all parties, all opinions, all views, comprended within the limits of the constitution, may be useful to the state. Amongst them are to be found men of wisdom, of public services, and of virtue, who deserve this honour, and in whom you may place your confidence. By my honour I am well respected, and, for the purpose treated of, all equally fit and necessary. That which is of real importance is, that the men selected by you are men of sound judgment, and well informed of the wants and resources of the country—men of known probity, scorning intrigue, inaccessible to corruption, and unassailable by fear. It is not I who require these qualities of your representatives. It is our common country, public opinion, and the necessity of the times we live in. The representatives you are going to choose, recollect, are to be the men who are to prove to the world, that Spaniards are able and know how to govern themselves—that they are the men who have to demonstrate that a nation of fourteen millions of inhabitants, freely constituted, and well organized, has the right, as it has the resolution, to be free and governed by themselves. With regard to me, who, raised to the high post I occupy by the confidence and good-will of the nation and invested with so extensive an authority, I cannot be actuated by the various views and passions which enter into the debates of parliament, and can consequently give you this advice with the most perfect impartiality and good faith. For what do I now seek? My destiny began to be written in the plain of Ferraza; Providence pleased to fix it in the country of Sydenham, on Cornous, and in the office to which I was subsequently raised by the votes of the Cortes at Madrid. I am well aware of the heavy responsibility which presses upon me; but I am resolved never to shrink from it, and confirm it to preserve and consolidate the freedom of our common country, to support unhurt the constitutional throne of Isabel the Second, and to resign at her feet the authority with which I am invested at the hour prescribed by the fundamental law of the state for this purpose. Such are my duties, and so will they be fulfilled. These duties are clear, precise, defined, neither requiring explanation nor interpretation—less still so for me than for any one else—and you may confide in me that they will be accomplished.

Madrid, Feb. 6, 1843. Duke de la VICTORIA, Regent of the Kingdom. (The names of all the Ministers follow.)

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS—MONDAY.

The house met at five o'clock; and, on the order of the day being read, the Duke of WELLINGTON rose to bring forward the motion of which he had given notice for a vote of thanks to the officers, civil and military, and to the commanders, officers, and men employed in the late military operations in Affghanistan. In doing so his grace entered into a succinct historical narrative of the disturbances which preceded the insurrection at Cabul; and traced the subsequent disasters of our army through the disorganisation, and discouragement, and treachery that ensued, until it was reduced to a mere undisciplined mass, they were either destroyed or taken prisoners, with the single exception of Dr. Brydone. He attributed much of the disorganisation and discouragement of the troops to the unfortunate absence at the commencement of the negotiations with the persons who were considered to be at the head of it, and said these disasters were chiefly owing to the wants of provision and transport under which the army laboured. The terms of misfortunes the Government had made an effort to collect troops and to save the garrisons and troops in Jelalabad and other places. The present Governor-General had arrived in the East and assumed the first office on the 15th of March. The junction of Sir R. Sale's forces with those under General Pollock was the first operation accomplished, and the object of the Government then was to withdraw the troops with the least risk of consequence, with ammunition and provisions, and by corresponding constantly with all persons likely to aid or assist him in his objects. He endeavoured to ascertain the time when it would be necessary to withdraw the forces at Candahar, and to make arrangements for their safe retreat, for the troops to return; and the order of the 15th of March clearly indicated that he did not intend they should again embark in the conquest of Affghanistan. On the 18th of March and on the 1st of April Lord Ellenborough had received information of the failure of a detachment to force the Bolan Pass, and when it was determined the army should remain until the general season for operations in the spring should arrive. The public correspondence showed that the opinions of the generals were that it would have been inexpedient to withdraw the troops from Affghanistan until October, and it was on account of these opinions that the Governor-General on the 4th of July, sent "instructions of the handsomest kind" to General Nott, at Candahar "in the handsomest that any officer ever received." General Nott had accepted that command in the most gallant spirit, and had executed his instructions in the most honourable and noble manner. Having placed himself in correspondence with General Pollock, he moved forward, and, on the very valley where the disaster occurred to our troops, he again gained a signal victory, following success after success, until he arrived at Cabul, and on the 16th of September hoisted the English standard on the walls. His lordship then described the operations at Candahar on the same day, destroyed Ghuznee, and thus were our calamities nobly redeemed. The Governor-General had given his first order on the 15th of March, and between that day and the 16th of September that had been effected. The prisoners were rescued. But this was not all. The prisoners who had been in the hands of the enemy had been liberated. By the 25th of September they were all restored to our hands, and in such a way as to do justice to the former Governor-General, but felt bound to say that, in resigning his position, he had done all he could to assist his successor. For the signal services he had mentioned, the noble duke called upon their lordships to accord the vote of thanks he had given notice of. The Earl of AUCKLAND, while he acknowledged with satisfaction that no blame had been cast upon him by the noble duke (Wellington), was anxious to point out what the conduct of the Indian Government had been while he presided over it. The disaster had been unexpected, and though a large force had been destroyed at Cabul, he had been advised that the force that had been more than sufficient for any emergency. He had been even pressed to withdraw a portion of it as unnecessary. He had been placed in an embarrassing position, having resigned in his resignation three or four months before the news of the disaster reached him. When he heard of the insurrection his successor was on the seas, and nothing then remained for him to do but to give him all the assistance he could. He had sent seven regiments, amounting to 7800 men, across the Punjaub, and on hearing of the death of Sir W. M'Naghten he directed an increase of 3000 men to be made to that force. Measures had also been taken to supply General Nott with transports. For the further relief of General Nott, he had directed General Pollock to penetrate the Bolan Pass, and it was by the prosecution of these measures that success had been attained. The noble lord who succeeded him had acted with the greatest ability in supplying the wants of the army. No man could more cordially join in every satisfaction at the glorious results of the military operations under the administration of the Governor-General. The noble lord concluded by moving for the thanks of the noble duke's motion, felt that he could consistently concur in the praise it bestowed. To the means left by his predecessor, Lord Ellenborough had undoubtedly brought all the means necessary for the success of his plans. From peculiar circumstances three at least of the generals had been left to take upon the useless a responsibility which they could not have expected, involving the character and honour of the army. The conduct of General Pollock, Sale, Pollock, and Nott was certainly such as Parliament should acknowledge. The extreme caution of the Governor-General in his despatches was remarkable, but he did not recollect any thing for the purpose of censuring his conduct, but of doing full justice to the services of the military officers. Lord FITZGERALD would be able to show from the documents produced that the extreme caution imputed to Lord Ellenborough did in no instance prevent the advance suggested to the general officers serving under him. Even the despatch in which he directed the withdrawal of the troops held out the hope of future operations, and showed that his object was to seek retribution for the disasters that had occurred. The Marquis of CLANRICARDE did not agree in the great merit attributed by Lord Fitzgerald to the instructions issued on the 15th of March. It did not appear that Lord Ellenborough had made any stipulation for the restoration of prisoners, as he only said it "might become a question."—Lord BROUGHAM would ask, in reference to the words used by the Marquis of Lansdowne, could any caution be too great? The position in which Lord Ellenborough was placed was fearful to contemplate. Something had been said about a proclamation and despatch. He did not approve of the reflection of Lord Ellenborough on the policy of his predecessor, but it was the language of the proclamation that was the cause of offence—a mere question of criticism. He highly approved of the motion, and cordially supported it.—The Bishop of SALISBURY guarded himself from being considered as agreeing with the words used by Lord Brougham with respect to the proclamation about the gates of Somnauth. Should the subject of that proclamation be brought before their Lordships he was sure it would be considered by every one of them a most unhappy accompaniment to these proceedings.—The Bishop of CHICHESTER concurred with his right rev. friend.—Lord BROUGHAM inserted that neither he nor any one else had dreamt of showing any preference to one pagan religion over another in defending the words of this proclamation. Notwithstanding the miserable clatter raised about this proclamation, he understood it was one that never was used in it could not be forced into any such construction. The Earl of MINTO rose to save himself from being supposed to express more than his satisfaction at the ability and judgment with which Lord Ellenborough had conducted the resources of the empire, in a of the operations begun by his predecessor. This was, in his opinion, an unprecedented motion, for he was not aware of the thanks of Parliament having been previously voted to a governor of his house on Thursday, to consider the act relating to the dioceses of St. Asaph and Bangor.—Mr. V. SMITH gave notice to move, on the 28th inst., for a copy of Lord Ellenborough's proclamation respecting the restoration of the gates of Somnauth, to which Sir R. Peel said there should be no objection.—Mr. T. DUNCOMBE gave notice to summon witnesses to the bar of the house for the purpose of ascertaining the nature of the evidence given by Lord Chief Justice Abinger to the juries on certain trials at Chester in autumn last. In reply to a question put by Mr. Roebuck to the noble Secretary for Ireland, respecting an intimation given by the noble lord in the discussion of a Temperance Society in Dungannon, Lord ELIOT said that, apprehensions having been entertained of a party conflict, they had thought proper to prevent it; and effectually preserved the peace by so doing.—In reply to Mr. Ewart, Sir R. PEEL said that he was not inclined to think that any commercial negotiations on the part of this country with Paraguay were in a favorable state.

In reply to Mr. Fergand as to the inquiries made into the late outbreaks, Sir J. GRAHAM said that all the circumstances would be brought out on the trial of those parties who were to take their trial in the course of a few days.

Sir R. PEEL then rose to move, in the House of Commons, the vote of thanks to the Governor-General of India, and to the officers and army engaged in the operations against Affghanistan. The right hon. baronet studiously refrained from saying anything likely to lead to a discussion of a party character, or raise the question as to the policy of the withdrawal of our troops from that country, but confined himself to the military events and the sufferings and fidelity of the troops under the most trying circumstances. The right hon. baronet gave a sketch of the military operations, and said that Lord Ellenborough, in withdrawing the troops, had only followed up the policy of Lord Auckland. He defended the course pursued by Lord Ellenborough, and defended him also from the charge made against him by Lord John Russell on a former evening, of having behaved with so much rudeness to a legal gentleman named Amos, as to compel him to throw up his situation. The right hon. baronet read a letter from Mrs. Amos, written after Lord John Russell's speech appeared in the papers, in which she stated that no grounds whatever existed for the charge, and that Lord Ellenborough's conduct to her husband was invariably polite. He warmly eulogised the services of Sir Robert Sale, General Nott, and General Pollock, and declared, also, the melancholy death of Colonel Dennie, who was the very soul of that portion of the army which he commanded. He likewise praised the heroic conduct of Lady Sale, and alluded to other instances of fortitude and valour deserving of the vote of thanks. Lord J. RUSSELL said that, considering a f the circumstances, he was not disposed to blame Lord Ellenborough for the order of withdrawal he had issued on the 19th of April. However, he was of opinion that the conclusion of the military operations displayed neither steady nor sound judgment, and that he was not, therefore, specifically entitled to a vote of thanks. He would not, however, be in the unpleasant task of opposing it.—Mr. BANKES vindicated the conduct of Lord Ellenborough. Mr. HUTT regretted the excesses committed by our troops on their retreat from Affghanistan, and expressed a fear that their conduct would materially defeat the very expectations which might otherwise have been anticipated of an extension of our commerce to that country, by the destruction of every mart beyond the Indus.—Sir H. HARDINGE said he did not credit the reports which had gone abroad of those excesses, and believed they would turn out to be incorrect, and that on the contrary it would appear that after the storming of a fort the troops had displayed the most generous humanity to the women and children. He regretted the burning of the bazaar, but it adjoined the mosque, at the door of which Sir W. Macnaghten had been barbarously murdered, and he knew there would be no thanks for it. The first order issued by Sir R. COLEBROOKE was necessary—Though he had opposed some of the policy of Lord Ellenborough, now concurred entirely in his conduct.—Mr. HUME concurred in the military vote, but could not concur in the vote of thanks to Lord Ellenborough. He must take the thanks to Lord Ellenborough be deferred. Mr. HOGG thought the hon. member would act wisely in withdrawing his motion. There never was a more brilliant display of native troops and discipline than were the sepoys as they conduct themselves with greater valour and perseverance. With such troops, under the officers we possessed, there was little fear that we could successfully maintain our Indian empire.—Sir H. WILLOUGHBY thought Lord Ellenborough was entitled to the thanks of the house on the smallest possible grounds. But for the accidental inability of the generals to retreat, and the unwillingness of the Affghan Chiefs to keep the terms of peace proposed, the successes which had been gained would never have been achieved.—Colonel Thomas Wood supported the motion. Captain BERNAL, having read the letter which General Nott had addressed from Candahar to Lord Ellenborough, had fully earned for himself the thanks of the house for the share he had had in these military successes. He hoped his honourable friend would withdraw his amendment.—Sir H. HARDINGE considered that the Governor-General, in not giving positive orders to the generals to advance in the first instance, when he was uninformed of their precise position, acted most wisely.—Captain LAYARD was warm in supporting the amendment, and regretted that the hon. member had thought proper to move any amendment.—Mr. C. WOOD insisted that it was not of necessary supplies that General Nott had been reinforced, as would appear from the papers, but in accordance with orders which he had received.—The amendment was then negatived without a division, and the motion carried without a dissentient voice, with the exception of one, that of Mr. Hume.—The Speaker then announced the motion for papers respecting the dismissal of Mr. Hoskins until a future day.—The forged Exchequer Bills Bill passed through committee, and the report was ordered to be brought up on Monday next.—The Bankruptcy Disfranchisement Bill was read a second time, and ordered to be committed this day week.—The forged Exchequer Bills Bill passed through committee, and the report was ordered to be brought up on Monday next.—The Bankruptcy Disfranchisement Bill was read a second time, and ordered to be committed this day week.—The Report of the Transported Convicts Bill was brought up.—The Coroner's Inquest Bill was read a second time, Mr. HUME moved the postponement of the bill for giving to the Crown the sole power of naturalizing foreigners, and enabling them to have seats in the House of Commons and at the Councils.—Sir J. GRAHAM took occasion to express his unwillingness to oppose the bringing in of the bill, to express his surprise that a proposition to transfer this power from the Parliament and the Crown to the Crown alone should be made, and that it should be opposed by the house. Sir G. CLERK obtained leave to bring in a bill to discontinue certain actions under an act of 2nd William IV., for regulating the vend and delivery of coals in London and Westminster, and the parts adjacent.—The returns of wines for Mr. Ferrand had been read, with some alterations, ordered.—The Law of Evidence Bill was read a first time, on the motion of Sir G. CLERK.—The Turnpike Roads Bill was read a first time.—The house adjourned at half-past twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

The Bishop of Chester presented a vast number of petitions from various places in Wales against the union of the sees of Bangor and St. Asaph. In reply to a question from the Marquis of Clanricarde, Lord WHARNCLIFFE said that it was not the intention of the architect of the new Houses of Parliament to finish any one of them before the other. He was proceeding with both houses pari passu. Complaints had been complained that the house intended for their accommodation should not be expedited. They had given up their house to the House of Commons, and, having very bad accommodation at present, while that which the House of Commons enjoyed was very good, they felt that active steps should be taken to finish off their new house as speedily as possible.—Under this feeling the Marquis of Clanricarde moved the appointment of a committee to inquire into the progress made in the erection of the new Houses of Parliament.—The motion was agreed to, and the committee appointed.—The house then adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

A number of petitions were presented on various subjects.—Dr. BOWRING gave notice to move, on Wednesday, for a return of advertisement and stamp duties on newspapers. Sir R. PEEL stated, in reply to a question put by Mr. Wallace, that the budget would be brought forward at an earlier period than usual, but not till after quarter-day.—Mr. T. DUNCOMBE moved that, petitions having been presented to the house, complaining of the conduct of Lord Chief Justice Abinger, when presiding as judge upon the execution of the late special commission, the house do summon witnesses to the bar, for the purpose of ascertaining the language used by him in charging the grand juries, and in summing up the cases to the petty juries, and also in passing sentences upon the prisoners convicted. The hon. member produced a mass of documentary evidence for the purpose of allowing that the noble and learned judge had conducted himself towards the Chartist prisoners, whilst under trial, with a violence of tone and manner highly indecorous on the part of any one occupying the judicial seat; and also that he had improperly interfered with the jury in the discharge of their duty. He stated that, in one case, the noble and learned lord, with clenched hand and extended arm, had used the most opprobrious epithets towards the prisoners, such as calling them "rabble" and "vagabonds"; and that, at the mention of the Charter, he appeared invariably to lose all self-command. Mr. Duncombe proceeded to impress upon the house the necessity of instituting an inquiry into the circumstances he stated, and hoped that, should her Majesty's Ministers resolve on stifling inquiry, they would at all events state whether they approved of such conduct, and whether there were any among them who sympathised with or practised such "exercises of Wh g." It was incumbent on the friends of Lord Abinger to have the matter inquired into, and, if they found he was traduced, the British people would do him justice; I hope that the house is prepared to do its duty on the present occasion. -The ATTORNEY-GENERAL met the motion with a direct negative. He said Lord Abinger had been grossly calumniated by the persons from whom Mr. Duncombe derived his information. The most lenient course was taken in the prosecutions, which were not framed in the shape of charges of high treason, as they might have been. He would undertake to prove that nothing like party politics had been introduced by the Lord Chief Baron at all during these proceedings. There could be no reason for inquiry into the charges delivered in this case, for they had been published by the learned lord himself. The noble and learned lord, he said, was rendered still further objectionable on account of the trials which were yet to be had. Lord Abinger was perfectly right in pointing out to the jury how strictly the conduct of the prisoners had been calculated to lessen, if not to fall at all short of it. This was the matter against which the charge of the Chief Baron was directed, and not against the politics of the Chartists. The language of Lord Abinger was not directed against the right of discussing the Charter, but against that system of intimidation and insurrection which directed as its movements were by a committee of public safety, which in the exercise of its powers gave license for the destruction of any one that might be deemed of absolute necessity, was calculated to destroy all the relations of society. Lord Abinger had not gone the unconstitutional length of denouncing every attempt to effect by argument an alteration in the existing state of things; he had only pointed out the illegality and danger of such tumultuous assemblages as had taken place, got up, as they were, not for the purpose of deliberation, but for the disturbance of the public peace, and commented properly on the dangerous language used at each of these meetings. The sentences passed by Lord Abinger, and which were said to be severe, were the result of the united deliberations of the three judges in the commission. The hon. and learned gentleman concluded by eulogising the character of Lord Abinger, whom he was anxious to shield in his old age, after a life of honour, not directed against him, from the mortification which such an inquiry could not fail to bring with it. -Mr. ROSE, in supporting the motion, said he did not think the defence of the Attorney-General, confiding, as it did, with the representation of Lord Abinger, at all satisfactory. —Mr. THESIGER condemned the motion as an interference with the independence of the judges. He entered into a lengthened defence of Lord Abinger, who had been also misrepresented on the case of Nicholas Stusse, as well as in the present instance, for he had never said in charging the jury that that person was an "invaluable servant." He had only said that he must have been so considering the deserving he was master. -Mr. Sergeant MURPHY said it should have been the care of Lord Abinger to have excited the minds of the grand jury, and to have soothed the excitement natural for them to be influenced by, and which must have interfered with the justice of their decisions. This he had not done. On the contrary, his speech was calculated to increase that excitement. If such a speech were proper under the circumstances, how was it to be reconciled to the case of Chief Justice Tindal was of a totally opposite character? In this country we had a very horror of political judges, and therefore it was that he deprecated the conduct of Lord Abinger in having delivered his charge for the purpose of stimulating grand juries already too much excited. -Mr. J. S. WORTLEY said that if the whole of the charge had been read by his hon. and learned friend he would never have called it a violent charge. The whole of the outcry against Lord Abinger arose from a misconception which the mere perusal by a candid mind of that charge would remove. The charges of Chief Justice Tindal were exactly opposite to those they were excellent; but that learned judge did not always strictly confine himself to the case before him, for in one instance he had stated the constitutional law to the grand jury, and which was, that the use of force by a soldier still retained his character as a civilian, that they might judge of the legality of what had been done in the suppression of a riot. -Mr. WALLACE said he had not treated the charge of Lord Abinger with any hasty approbation the noble lord's own shilling's-worth, and from that he must conclude that Lord Abinger had travelled far and wide from his duty. -Mr. SHARMAN CRAWFORD said he entirely agreed with those who

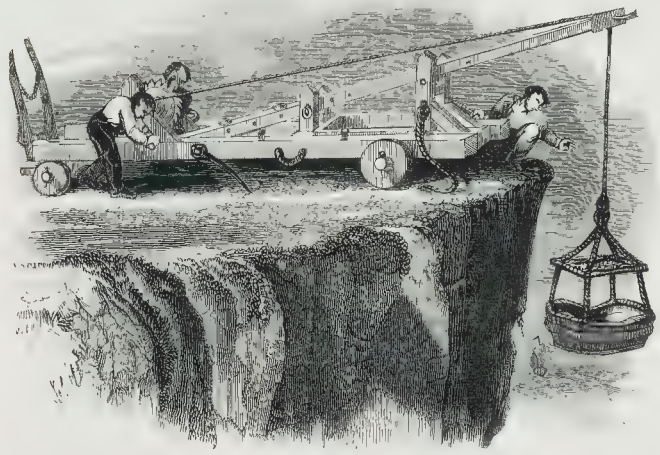
BRITISH LIFE CONTRIVANCES FOR SAVING SHIPWRECKED AND DROWNING PERSONS.

CAPTAIN MANBY'S MORTAR LIFE-LINE.



JOHNSTONE'S CLIFF CRANE

PRINCE ALBERT'S LIFE-LADDER.

At the grand concert given on Monday evening for the benefit of the families of the seamen who perished in the wrecks of the Reliance and the Conqueror Indiamen, two of their ill-fated crews were present, and shared the hearty sympathy as well as the more substantial charity of the immense audience. Why were they so treated?—They were poor illiterate persons, who had performed no heroic deeds for the safety of their fellow-sufferers, but had simply been washed by the storm from their respective decks and driven upon the inhospitable shores of France. The reason for the benevolent attention they commanded was to be found in the fact, that of all their numerous and gallant companions they were the sole survivors, and that the scene of their disasters had been the coast of Boulogne—of polite, but still, in one respect at least, uncivilized France. No life-boat, no rocket-lines, no life-buoys, no Deal-boat-men-spirits, were to be found upon those dreary "dunes," and although many hours of mortal agony intervened between the moment of striking and the final breaking-up of the vessels, and notwithstanding the shore was sufficiently near to permit signals by hand and by handkerchief to be passed between the living on shore and the living on deck, still no assistance could be rendered, or even attempted, and they were left to sink as lead in the mighty waters. The improvidence of the French people in leaving their treacherous coast destitute of the means of lending a helping hand to seamen in extremity, has excited the liveliest surprise and regret in the minds of all classes of our people; but while they have not been backward in expressing their abhorrence of this neglect, they have, in the true spirit of Englishmen, whose feelings are eminently practical, been sitting in judgment upon themselves, and have determined on a survey of the "life apparatus" of the whole British coast, and the addition of such means as the special dangers of particular localities may require. The Royal Humane Society and its coast branches, the committee of Lloyd's, and a committee of the House of Commons are now earnestly employed in the business. We trust that Christian France will not hesitate to follow, as a primary duty, so generous an example. To stimulate their charity, as well to inform our friends on this interesting topic, we have on former occasions given several views of our Channel lighthouses and beacons, and have now to present them with engravings of the more important apparatus used on the coast for rescuing drowning persons.

The first is the celebrated mortar-line invented by Captain Manby. The cut represents a party of the coast-guard in the act of firing the apparatus, which, as the reader will perceive, consists of a coiled rope, fixed by a short chain to a shell, which is discharged in the direction of the vessel requiring aid. The line on reaching the vessel usually coils round some portion of the spars or rigging, or otherwise fastens itself by entanglement, and this, fixed, opens a ready and, under most circumstances, safe communication with the shore. The enthusiasm of mercy which the use of this and all similar contrivances for the rescue of "poor Jack" calls forth, must be seen to be conceived; it is a genuine English exhibition, and may be regarded as one grand means of civilizing the otherwise unsocial "wreckers" of the coast. We hold the constant sight of life apparatus to be a constant sermon to those who behold it.

Captain Manby's contrivance was modified some years since by Mr. Dennett, of New Village, Isle of Wight, by the use of a rocket for the projection of a line; but the mortar practice is more generally adopted.

Our second engraving exhibits the cliff crane invented by J. Johnston, Esq., of Brighton. The preservation of life by this machine is said to have been very great. On the cliffy iron-bound coasts small vessels are often stranded on the beach, to which access is either difficult or impossible, but the cliff crane makes the "way of escape" however steep or rugged the cliff, easy and manageable by a few hands. It consists of a carriage-frame on four wheels to which a pair of shafts is fixed, to permit it to be driven by a horse to the scene of danger. On the frame of the carriage a crane-beam is mounted, and so adjusted by shifting bolts, that it may be raised or depressed, projected or withdrawn, to any degree at pleasure. At the foot of this beam is a windlass, bearing a long coil of rope, one end of which is passed over a pulley fixed in the projecting head of the beam and made to support a wicker cradle. In working the apparatus this cradle is lowered to the beach, and drawn up again with any persons who may have sought its refuge. It is 3 feet 6 inches by 2 feet 8 inches square, and 2 feet 4 inches deep, fitted on the bottom with a light iron grating, as offering less resistance to the air in its descent. A ballast-box; stays to prevent the machine, on its position being determined, from being drawn forwards; hand-lines, to prevent those who work it from falling over the cliff; a couple of life-lines, from twelve to fifteen fathoms long; two common boat-hooks; a couple of knotted hand-ropes, eighteen or twenty feet long; a spade, a pickaxe, a couple of horn lanterns for night use, and a speaking trumpet, complete the arrangements. On the basket being raised to a level with the surface, the machine is drawn backward, and, on the safe landing of the rescued persons, is again moved forward for further operations. The rope, when the crane-beam is pushed forward to its greatest extent, clears the face of the cliff by about ten feet.

A third contrivance is one of those simple pieces of apparatus which seem in themselves to promise little service, but which, in the hour of peril, are oftentimes of greater use than more complex and imposing machines. We allude to the life-buoy supplied by the Humane Society to the boats' crews of fishing and small trading vessels. It is formed, as our engraving shows, of two globes, composed of layers of cork, covered with strong painted canvass, connected by a wooden shaft, to which a life-line is affixed. The dimensions of the globes, 10 inches by 11; and the shaft between them, 20 inches in length. This apparatus is sufficiently buoyant to sustain the weight of a man; and, in using it, the person is desired to lash himself by the line securely to the bar, and then commit himself to the course of the waves to be cast ashore.

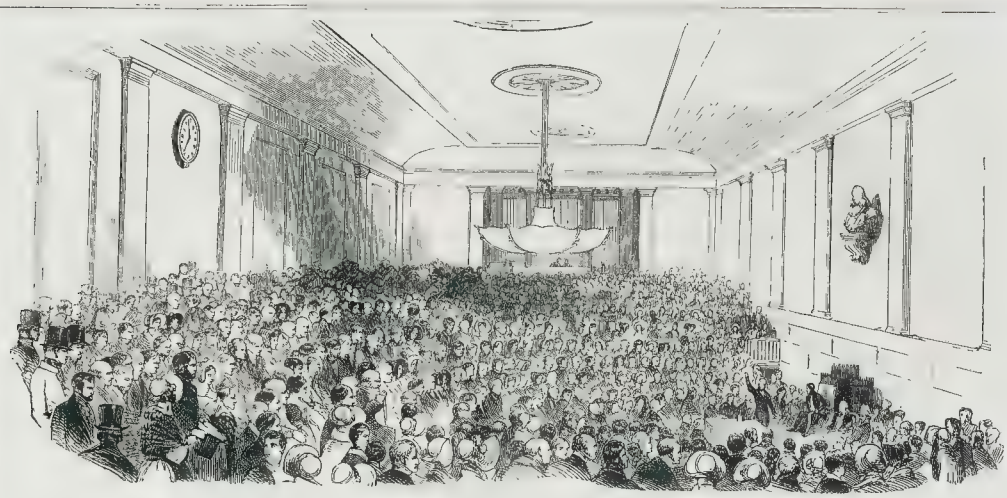
LIFE BUOY

These, with the exception of the life-boat, some improved forms of which we hope to give on a future occasion, are the artless inexpensive contrivances in general use on the British coasts for the preservation of the sinking mariner. No foreigners have profited more frequently by their exercise than the French themselves; and we do hope that in common charity—to say nothing of "French glory"—they will at once be induced to establish them, not only on their northern, but through the whole length of their marine borders. Had they done so on the Etaples sands the crews of our lost Indiamen would not have waved their handkerchiefs in vain.

We conclude this notice with a picture of an ice-ladder, which the Royal Humane Society have recently presented to Prince Albert, to be used at the royal skating parties on Virginia Water. Its structure and mode of application are obvious. The winter, however, has been so mild, that instead of taking its monitory stand in sight of her Majesty's sliding chair, it has continued to enjoy an honourable sinecure beside the throne of the Waterloo Gallery.

Let no one undervalue the importance of these inventions, as their object is to save LIFE; and the concurring dictates of reason and humanity enjoin us to consider its preservation a duty of paramount obligation. It has been observed that few countries have such an extent of coasts, rivers, and canals, relatively to its population, or so many men employed in navigation as Great Britain; and it is supposed that one thousand lives are annually lost in sailing vessels alone by shipwreck, and that more than two thousand persons are drowned every year in England! Our policy, then, as good citizens; our feelings as compassionate men, and our duty as self-devoted Christians, call upon us, upon our Gallic neighbours, and upon all men, to give a hearty measure of support to those "good appliances" by which the drowning man may be recovered.

HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY.—The ordinary meeting of this society was held on Tuesday afternoon, F. W. Barchard, Esq., V.P., in the chair. The show of flowers, although not containing many specimens, was very good for the season. A fine collection of plants, consisting of epacrises, ericas, Mirbelias, &c., from Mrs. Lawrence, of Ealing Park, excited much attention, from their individual beauty and excellence of cultivation. The prizes awarded were silver Knightian medals to Mr. Mylam, gardener to Sigismund Rucker, Esq., for orchidaceous plants; and Mr. Goode, gardener to Mrs. Lawrence, for epacrises and other plants; a silver Banksian medal to Mr. Clark, of Shirley Park, near Croydon, for Leschenaultia formosa; and Banksian certificates of merit to Mr. Redding, gardener to Mrs. Marryatt, for a collection of plants; Mr. Judd, for cucumbers; Mr. Thornton, for flfor a collection of plants; Mr. Judd, for cucumbers; Mr. Thornton, for fl-for



GREENWICH LITERARY INSTITUTION.

The accompanying sketch is a faithful delineation of the Greenwich Literary Institution, which was opened last week to the public, the plans and purposes of which should be the subject of sincere congratulation to every friend and advocate of human enlightenment. From the history of the rise and progress of the institution, as given by the chairman, Charles Harwood, Esq., on the auspicious occasion alluded to, it appears that the library which formerly existed in the town of Greenwich had been felt to be too limited for some and too expensive for others, and hence arose the edifice now before us. He said, "It was not his purpose to go into the subject of general education; but still he must be permitted to say that education on almost any scale must tend to virtue. Vice would not be sanctioned there. Halls of science were not places for vice. It was under this feeling that the committee had fixed the price for the admission of youth as low as 5s. a-year. In the ordinary pursuits of life simple impulses frequently led to great results—and so it was in education. A party who received early instruction that was captivating was led to go on to that which was more abstruse—thus, for instance, from music the student would pass on to the sciences and the arts—and to the kindness of the committee and the energy of the professors they had been indebted for courses of lectures adapted to various tastes and to further any objects in life they might desire to serve." These few short but comprehensive sentences comprise the whole objects of this excellent institution, to which we wish a long career of continued usefulness and prosperity.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

BRIDGE AT ELTHAM PALACE.

Eltham Palace abounds with historic associations. It formerly had the title of King John's Palace, which it is supposed to have acquired from being the residence of King John, the predecessor of Henry III.; others say from John, king of France, who had previously been a prisoner in England, but coming over to visit our Edward III. in 1364, was entertained by that monarch here with great magnificence.

At Eltham, which is in Kent, about eight miles from London, the kings of England, at a very early period, had a palace. Anthony Beck, bishop of Durham, having fraudulently secured the possession of a part of this manor, in 1290, beautified the capital mansion. This warlike and ambitious prelate died here in the year 1311; and soon afterwards the whole estate returned into the possession of the crown. When the palace was originally built is unknown, but it must have been prior to 1270, in which year Henry III. kept his Christmas here. Edward II. resided here; and in 1315 his queen was brought to bed of a son at this place: he was called John of Eltham. In 1329 and 1375 a parliament was held here by Edward III. In 1364, John, king of France, was magnificently entertained here. Richard II. kept Christmas here in 1384 and 1385; and in 1386 entertained with great magnificence Leo, King of Armenia, who had been driven out of his kingdom by the Turks. This palace continued to be much frequented by succeeding monarchs, till the reign of Henry VIII., who preferred Greenwich; after which it was seldom visited by the royal family, and gradually fell to decay. Our princes often celebrated their feasts at Eltham with great pomp. One of the last of these feasts was held here at Whitsuntide, in 1515, when Henry VIII. created Sir Edward Stanley Baron Montegle, for his services at Flodden Field. Part of the stately hall, which was the scene of those feasts, is still in good preservation, and is used as a barn. The roof, in particular, is somewhat like that of Westminster-hall. The large moat round the palace, although the greatest part of it is dry and covered with verdure, has still two stone bridges over it. Queen Elizabeth, who was born at Greenwich, was frequently carried to Eltham when an infant for the benefit of the air. It was granted, with the manor, for a term of years, perpetually renewable, to one of the ancestors of Sir J. G. Shaw, who is the present lessee under the crown. The manor-lodge in the great park has been latterly used as the manorial residence. Some interesting subterraneous passages and apartments were discovered here in 1834: under the ground-floor of one of the apartments, where a new arch had been recently turned, a trap-door led into an apartment which conducted the passenger into a series of passages with decoys, stairs, and shafts; these passed in a direction westward towards Middle Park. The remains of two gates, completely carbonised, were discovered in that of the passage which passed under the moat, and large stalactites of supercarbonate of lime hung from the roof of the arch, which sufficiently indicated the lapse of time since these passages were entered.

A few miles from this spot is the village of Chislehurst, noted for being the place of retirement of Camden, the chorographer and antiquary, who resided for several years, and here composed the greatest part of his "Annals of Queen Elizabeth." An estate in this parish comprises a very handsome seat, termed Camden Place; it is the property of the Marquis of Camden. And in the park, forming the covering of a spring, may be seen that celebrated piece of ancient architecture called the "Lantern of Demosthenes," executed in all its proportions. The elegant Gothic bridge of three arches thrown over the moat, now in ruins, led into the court-yard of the palace. The bridge in its decay has suffered much from the ivy which covered it having been rudely torn down. There were two bridges—one on the north, the other on the south; the first only remains, at the south end of which was originally a gateway: not a vestige of it now remains. From the south side of the palace may be seen the dome of St. Paul's; but, in the day of its kingly magnificence, the heaven-directed spire of old St. Paul's was visible.

THEATRICAL PORTRAITS.

FANNY ELSSLER.

Here reader is one of the dancing goddesses of our age—the first of the four priestesses of the Temple of Terpsichore, who are this season to descend from their pedestal and touch the stage of our Italian Opera with a footfall as light

As the steps of the fairies, that dance as they pass,
Without brushing the dew from the beautiful grass.

Fanny Elssler is one of the wonders of her time. At a crisis of what may be called Ballet-furor—when Taglioni wears wings of poetry—Cerito fills the air with wild voluptuous grace, and the exquisite Dumilatre comes flitting in upon us with a sort of aërial symmetry—when the Ballet-mad world of ton will admit of no phrase about any of them that is not bursting with the romance of enthusiasm, or the enthusiasm of romance—Fanny Elssler joins the throng with a riotous gush of exuberant buoyancy and delight, and clasps the rivets of popularity, which bind the magic chain encircling all the four. When she was with us before, the anxiety to receive her was prestige—now it is memory—and the dazzling appendage of a furious continental renown. She has driven France, Austria, Prussia, and America mad—and now les Anglais vont suivre les autres. Fanny Elssler has always some brilliant difficulty in her train to give a piquancy and value to her re-appearances, and to invest the entrepreneur who really secures her with a sort of contingent triumph. A few years back she was plunged into a process with a Paris manager, and America could not have her without her endurance of the sacrifice of a fine. Now Bunn makes a travel for her to Berlin—comes back delighted with his acquisition—makes her the attraction of his bills at Covent Garden—and presto! the cry of "no go" is in more delicate language iterated by Mr. Lumley, and in another week or two her Majesty's Theatre will be the real "paradise of applause" in which the glorious danseuse will gather up her laurels. Tant mieux! we are all the better for a little excitement, and none wake it more gracefully than the Elssler.

We are not going to give a memoir of this charming actress-dancer, though, as her career speeds through the season, we may scatter here and there an anecdote to help the pencil of our artist, as he may catch her flying from ballet to ballet upon wings of gauze; no, we shall tease our readers with no biography, threading through long mazes of successes, presents, poems, tributes, bouquets, and every other order of theatrical triumph, even to diamonds gifted by monarchs, and carriages drawn by nobles, but rather prefer to tell them the present news of their favourite, and what she is going to do to administer to their pleasures in the great arena of fashion in which she is engaged. Fanny Elssler, then, is now in England, laughing, it may be, at the Covent Garden play-bills, while she rehearses, with all her might, behind the Italian scenes, and preparing to open the Terpsichorean festival in the ballet of the "Tarentule." This fascinating production was written for her by the celebrated Scribe, written for her expressly, and splendidly on its first production did she vindicate the genius of the dramatist. Her pantomime was superb, and the theme teems with beautiful opportunities for its development. We are enabled to describe to our readers the plot of the dance-romance which they are so shortly to witness.

LA TARENTULE.

This ballet is founded upon the supposed properties of the tarantula spider, whose bite is said to throw the patient into a fit of dancing delirium, in which the sufferer expires from exhaustion.

The scene lies in Sicily. Luidgi, a young peasant, has risen before daybreak to serenade his beloved Lauretta; while the merry mandolines are preparing, a band of brigands, forced from their retreat in the mountains, are seen to cross the village, carrying with them their plunder and a lady whom they have, for some time, kept a prisoner. Roused at this sight, the young men run to arms to the lady's rescue.

Lauretta appears, cheerful and happy. Her mother, the rich post-mistress of the village, has told her the night before that she was to be married the following day; and the innocent girl entertains no doubt but it can only be to her beloved Luidgi. Firing is heard at a distance. The brigands have been defeated, and the rescued lady shows her gratitude by presents to her liberator's intended bride. On his refusing any reward for himself, she informs him that she has power and influence; and assures him that her protection will never fail him. She retires under an escort to seek repose in a neighbouring convent.

A travelling-carriage now drives to the post-house door, and a bombastic individual, the important and wealthy Dr. Onocpatico, alights; his presence will soon mar the joy of Lauretta. Seduced by the charms of the young peasant girl, the Doctor, whose wife has perished in an encounter with banditti, has offered his riches to Lauretta's mother, and it is for him that the marriage preparations have been made. On Lauretta's return in her bridal clothes, the Doctor declares his passion and intentions, which are disbelieved and laughed at. The scene, however, assumes a more serious appearance when it is sanctioned by Lauretta's mother; and the unfortunate girl withdraws, protesting that she will never be the wife of any other but Luidgi.

An unexpected occurrence, however will soon alter her determination. She re-enters, frightened and trembling. Luidgi has been stung by a Tarantula, and she describes his delirium, his frantic dance, and panting agony. No assistance is at hand but that of the Doctor, who, taking advantage of Luidgi's dangerous situation, refuses to exercise his medical skill, unless Lauretta will consent to marry him. The malady is increasing, and if not instantly attended to, Luidgi cannot survive. Lauretta consents, and is led fainting to the altar.

Yielding to his entreaties, his attendants have brought Luidgi near to his Lauretta, and, scarcely restored to his senses, her nuptial attire at first flatters his fancy as having been assumed for their own marriage. Lauretta's fears, however, soon reveal the truth, and the painful story is told; a marriage thus obtained by fraud and violence cannot be valid, it shall be annulled. But how can its dissolution be obtained? High protection and powerful influence are necessary; the recollection of the lady's promises occurred to him—she told him that she had power and influence, which would never fail him in case of need. Not a moment is to be lost; the Doctor has already ordered the carriage to take away his newly married wife, and two hours, at least, are requisite to reach the convent where the lady has retired. Lauretta, nevertheless, restored by hope to her merry temper, promises that for two hours she will detain the Doctor, and Luidgi hastily departs. To obtain the desired delay, the shrewd girl employs every stratagem—now, her friends, by her directions, protract their compliments and the parting glass—now, her toilet for the journey is made unusually long—now she kneels in prayer before the Madonna—then, seemingly frightened by a strange noise, she locks up the Doctor in an inner room; the old man, however, re-enters through the balcony; she is at her wit's end, and not half the time is as yet elapsed, when a ludicrous idea comes to her assistance; she feigns to be stung by the Tarantula, and assumes the depressed countenance, the feverish tremor and frenzy, which she has witnessed in Luidgi's case, and yielding to a fit of frantic dancing defies the efforts of the Doctor to soothe her supposed madness. Alarmed at this extraordinary effect of the bite, the Doctor calls the company to assist, and Lauretta falls apparently dead from exhaustion. Her mother accuses the Doctor as the cause of her daughter's death; he is on the point of being roughly treated, when Luidgi returns, and, in the lady who accompanies him, the Doctor recognises his wife, whose life has been spared by the brigands. Now, to complete the tortures of the Doctor, Lauretta suddenly recovering, pretends to claim him as her husband. She very soon, however, yields her pretensions, and offers her hand to her dear Luidgi. The Doctor's only alternative is to return to his wife, and the postilion entering the room, reminds him that the carriage has been waiting for two hours.

The story of the ballet, as here told, will indicate how much is left to the Elssler to achieve; and we may add, that a new spirit will be poured into the plot by the fact of the enactment by Perrot of the Dr. Omeopatico, in which his drollery is fairly irresistible. He will be a worthy supporter of the dancing-wit of Fanny Elssler. The damages in the action said to be brought by the lessee of Covent Garden against the danseuse are laid at £3,000.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1843.

The new poor-laws are once more the subject of discussion in Parliament. Mr. Walter, on Thursday evening, brought forward his promised motion, and again directed the attention of the country to the all-important practical influences of the new bill—or rather of the bill—which, in the history of the distress of the people, has already become only too old.

We have always contended in this journal that the present poor-laws were heartless, tyrannizing, and unjust; and the daily reports from police-offices in the public press have confirmed every argument brought forward against them by the true advocates of Christian humanity. The terms of Mr. Walter's motion are calculated to point out and enforce some of the leading grievances of those cruel enactments, and to couple with their exposition a resolution which we cannot do otherwise than heartily approve. It is fair to say, too, that Mr. Walter backed up his propositions on Thursday evening with a just and able, if not an eloquent, speech; and, although we neither know nor care anything about the public nature of the documents upon which his resolution was founded, we do know that the resolution itself had its data in facts, and arrived at its conclusion with the virtuous purpose of mitigating the sufferings of the poor, and affording them a wiser and more charitable order of poverty-amelioration. The tendency of the speech of the honourable gentleman went to show, truly, that the commissioners under the present act had contemplated, first, the entire extinction of the principle of out-door relief, by a sort of irritating finesse in the nature of that relief itself; and, next, the rendering of in-door relief as intolerable as possible, by reducing the diet of paupers to a point of starvation and disgust. Whether the document which Mr. Walter evidenced were confidential or not (and if it were we would neither countenance its being improperly obtained, nor by consequence unfairly divulged), it is clear that it told no secrets—that if it had pre-conceived good matter for Mr. Walter's resolution, Mr. Walter himself had the practical operation of its suggestions and schemes, as carried out in the actual working of the laws, and in the miserable tyranny to which they have ground down the poor. Persons may assert the document to have been sacred—and deny that the acts passed were carried out upon its suggestions—but they cannot deny that those acts have borne out all the spirit of those suggestions—that out-door relief has been almost entirely abolished under most cruel circumstances of separation of families—and that in-door relief has been rendered as nearly intolerable as any country, laying claim to a shelter-place for mercy in its bosom, could be civilised and permit. The abhorrence in which the workhouses are held—the brutality exhibited in the administration of their discipline—the reckless inattention to the bad health of the wretched inmates consequent upon the starving system of diet—the remorseless transfer of children in a state of almost dying weakness from parish to parish—perhaps to walk miles, in their debility, either to the workhouse or the grave (as exemplified in a very strong police case during the present week)—the bursting of family ties, and perfect and disgustful blindness to immorality—all these evils have tended not only to deprave the bastiles themselves (built in Elizabethan order to mock the beautiful principle of the fair old Elizabethan law), but to make the poor execrate them—to the extent of sometimes, in a bad desperation, committing crimes—to procure for grave merciful letter of a prison in their stead. These are undeniable truths—and well did they warrant the propoundment by Mr. Walter of this humane resolution—"That the suffering already caused by their partial enforcement, and the amount of out-door relief in spite of them still administered, show their provisions to have been at once cruel and impracticable. That the attempted substitution of punishment for legal relief has created more tended to irritate and dishearten the poor, to check industry, to increase crime, and to encourage various kinds of tyranny, without even the proposed compensation of reducing the expenses of the rate-payers. That this house think it therefore expedient to demand such a re-construction of the existing system as shall make it conformable to Christianity, sound policy, and the ancient constitution of this realm."

We would not be more pertinent matter framed, or more true and honest in its purpose than this; and the observations with which it was followed up by the honourable member did great credit to his heart, however the opponents of his doctrines on this question might think it right or politic to doubt his judgment. In the outset he put this stringent question, seconding it with the remarks which follow:—"Had there, he would ask, been any satisfactory good to counter-balance the misery of the humbler classes to their employers shown since this cruel law was invented? Certainly not. (Hear, hear.) They were now in the ninth year since the first attack was made against the old poor law—a law originating with one of the greatest sovereigns, and that a female, that this country ever knew, whose object it was to sustain the great mass of the people against hereditary oppression, and who, by trusting herself and her throne to the support of the people, not to family retainers, set the whole world at defiance. (Hear, hear.) That poor-law the present law depressed. It affected the agricultural interests, and also that of the manufacturers. In consequence of this attempt to subvert the basis of human society, every institution in the empire must ultimately sink. It had been usual in the practice of legislation, when through the lapse of time an old law had failed in its application, to alter, to restore, to reform that law, but not to destroy it. But what had been the case here? They had destroyed the old law, and had substituted for it an invention new to history—an invention which in its principles and its details was alike distasteful."

There is nothing that we have yet read in the debate that upsets these bold and but too well-proved assertions; they were partially echoed, in some instances, and absolutely in others, by practical members of the house; and the only statesmanlike reason for not adopting the resolution itself upon broad principles, was a sort of ministerial caution of expediency on the part of Sir Robert Peel, warning the house against an act of condemnation against the present laws, unless they had something better to offer in their stead. This caution could be easily combatted indeed, but for the present we content ourselves with urging Mr. Walter upon the path of humanity, promising to abet, with our heartiest succour, a crusade against laws which are pregnant with disgrace to our country, and cruelty to our poor.

Much interest is displayed at our clubs and in diplomatic circles at a kind of Ministerial crisis which exists in France. We take leave to declare our opinion that the importance of a change in the counsels of the King of the French is prodigiously exaggerated. We entertain the highest possible respect for the character and talents of M. Guizot, and we should prefer, so far as our personal sympathies are concerned, that he should remain in office; but we deny that he is either a political necessity for France, or a guarantee for the preservation of peace in Europe. Louis Philippe is his own Minister, and will continue to hold the reins of government so long as his faculties last; and that these may be prolonged to the most distant period must be the universal prayer.

There has been a time when the coming into power of M. Thiers might have been of extreme peril, but M. Thiers, who aimed at the dictatorship, and was completely outgeneralled by his wily Monarch, is no longer the same man. The death of the lamented Duke of Orleans was the grave of M. Thiers's hopes. He wavered for a moment whether he should declare for the regency of the Duchess of Orleans, but his first interview with the King at Neuilly after the catastrophe decided the course of M. Thiers, and he became as conservative as Count Molé or M. Guizot. M. Thiers, under the affectation that he would no longer thwart the King after his dreadful deprivation, attempts to conceal the fact that Louis Philippe has been too much for him. The revolution of July produced two men—the King and M. Thiers. The latter was the incarnation of the three days—the Monarch elected by virtue of the barricades was the destroyer of the principles of the street-struggle. The conflict for the supremacy was long and severe. M. Thiers's banner was parliamentary privilege; that of the King of the French, royal prerogative. The former has succumbed, and the latter is triumphant. Louis Philippe rules the Chambers, and the intrigues of the Ministerial and Opposition parties appertaining to the dynastic interest are turned to account by the long-sighted Monarch with marvellous skill. If the Court policy be belligerent (in words only), there is M. Thiers to represent it. If the system be that of peace at any price and for ever, there is M. Guizot to embody it. And if a middle course is to be pursued between pugnacity and peacefulness, there is Count Molé ready to execute the royal will. In short, Louis Philippe draws the wires of the rival puppets for power, but his Majesty takes care that he remains complete master of the foreign relations of France. The primary object of the King is to secure a majority for himself in the Chambers, and then he occupies himself with Continental affairs, leaving a fair field open to his Ministry for the time being to work the internal administration of the country.

Apart, then, from personal predilections, it is immaterial to England who is now Minister of France. It is to the King alone that we look up, and no fiction can disguise the flagrant fact. Now, it becomes a matter of perfect indifference to our Government whether Count Molé, or M. Guizot, or even M. Thiers, should be at the head of the French Cabinet. The conflicting parties may intrigue as much as they please, but if a state of things is produced, right or wrong, when a French Minister can no longer negotiate with safety with Continental Governments, then has the time come for a change. The King of the French will decide the question. If he thinks that M. Guizot has gone his time, and is powerless by popular prejudice or by a more rightful cause, then will the Soult-Guizot Ministry fall; but if the King is of opinion that the present Minister for Foreign Affairs can still be of service to him, the party manœuvres will be a failure.

We repeat it is of little or no consequence what proper names figure in a Ministerial programme in France. As the system now works, the preservation of order at home and peace abroad depends solely on the tact and intelligence of the King of the French; and although Englishmen may watch Parisian intrigues with much interest, as a matter of mere curiosity, yet it is but right and just that we leave the French politicians to settle their own affairs as they think proper. M. Guizot is certainly a very estimable man, but he has displayed weakness in his inordinate desire to stand well with foreign countries. France is not a country which will endure a cosmopolite Prime Minister, and, if M. Guizot had taken all the pains to divest himself of the French press as he has done to secure the inflated eulogium of the Continental journals, he would not now be in his present difficulties. We wish him well through them, but we cannot desire to witness his stay in power with hands bound up through the suspicions (extravagant as they doubtless are) of his countrymen. For the safety of Europe France ought to have a Minister who not only can sign treaties, but who has the power above all of ratifying them.

FOREIGN POLITICS.

PARIS, February 20.

You will, by this time, have perceived that the appreciations of the situation of the Cabinet here, as they have appeared in your journal, have been the only accurate ones of the entire London press. I mention this fact, not in the spirit of egotism, but in justice to the reputation of your fast-rising journal, which is now read in this capital with increasing interest. And it is right to remind your readers that, in addition to the happy illustrations of current events, they have the advantage of perusing in your columns communications relative to France, derived from sources which cannot be excelled as to authenticity and priority of news. I prove this fact by reference to the letters published in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS of the 11th and 18th inst., and I challenge comparison with the facts and views mentioned therein with any articles that have appeared in the columns of your contemporaries.

Demanding your pardon for this preamble, I now proceed to describe to you the state and prospects of the Ministry, for that is our all-absorbing topic at present. The annual demand of £40,000 supplementary secret service money for the police will give rise to animated debates. When the monthly standing committees named the commission of nine Deputies charged to draw up the report on the Ministerial proposition, some warm discussion took place on the general policy of the Ministry. Marshal Sebastiani has been named the president, and M. Vigier the secretary of this commission. There are four Opposition members, namely, M. Odillon Barrot, M. de Lamartine, M. Lacrosse, and M. Ganneron. The Cabinet has five of its supporters on the commission, so the majority will conclude for the pure granting of the money; but the minority, it is anticipated, will propose a slight reduction for the purpose of upsetting the Cabinet. The report is expected to be presented Thursday or Friday next, and the debate will probably begin next Monday. I should mention that in the votes in the Bureaux for the nomination of the commission there were 217 for the Ministry, and 193 for the Opposition, thus giving the Cabinet a majority of 24. In the Ministerial circles they calculate that a majority of from 30 to 60 votes will grant the supply, whilst the Opposition assert that the Ministry will be in a minority.

I continue in my former opinion, that the Soult-Guizot Cabinet will not fall on the secret service money question. Every man hoping to be a Minister is interested in having this grant passed without an amendment; and I know that neither Count Molé nor M. Thiers wish to eject the Ministry on this vote of confidence. A sidewind would be preferred to the direct course; and, since 1830, it has generally been by an unexpected blow that Cabinets have been upset.

My belief is, that the Ministry is in a minority in the present Chamber, so far as its sympathies go; but it will be in favour of the King's resolution, for it is his majority, and he can make it subservient to Count Molé or M. Thiers if he thinks proper. From various indications of court gossip, I should say that the King is disposed for a change of council. M. Guizot's unpopularity is of no service at this moment, and, independently of that consideration, Louis Philippe does not like a Minister to have too long a tenure of office, no more than he desires the consolidation of the Conservative party. His Majesty prefers playing men off against each other. His favourite expression as to his Ministers is, to compare them to the positions, "It is fair sea wind" is his favourite remark when he thinks a Cabinet team has gone its stage. M. Guizot is in that position that he incurs the risk of impeachment if he made the slightest concession to England. I do not believe that he will dare sign a treaty of commerce with us in the actual feeling of the country and the Chambers. The latter would tolerate from Count Molé or M. Thiers what they would spurn from M. Guizot.

The combination most talked of is that of Count Molé with M. Dufaure. The former to be President of the Council and Minister for Foreign Affairs, and the latter Minister of the Interior. M. Dufaure heads, in the Chamber, what is called the Tiers parti, composed of the fraction of the Left Centre party, which severed from M. Thiers after the Coalition break up in 1839. M. Dufaure has been Minister of Public Works under the 12th of May, or Soult-Teste Ministry, and the King is desirous of adding his name to the long list of public men whose reputation he has annihilated by making them Ministers. Marshal Vaise would probably be Minister of War in the Molé-Dufaure coalition. The Cabinet, I feel convinced, will not weather the session, but it is all chance as to the question which will upset it. At all events, I do not apprehend that it will be on the secret service money.

TUESDAY EVENING, February 21.

At the Exchange this afternoon the funds improved under the impression that there will be no change of Ministry for the present. It was confidently asserted by some leading money-men that the Cabinet would have the majority on the demand for the supplementary secret service money. I must, however, state, on the best authority, that a coalition of all parties is forming against M. Guizot of a very formidable nature. Dupin, it is believed, will coalesce with Molé, and if the versatile procureur takes this course, you may be sure there is an intrigue behind at the Tuileries. The Sugar Bill of the Government will be thrown out certainly, but M. Guizot declares he will not go out on that check. If any important change takes place in the state of parties, I will write to you in time for your latest edition of Saturday, but I anticipate nothing before next Monday.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

WEST INDIA MAIL.—The Trident arrived at Falmouth on Wednesday last from the West Indies. Our papers and letters have come to hand, but bring no news of importance. The new Governor of Jamaica will be highly popular. Hopes of a good sugar crop are entertained. The Trident had been only three hours at St. Thomas's, when she was obliged to sail again.

The Right Honourable Lord Langdale, is going on well, and on Wednesday his lordship was able to drive out and transact business in his department. The noble lord, however, still suffers from lameness in one foot.

GREAT THAMES IMPROVEMENTS.—The Lords of the Treasury, the Commissioners of PUBLIC WORKS, and the Corporation of London, caused, some time ago, a report and estimate to be made on embanking some portion of the river Thames. A select committee of the House of Commons took up the inquiry upon an infinitely more extensive scale, and engineers of first-rate eminence were employed to examine the river within the whole of the jurisdiction of the Lord Mayor, and to report upon the entire question of making the noble river advantageous in every respect to the public. By a great deal of labour the most satisfactory evidence has been collected and laid before the Government and the corporation, and from the active proceedings adopted, it appears reasonable to calculate that the health, beauty, and convenience of the metropolis will, without much delay, be conspicuously augmented. On Wednesday Special Courts of Conservancy were held at Westminster, the Borough, Greenwich, and Stratford, for the several counties whose lands embank the Thames, by the Lord Mayor, with the view to commence this great object.

THE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.—Dr. Candlish and Mr. Dunlop, of Edinburgh, are now in London on business relative to the affairs of the Church of Scotland. It is understood their object was to advise with Mr. Fox Maule on the subject of his motion, which stood for Friday (the 24th), but which was postponed by the death of the right hon. gentleman's father-in-law, Lord Auckland. It is stated that, on the arrival of Mr. Fox Maule in town on being granted, that the Church may be heard at the bar of the house, Dr. Candlish will himself plead the cause of non-intrusion at the bar of the House of Commons.

A deputation, consisting of Lord Marsham, M.P., Sir Edmund Filmer, M.P., Mr. Herbert Curteis, Mr. James Elias (Barmsey), and Mr. J. Whitehead (Barnsley), had an interview with the Chancellor of the Exchequer on Wednesday, at his official residence, in Downing-street, and presented memorials for a reduction of the malt-tax.

THE FOREIGN WINE TRADE.—The following important communication, to those interested in the wine trade, has been made by the Earl of Aberdeen, in answer to a letter addressed to his lordship, upon the subject of the negotiations now pending between Portugal and this country, for the reduction of the duties on Portuguese wines: "Foreign Office, Feb. 16, 1843. Sir,—I am directed by the Earl of Aberdeen to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 10th instant, representing the injury to which the British trade in Portuguese wines is subjected, by the protracted state of the negotiations between the two countries, for mutual reductions in the British and Portuguese tariffs; and I am to acquaint you, in reply, that her Majesty's Government have taken measures for bringing the negotiations in question to an early determination. I am, sir, your obedient, humble servant, CANNING. —To James Moore, Esq."

On Tuesday evening last a public meeting of the inhabitants and electors of Mary eborne was convened at Hall's Riding-school, Albany-street, Regent's Park, for the purpose of considering the question of the Corn laws, when one of the most riotous scenes occurred that ever disgraced a civilized assemblage. The Chartists mustered in great force, and opposed with dreadful violence the proceedings of the requisitionists, in order to make a demonstration in behalf of their own peculiar principles. Benches were torn from their fastenings, and hurled at each others' heads with the most demoniacal expressions of rage and hatred; and Sir Benjamin Hall and Commodore Napier, the members for the borough, were obliged to retire, being unable to obtain a hearing, and in order to avoid personal violence. The malcontents having obtained forcible possession of the platform, three cheers were given for the Chartist, three groans for the Whigs, and three for the Tories; and thus the most extraordinary and riotous meeting ever held in the borough terminated without, as was anticipated at one time, the aid of the police, 400 of whom, it is stated, were in attendance in Albany-street station-house, ready to act upon any emergency.

The inquiries in progress respecting the Custom-house frauds, and the extensive smuggling understood to have been carried on with the connivance of the revenue officers, seem likely to lead to important results. The disappearance of several of the employes charged with corrupt practices argues a degree of delinquency in this department of her Majesty's service for which few persons were prepared, but a hope is generally expressed that the abuse may be probed to the bottom. We hear that a firm in Watling street, largely implicated in the Custom house frauds, has been exchequered for £100,000. Independent of this enormous sum, others of minor importance, and particularly one firm, rather celebrated at the West-end, have had the same process served on them.

On Sunday evening, between the hours of seven and nine o'clock, a robbery, to the extent of £600, was committed on the premises of the London and Regent street Bank, situated in Argyll-place, one door from Regent-street, by some adroit thieves, who gained admittance into the banking-house, but in what manner for the present remains a mystery.

ATTACK ON A GAMING-HOUSE, AND DREADFUL ACCIDENT.—Between twelve and one o'clock on Wednesday morning, the police of the C division made a forcible entry into Smart's gaming-rooms, 34, St. James's-street, and after a severe struggle, captured four of the gamblers, who were conveyed to the station-house, in Vine-street. One of Smart's sons, who was in bed at the time, being aroused by the attack, endeavoured to escape over the roof of the house, when, unfortunately, he was precipitated into the yard of Mr. Evans's house adjoining, and was killed on the spot. By another account, the lower part of the house, it appears, is tenanted by a cutler and perfumer, but who does not sleep there. The upper part is kept by Mr. Smart, where a club is held nightly. Upon the police getting into the house the whole of the inmates were thrown into consternation. The officers' knocks unheeded all they forced. In trying to escape, it appears young Smart got out of the window at the top, and was running across the parapet to get to the next house, when, unfortunately, he missed his hold and fell into the street from the fourth story. Assistance was immediately rendered, and he was picked up in a dreadful state. A cab was procured, and he was conveyed to the hospital, where surgical assistance was promptly administered, but he short y after expired. The case will, of course, undergo a complete investigation.

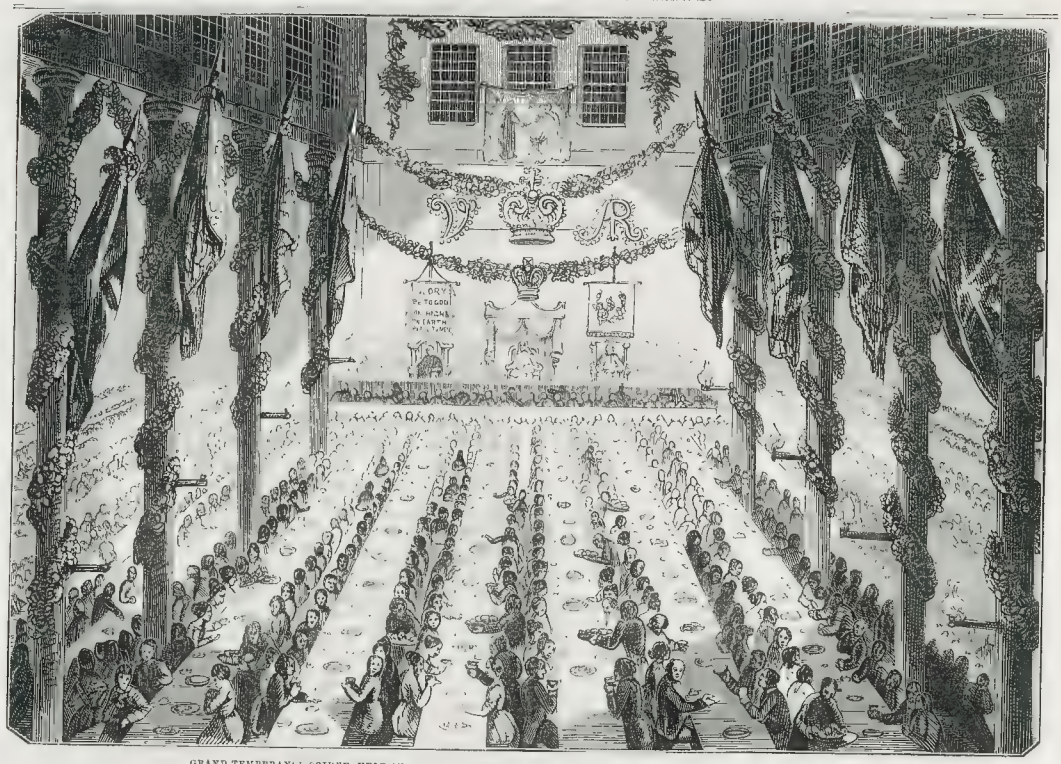
POLITICS.

The Paris papers of Wednesday have been received—they are chiefly devoted to observations on Sir R. Peel's speech on Friday last. That portion of his speech which describes the wishes and policy of his administration in regard to France, appears to have excited general admiration among the educated classes of the French capital. The Journal des Débats does full justice to the motives of the British minister, and sympathises warmly with the sentiments of that portion of Sir R. Peel's address, in which he drew attention to the noble spectacle of the two most illustrious warriors of the age uniting to exert their influence to secure for their respective countries the blessings of peace. As may be supposed, the opposition prints see nothing but hostility under it as manly and generous declaration, and are more virulent than ever.

We have received the Madrid journals of the 15th inst., but do not find in them a single paragraph worth noticing.



GRAND TEMPERANCE SOIREE, HELD IN THE CORN-EXCHANGE OF THE CITY OF CORK, ON THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1843.
Drawn on the instant by J. M'Donald, Esq., of Cork.

A great Temperance Festival has been held in Cork, of which we are enabled to give our readers a somewhat capacious notion, upon the principle that temperance upon a large scale cannot be morally offensive to any body, and may delight thousands with a contemplation of its innocent and not unvirtuous triumphs. "What are you?" exclaims the reader; "you have given us an agricultural meeting, a Corn-law League banquet, and now a temperance celebration. Do you speed the plough? Are you wedded to cheap bread? And when you drink, is it in the sense of aut Cæsar aut nullus—water or nothing?" To which we reply that agriculture is a glorious pursuit—that the cheaper bread becomes, the more easily it may be paid for by those who have the means to pay—and of drinking, that we do drink, but that we think it possible to be intemperate even in the element of water—so do not drink too much of that. Badinage apart, we are interpreters of the stirring news events of the time, and all remarkable instances of festive celebration—whether the banquets be wine banquets or water banquets, or negus banquets, which are a combination of both—are entitled to be recorded upon the pages of this journal, when not directly opposed to the better principles of our nature in example or design.

Now we give the engraving before us with great pleasure, because temperance is a negative virtue which we cannot do ill to encourage and commend. It is true that on the general question we stand, as on most others, upon neutral ground—that we applaud it in its moderate sense as simply negative, as a virtue of denial, tending to a thousand excellent results; and that we do not go so far as to discourage or forbid as much wholesome and well-timed enjoyment of innocent creature-comfort as may accord with the constitution and circumstances of those who are able to enjoy. Drunkenness we abhor, and adopt temperance most readily as the preventive of that most dangerous and unholy vice; but we would never use temperance as a weapon, either in a political or religious sense, but simply as an accompaniment of Christian morality. The temperance system of Father Mathew, in so far as we hope and believe it to be of good purpose and effect, we most heartily applaud; and if a harmless joke may be permitted us, think it much too good to throw cold water upon under any circumstances. We therefore present one of its most important celebrations to our readers as a gratifying evidence of the good which it has worked in the minds of those who have most profited by its adoption—one of its best and most eloquent features. We believe, too, that its operation has been peculiarly happy in Ireland—that the prestige in favour of its calming and soberizing influences—of its capability to weave the home-tie, and reclaim humble families from ruin and disgrace—of its tendency to increase domestic happiness, and pour secret and almost imperceptible joy into many an anxious bosom—of its direction in favour of industry, and against dissoluteness—gave it a charming power over the people, and lured them to adopt it with a fervour and enthusiasm hardly less potent than that inspired by drink itself. The excitement of the scene at Cork was in itself a sort of intoxication, but it was a very happy one, and passed its pleasing electricity from rank to rank, class to class, and creed to creed, without one angry distinction or one unbrotherly regret. Your medals of water, too, are, after all, better than your medals of blood; and the honours of temperance may, in the ordinary march of civilization, prove more humanizing than your honours of war. Thus does Father Mathew get his votes of thanks as well as Lord Ellenborough and our generals in the East; and nobody will deny the interest of the drama at which they are passed, if the following report of it deserves the credit which we are quite confident it does. Yet it will be remembered that our temperance is not a mere prejudice—that in advocating the use of all that Heaven bestows upon the earth for man, we do not exclude the juice of barley, wheat, or grape, appropriated in moderation, and in proper time and place; and, moreover, that although we introduce an illustration of the Cork Festival in terms of praise and grace, yet that it is not long since we gave, with similar hearty goodwill, a spirited engraving of the Licensed Victuallers anniversary dinner. Now to our report.—See page 130.

MISS MITFORD'S COTTAGE.

Here, gentle reader, is the pretty quiet dwelling-place of one to whom, if you have ever revelled in our English stories of fancy, and delighted in the pleasant literature of your native land, you must owe many moments of unalloyed gratification and delight. It is the cottage of Miss Mitford, the good and clever authoress of "Our Village;" but though a cottage only in its architecture, yet, by virtue of its noble occupancy, the mind may convert into a palace of poetry, fancy, imagination, and lofty thought.

Miss Mitford's own writings have always been invested with a peculiar charm, and have, amid all their varieties and versatility, the rare merit of being purely English. She is best known as the authoress of "Our Village," as the simple depictor of rustic life and hearts; the true, minute, honest delineator of rural nature. Her style of elaborating every feature of a country landscape, of taking care that there shall be no neglect of any of God's creatures who are cast upon her path; that birds, and cattle, and trees, and flowers, and streams, shall all have their share of her rustic pencil;—her groupings, village characters, and the effects of the vicissitudes of life within such an atmosphere of simplicity—these have been called twaddle by severer judges, but the great jury of society has consented almost universally to recognize them as picturesque, beautiful, and full of kindly influences, and the most innocent poetry of heart.

The view which we are here giving of the little cottage of Miss Mitford acquires a fresh present interest from a circumstance which it, however, pains us to record. If Miss Mitford be still there, we fear it is only to be surrounded by the contingencies of difficulty and distress. It would appear that the death of her father has left her in embarrassments which her own filial devotedness was the means principally of entailing upon herself. A very touching instance of her attentive care of her parent is related by that admirable writer Mrs. Sigourney, in her "Pleasant Memoirs of Pleasant Lands."

"The example of filial devotion exhibited by Miss Mitford adds lustre and grace to the rich imagery of her pages. An aged father, of whom she is the only child, is the object of her constant care. She is ever in attendance upon him, cheering him by the recital of passing events, and pouring into his spirit the fresher life of her own. The faithful performance of such high and holy duty contains within itself its own reward. I cannot withhold a sweet picture drawn by her pen, though sensible that she had no intention of its meeting the public eye. 'My father,' she writes, 'is a splendid old man, with a most noble head, a fine countenance full of benevolence and love, hair of silvery whiteness, and a complexion like winter berries. I suppose there was never a more beautiful embodiment of healthful and virtuous old age. He possesses all his faculties with the most vigorous clearness, but his health suffers, and my time is almost entirely devoted to his service, waiting upon him and reading to him by night and by day. He was affected at your message, and sends his blessing to you and yours. How to promote his comfort, in his advanced years and increasing infirmities, occupies most of my thoughts. It is my privilege to make many sacrifices to this pleasing duty; for with my dearest father, should I be so unhappy as to survive him, will depart all that binds me to this world.'"

MISS MITFORD'S COTTAGE.

The catastrophe which Miss Mitford here deprecates has passed, and her father is now no more. His orphan is harassed by the troubles that he has left behind; and an appeal has been made to the public to aid in a subscription that may liquidate her liabilities, and present to her the means—once free—of maintaining quiet respectability, with the pension she derives from the Government and the occasional exercise of her pen. The Literary Fund has advanced fifty pounds towards this end; many other noble and generous individuals have come forward, and we shall be glad to learn that ready tributes from hundreds of delighted admirers will repay her their debt of gratitude, and rescue their favourite from the anxieties which debt and poverty entail.

Sorry, indeed, should we be, and much ashamed to hear, that the step of want, at the moment of the crowning sorrow of her life, should be cruelly intruded into the cottage of "Miss Mitford;" or, that the authoress of "Our Village" should, like too many gifted creatures, in the hour of adversity want friends.

THE BLIND CHINESE CHILDREN, AGNES AND LAURA, READING THEIR LESSONS IN PUBLIC.

LONDON SOCIETY FOR TEACHING THE BLIND TO READ.

On Monday, Feb. 20, a numerous and highly respectable meeting of the friends of this society was held at the London Tavern, Bishopsgate-street; L. Heare, Esq., in the chair. The Rev. J. Ramsay, the secretary, read the report, from which it appeared that the benefits of the society had been conferred on 29 boarders on the establishment, besides upwards of 50 day scholars. It also alluded to the great superiority of teaching adopted by this society, which enabled the children, and even adults, to read with ease and facility, and which had been introduced into Egypt by a Mr. and Mrs. Leider, who came to England for the purpose of obtaining a knowledge of it, the prevalence of blindness in Egypt rendering such a work of mercy of the greatest importance. The whole of the Gospels of the New Testament, the Book of Psalms, the Book of Genesis, and several other books, had been printed by the society; and a few select hymns had been already embossed by one of the boys, which afforded an expectation that several inmates may ultimately become compositors, and thus be put in possession of a perfectly new method of earning a comfortable subsistence. The report concluded with the following appeal:—"To every feeling mind the peculiar affliction of blindness must excite the deepest commiseration; although it must ever be a cause of grateful praise that our God of love frequently thinks fit to bestow upon these objects of his tenderest compassion and care a double portion of cheerful intelligence; thus rendering them subjects of the Christian's brightest hopes, that, under his blessing, the society may be instrumental, not only in imparting to them secular knowledge, but, what is of far higher consideration, be the happy means of bringing them to Jesus, whom to know is life eternal." The report was received and adopted. The Chairman, in a long and eloquent speech, enforced the claims of the society upon public sympathy. The appearance of the poor blind children before them was a proof of the helplessness of their condition. By the instrumentality of that society they had attained a moral, intellectual, and a Christian education; and, although shut out from the light of the world, it had showed them the way to see that Light of Life which no one can take away or destroy. The children were then called upon to read various chapters in the Old and New Testaments, and the facility with which they turned to any particular portion of the Scripture selected excited the admiration of all present. Their style of reading would do honour to pupils possessing every natural function, and under the most careful scholastic tuition. Two Chinese children, "Agnes" and "Laura," were objects of great interest, and read their appointed lessons with English emphasis and discretion. Attempts were made to confuse them by presenting to their touch books of a different character from those to which they had been used, but the hoax was in every case promptly detected, and, after a moment's explanation, their names and character were readily announced. Several young women, also, whose sorrowful appearance was certainly not lessened by the large green spectacles with which their sightless eyes were covered, read and sang a variety of admirable pieces, to the wonder and delight of the audience. Several donations were announced, including £50 from the Goldsmiths' Company.

The system of tuition followed by this society is the one invented and zealously introduced by the late Mr. Lucas, of Castle-street, Bristol. Its principles are so simple, natural, and easy of acquisition, that they promise to supplant every previous method. But let us explain. It has been invariably found that persons who are deficient in one sense exercise those that are left to them more constantly, and for this reason, more accurately; for the senses are improved or educated by exercise. The exquisite fineness of touch and smell in the blind, like the quickness in the eye of the deaf, are to be attributed to the constant exercise of those organs. Those persons who are deprived of one or other of their senses will, to a great degree, supply the deficiency by the aid of those they still retain. Hearing and touch are especially cultivated by the blind: by the first they recognise speech and the endless variations and modifications of sound; by the second they become acquainted with the external form of objects. The chief art of the instructor of the blind, therefore, consists in supplying, through an indirect medium, those ideas of which his pupil cannot obtain a conception through the ordinary channels. Accordingly, we find that the invention of characters in relief was among the earliest measures taken for the instruction of the blind. In the first attempt, a modification of the squarely-formed letter of the Sclavonic alphabet was chosen; this was followed by various arrangements of triangular characters; but in both modes the number of letters and signs, and the general similarity of their forms, made a totally new system desirable. This, in 1834, was discovered and perfected by Mr. Lucas. Abandoning all previous methods, he adopted a modification of stenographic characters, together with a system of contractions, which while they more readily informed, actually refreshed the delicate sense of touch. This is now called the "Britannic Universal Alphabet for the Blind." It is composed of four straight lines and four semicircles, compounded with a sort of crotchet head; these form thirteen simple characters, and thirteen formed from the roots of these with a crotchet-head to each. There are ten double letters from the same roots, distinguished also by the crotchet-head; these also represent the nine figures and the cypher, whether used as numerals or ordinals. In all thirty-six characters are employed.

The manner in which the characters of Mr. Lucas are used may be seen in the following Psalm, only that the extract is given in Roman letters instead of using the stenographic characters.

It will be observed that the repetition of numerous letters is avoided; particles are represented, in most instances, by their initial letter, and when a word, having been once mentioned, recurs immediately or frequently, it is represented by its initial letter also.

The society recommend that teachers of the blind may be usefully employed in writing and embossing lessons, sums, or even music, for their use. This is done by means of a hard black-lead pencil, or by a stile (used by ladies in making eyelet holes), upon stiff paper, or on thin metal, similar to that used for coffin furniture.

For this purpose a small embossing cushion may be prepared of a piece of millboard about six inches by ten, covered with a double piece of thick baize strained lightly over it; and the whole again covered with a well-strained thick chamois leather. By this means a flat elastic cushion is formed, upon which the paper or metal to be embossed is placed, and the stile may be used freely without liability

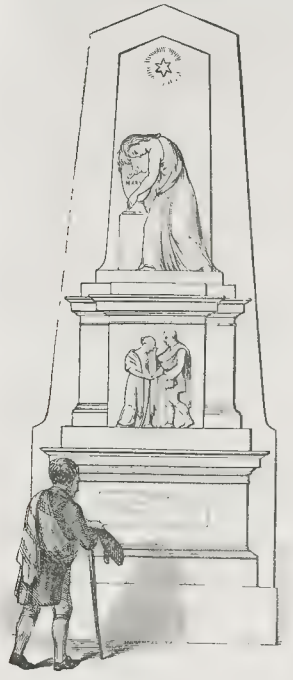
It may be necessary to remark here, that the letters of the alphabet by which the blind are first taught should be nearly twice as large as those by which their lessons are embossed; and this large alphabet may be used as a spelling-book for spelling at least several thousand words, of frequent recurrence, both monosyllables and dissyllabics.

The large alphabet may be embossed on the same metal as the lessons, and fastened to a piece of thin wood or millboard, of about five inches by six in size.



MONUMENT TO HIGHLAND MARY.

We have much pleasure in presenting the annexed sketch of a monument, just completed, to the memory of Burns's Highland Mary. It has been raised over her grave in the West Churchyard, Greenock. The erection is rather Roman than Grecian in its style, is pyramidal in form, and may be said to be divided into three compartments, the cornice-stones between which are elaborately carved. The first or lower compartment contains the inscription tablet. The second bears a bas-relief of Burns and Mary Campbell, representing their parting scene, when they plighted troth and exchanged Bibles across the "stream around the Castle o' Montgomery."

> Ayr, gurgling, kiss'd his pebbled shore,
> O'erhung with wild woods thick'ning green;
> The fragrant birch, and hawthorn hoar,
> Twin'd amorous round the raptur'd scene.

The third compartment contains a female figure emblematical of Grief, bending over an urn which her arms encircle, and upon which is carved the word "Mary." Above her head, and almost at the apex of the pyramid, a star with rays is cut, in remembrance of the beautiful invocation "to Mary in Heaven."

TO MARY IN HEAVEN.

> Thou ling'ring star, with less'ning ray,
> That lov'st to greet the early morn,
> Again thou usher'st in the day
> My Mary from my soul was torn!
> O Mary! dear departed shade!
> Where is thy place of blissful rest?
> See'st thou thy lover lowly laid?
> Hear'st thou the groans that rend his breast?

The inscription on the monument is simple:—

Sacred to Genius and Love—to Burns and Highland Mary.

The monument stands about seventeen feet high, was erected at the cost of £100, and is by far the most imposing object in this old churchyard. It was designed by Mr. Mossman, of Glasgow, the figures having been carved by the eldest of his three sons. The monument to Highland Mary is every way worthy of this family of sculptors.

THE GREAT MATHEW BANQUET.

On Thursday week (says an enthusiastic Cork contemporary) the magnificent demonstration of Teetotalism took place in the City of Cork; and if ever adequate powers of description were necessary for a journalist, it would be in the present instance. The demonstration was grand in its numbers, its rank, its intelligence, its wealth, its station, and its worth; but it was a thousand times more grand in the blending of all ranks and grades of society, in the union of men of all parties, and of every distinction of creed. It was glorious and soul-stirring in the unwearying and continued enthusiasm of the evening; it was interesting in the speeches delivered, from the glowing oratory of the great leader himself, to the untaught but splendid eloquence of the operative classes. It was more than that—it was the triumph of the Cause in the place of its birth, in the cradle of its youth, in the home of its vigorous manhood. The most sanguine aspiration of the old battlers for the cause of moral freedom, of those few gallant, fearless pioneers, who first broached the doctrine of Total Abstinence, and encountered the strong opposition of the interested, and the withering ridicule of the scorner—all was realized in the gorgeous assembly convened in honour of Father Mathew, Ireland's apostle and moral leader.

The Hall is a spacious and lofty building, of more than 75 feet square, and the roof is supported by two rows of light pillars along the centre. At the upper end a long platform was erected, on which was placed a table for about 150 or 200 guests. Before this table was erected a magnificent chair, divided into three compartments—that on the right for the guest of the evening, the centre for the Chairman, and that on the left was occupied by a worthy and active member of the society, Mr. William Galloway. This tripartite throne was upholstered with rich crimson drapery, and its pillars wreathed with flowers of every hue and colour. Over the centre part glittered the golden harp of Ireland; and over those on each side were two exquisite banners of white satin embroidered in gold and silver, and bearing mottoes appropriate to the occasion. High over all was the emblematic banner of the Temperance cause all over the world—representing peace, contentment, industry, frugality, happiness, and virtue. One would suppose that the festival was held in the midst of summer, when leafy trees waved to the light breeze, and brilliant flowers wantoned in the joyous sunshine—for the vast Hall resembled a gigantic bower of green boughs and brighter flowers. The pillars supporting the roof were almost concealed from sight with beautiful garlands, and from pillar to pillar the same tracery was suspended. The walls were hung with wreaths, festoons, garlands, and banners. Transparencies filled the windows on each side, and innumerable banners, flags, and streamers waved over all. The city arms adorned the upper end of the hall, and a beautiful golden crown was suspended by a bright wreath from two pillars in the centre of the hall, with a scroll bearing the motto—"Temperance; its members will support the Crown."

The crush at one time was absolutely terrific—several thousands arriving for accommodation, and seeking to obtain a place from which the best view of the magnificent display could be had.

Counsellor Walsh having taken the chair, he immediately rose and addressed the company. He said he had the high honour of being called on to fill the chair, in consequence of the lamentable indisposition of Mr. Lyons. He regretted that the best chief magistrate that the city possessed was not there to preside over them; but as all there were pledged friends, he would not plead inadequacy to fill the station, as they would overlook his errors. (Hear.) It was right, however, to premise that the society had long since given up the practice of drinking toasts (hear), so that any expression for the purpose of portraying them would be put in the shape of sentiments, and the first always given from the chair, as well as the first in the affections, was, "The Queen." (Cheers.) Feeling as they did, that in the vast extent of her empire there were many different shades of political opinion and religious belief, yet they all joined in affection to her person and crown, and rejoiced that they had one flaming that station anxious to promote the happiness and welfare of the people. (Hear.) He would then give, with the best feelings of his heart, and all the enthusiasm that the sentiment nature has crowned, and rejoiced that they had one flame wide reputation, as with men less known to fame indeed, but still not unvisited by the Muse. Southey, Lamb, and Coleridge first published in Bristol. Burns in Kilmarnock. Such towns as Glasgow, Cork, and Newcastle have their local poets, who in more favourable circumstances might achieve a higher reputation than others whose compositions are ushered into the world with more flourishing of trumpets and beatings of drums. Therefore it is that we always seize on a stray volume from any of those distant regions, and devour the contents with eagerness.

We gather from Mr. Daniel's preface, as well as from various passages in his poems, that he has a high opinion of his own powers. The following passage may perhaps afford our readers some amusement:—

> Few or none of the miscellaneous poems in this volume would have been published a second time to the world, had they not been admired by many whose taste and intelligence are alike unquestionable. The author must be pardoned for making the above statement, as it appears somewhat egotistical, but, at the same time, had it not been the case, he would neither have published this work nor have ventured to solicit the notice or assistance of a single individual. The reader will perceive, on an attentive perusal, that a great disparity exists in the poetical merits of the different productions. This is in some measure attributable to the time at which they were written, some being composed at an early, others at a later age. All, however, have been carefully revised, and several have received considerable additions, especially the Monody on Shelly. The hypercritic may magnify little blemishes and errors, which are of no real consequence, but he has invariably a large share of envy—and Livy tell us, "Cæca invidia est, nec quid quam aliud sit quam detrectare virtutes."
> The over-fastidious may be disgusted at a strong expression or a ragged line, no matter how excellent the thought that expression or that line may embody;—but it would be manifestly absurd to engage in the thankless and impossible task of giving those gentlemen complete satisfaction. Besides these, there is

> "The bookful blockhead, ignorantly read,
> With loads of learned lumber in his head,"

who sets up for an oracle in the whole Cyclopedia of human learning. The influence of such characters in the world is, however, little or nothing; they may talk themselves hoarse without changing those views and opinions, which, as they result from steady, unbiassed minds, and taste unaffected by the false and meretricious dogmas of rules and systems, move in harmony with nature, and afford the only solid foundation for a criticism true and legitimate.

Now, there is rather too much assumption about this tone for our liking. Modesty is the unfailing attendant of genius; the conceited prig is invariably a dunce. Mr. Daniel evidently possesses considerable sensibility, an ear for versification, and some fancy, but he is far from having done anything to entitle him to play Sir Oracle at this rate. We hardly expect to see him attain greater distinction than this volume may gain for him. His style, such as it is, bears all the marks of being formed: it is like the production of a person in middle life, as we should take him to be from other indications contained in his volume. Whatever of crudeness there may be in the thoughts and expressions, there is nothing of immaturity. He has been content to be too much of an imitator, and, notwithstanding all the self-confidence he occasionally shows, has trusted but little to himself. The first poem, "The Bride of Scio," recalls Byron in every line. The monody on Shelley is equally in the manner of the poet to whose memory it is dedicated. Shorter pieces throughout the volume are redolent of Campbell and Moore. His genius is evidently not dramatic. "Ormesinda, or the Betrothed," a three-act tragedy, is formed on the very worst model he could have selected, the dramatists of the last century: it is full of their faults of turgid rant and overdrawn cast-iron character. There are repeated grievous sins of grammar, proceeding, no doubt, from carelessness or self-love, which he would do well to correct; e. g.:—

> Not one for whom each tell tale eye
> Would gaze upon so meltingly.
> —The immortal maids,
> Though beckoning from their bowers of fadeless bloom,
> Would vainly beckon, if beside me stood > Thee, lovely Ormesinda.

We hardly know whether we shall be thanked for pointing out such defects—indeed, we are pretty sure we may expect no gratitude. Mr. Daniel will no doubt refer us to his fables of "The Conceited Mole," or "The Fly and the Architect."

We should not do justice, if we did not add that many passages are written with much force and vigour, although continually reminding us of what we have before read. Take the following from the monody:—

> There is a certain pleasure in the tear
> Shed for the great, whose burning thoughts retain,
> An immortality beyond the bier,
> Upkindling others in the living brain,
> That muses on them, even as a strain
> Forgotten, with new melody awakes,
> At some sweet song. Oh yet there doth remain,
> A something which of death a glory makes,
> That withers not through age, nor changes, nor forsakes!
> Oh! there be names that wear an halo round them,
> The beauty of whose splendour fadeth not,
> And this world's narrow limits only bound them
> In their far journey. Men and empires rot,
> Proud cities fall and are the homes of—what?
> The bittern and the serpent. Nothing can
> The name of genius from memory blot.
> Worshipp'd when first its glorious race began,
> And will the spirit haunt of the last living man?
> Oblivion's voiceless waters may not roll,
> In darkness over thee thou gifted one!
> For that undying flame which fired thy soul,
> Kindled in some bright region of the sun,
> Remains undimm'd behind this. Years may run
> Their never ceasing round, and slow decay,
> Fall like a shadow the green earth upon,
> The Heavens dissolve, the star-orbs roll away,
> All fade, except the mind's imperishable ray.

The book may be considered one out of many examples that, in the present age, from the multitude of models made to use, it is possible, with little original genius, but with a mind well imbued with that of others, to write very fair poetry. So far Mr. Daniel is an exception to the class of writers to whom he belongs, and of whom we spoke at the commencement of this article. Had he leaned more on himself, he might have written what would have been better worth preserving, for there are individual verses which show greater capabilities than appear from the general quality of the poems. Such are these:—

> There is a silent worship of the eyes,
> The faltering tongue in vain attempts to reach,
> The burning thought to deep emotion dies,
> That moment here is speech.
> Some pangs there are no tongue may tell
> That in the soul too deeply dwell,
> Emotions o'er some spirits steal,
> That lowlier minds may never feel.

Several poems are added in the dialects of Cornwall and Devonshire, which we do not admire.

NEW MUSIC.

THE ZEPHYR WALTZES, for the Pianoforte. Composed and dedicated to Charles Hitchings, Esq., by A. J. Rexford. Price 2s. Cramer, Addison, and Beale.

Four waltzes, with introduction and coda à la Strauss, very light and graceful, if not very original. But it would be invidious to look for this latter quality in this "done-to-death" style of composition: elegance of melody and correct harmony are quite enough to satisfy, and these are to be found in the "Zephyr Waltzes."

THE SONG OF THE ZEPHYR. The poetry by Charles Hitchings, Esq., the music by A. J. Rexford. Price 2s. 6d. Cramer, Addison, and Beale.

A most graceful and effective cavatina. Mr. Rexford's name is new to us, but we have no hesitation in recommending this elegant song alike to the musician and amateur. The poetry, also, is excellent.

OLD ENGLAND FOR EVER! The stanzas by Dr. Raffles, the music by Edward Wilson. Price 2s. W. Blackman (for the author).

This song consists of five short stanzas to as short a melody (only ten bars), which, as far as it goes, is not objectionable; but the want of variety is too apparent.

FOR ENGLAND AND THE QUEEN; or, Our gallant Ship has righted! Song. The music by T. Williams. Price 2s. Metzler and Co.

A simple but energetic melody, with accompaniment of befitting character. It cannot fail to produce a lively effect on the ears of every one who will sincerely and loyally say, in the words of the song, "For England and the Queen, my boys, huzza!"

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL CHIT-CHAT.

A THEATRICAL ROW IN ITALY.—The Carlo Theatre at Genoa, on the night of the 16th inst., was crowded to excess for the first appearance, this season, of Clara Novello, whose reception was most flattering. The eternal "Puritani" again! The movements which create so much enthusiasm sung by the artists in Paris and London fell flat on the ear: no encores, and but little applause. In the second act Clara Novello had no sooner terminated the cadenza at the end of her first solo in the cabaletto, than certain persons in the pit indulged in very strong expressions of disapprobation. The pet of the Romans felt indignant at this treatment: she knitted her brow, bit her lip, looked daggers, and abruptly left the stage. Symphony of the orchestra ended—no prima donna! Since the far-famed Tacconi-rini riot, at the Queen's Theatre, in London, we never heard such a charivari of whistling, hissing, shouting, and clapping of hands. The curtain, after some minutes' delay and confusion, was lowered; the noise still increased, and the public becoming "dangerous" impatient for explanation, the impresario obeyed the summons: no sooner had the word "indisposizone" escaped his lips than a volley of hoots and shouts put an end to further apology. Again delay and consultation, and curtain up; "Sinora la trombe," the scene which follows the soprano sir, was next attempted amidst increased uproar. Now the storm was at its height. At last the curtain was again lowered and again raised, and, behold, there stood the indignant prima donna, all submissive, trembling, and deadly pale! In a few seconds the orchestra resumed the aria, and after executing a few bars most inaudibly and reluctantly, she abruptly broke off, approached the lamps, and addressed the audience in Italian. She stated that she was fatigued by her recent travelling, and was unwell; she had been forced to sing; she had endeavoured to do her best, but she had no voice left, and entreated the public to be indulgent. After this reasonable appeal she was greatly applauded, and retired; the curtain again was lowered, and thus ended the first performance of "Puritani" in Genoa. In a stage-box of this elegant and beautiful theatre were Albertazzi and her sister. It must have been particularly mortifying to the insulted prima donna to know that the above scene was witnessed by her countrywomen and a sister artiste. The latter is on her way to England.

MADAME VIARDOT GARCIA.—We are given to understand that this celebrated vocalist does not intend visiting us this season.

ITALIAN OPERA AT CONSTANTINOPLE!—This phenomenon has been announced, from more than one authority, as having recently taken place in the City of the Sultan. The representation took place in the harem of the Sultana Validé, and the opera chosen for the occasion was "Belisario." It is further stated that the beautiful Circassians were so moved by the pourtrayed miseries of the old Roman warrior that one, in a fit of exalted commiseration, threw a purse of gold at the feet of the supposed unfortunate!

VICTOR HUGO.—A new play entitled "Les Burgraves," by this prolific writer, is shortly to be produced at the Comédie Française, Paris.

EXPECTED FOREIGNERS.—Amongst the host of forthcoming importations to add their strength to the reunion musicale of the approaching season, we perceive the names of the great Spohr, who by the way has a hankering after the white cliffs,—Mendelssohn, already an adopted son of Albion,—Dreyschock, the young pianist, who is to obliterate all memory of his predecessors,—Vieuxtemps, who has been called the rival to Paganini, and Sivori, the favourite pupil of that great man, "whose bones now blanch at superstition's scowl!" While learning and liberality are walking hand-in-hand over the civilized earth, can it be that the once mighty mistress of the world should now be so grovelling and debased as to carry religious bigotry beyond the grave, "snuffing up with its Moloch nostril the scent" of its victim's eternal perdition!

GRAND CONCERT IN THE CITY.—On Monday evening last the grand concert for the benefit of the widows and orphans of the crews of the Reliance and Conqueror took place at the Universal Hall of Commerce, Threadneedle-street, which, for the first time, was devoted to the purposes of music, and which, spacious as it is, was crowded to excess by a noble and fashionable auditory. The concert opened with Mozart's immortal overture to "Die Zauberflote" which was beautifully performed by a most efficient band led by Mr. F. Cramer. Next followed, appropriately enough, Boyce's lovely duet, "Here shall soft charity repair," which was excellently sung by Messrs. Shoubridge and C. Purday. "Bid me discourse" was given by Miss Towers with exquisite freedom and power. The cabaletto "Sull' aria" was a most brilliant and effective performance by the Misses Birch. Kalliwoda's masterly composition, "The Gravedigger" is not very well suited to Mrs. A. Toulmin's powers, but her reading of this aria lugubre was good, particularly in the words of the last line, "The grave-digger and his poor child, so dear!" which were given with great beauty and pathos. Mr. Harrison's execution of Rossini's cavatina from "The Lady of the Lake" was much indebted to Mr. Lazarus's exquisite clarionet obligato accompaniment. "Let the bright Seraphim" was sweetly, but feebly sung by Mrs. C. Harper; it requires a full and easily wielded voice to stand against the powerful trumpet accompaniment in Keller's German song, "Der Blinde." In "Prendi! per me," the joint production of Benedict and De Beriot, Mrs. Alfred Shaw's magnificent voice seemed joyously to expand its extraordinary beauties, as if surprised by the pleasant and unexpected opportunity which the immense space afforded it. This was particularly apparent in the last line of the song, "Immensa è l'estasi del mio placer," which she gave with all her heart and soul, and which called down one of the most vehement encores we ever heard. Mr. Shaw, in the performance of the beautiful aria, in our opinion, eclipsed all her former great exertions. The first part of this delightful concert concluded with the celebrated trio from "Il Matrimonio Segreto" (in English), which was most perfectly sung by Miss Birch, Miss Rainforth, and Mrs. A. Shaw. The three ladies' voices harmonized together in the most exquisite manner. In the reproachful passage, "Young ladies," or, as it is more powerfully reproving in Italian, "Vergogna!" the low notes of Mrs. Shaw told with astonishing beauty and effect. We never heard the trio so well done before. Part II. of the concert commenced with Weber's Grand Overture to Euryanthe (Leader, Mr. Loder), and produced the noblest effect. Miss Rainforth sang "Wappug old stairs" so very sweetly as to deserve a hearty encore. A fantasia on the cornet-à-pistons was most beautifully executed by Mr. Harper, jun. Horn's lovely duet, "I know a bank," was most charmingly sung by the Misses Fyne, two extremely juvenile artistes, but who give ample promise of maturing into first-rate talent. The last vocal piece was "Mary of Castle Carey," by Wilson, which was given with all his characteristic pathos and pure simplicity. The concert terminated with a "Finale" (instrumental), by Haydn, leaving but one feeling on the delighted minds of the numerous auditory—that of the greatest satisfaction at seeing the highest intellectual enjoyment waiting as a nurse and handmaid upon Charity!

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

The Emerald tender arrived at Devonport from Portsmouth on the 12th inst. and sailed on the 15th inst., with 12 first-class boys, drafted from the San Josef for the Excellent. The Gorgon steam-vessel, Capt. C. Hotham, was paid advance of wages, and sailed on the 15th for the West Indies, with her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires, Col. Wilson, to La Guayra. After landing the gallant colonel, she will proceed to South America. The Rhadamanthus steam vessel, Master Commander T. H. Laen, arrived from Woolwich and Portsmouth. She is now alongside the yard shipping jury gear for the Royal Albert and Victoria yacht, building at Pembroke. The Royal yacht will be ready to go off the stocks in the spring.—In Harbour, in Commission: The Caledonia, the San Josef, the Sylph tender, the Spiteful, the Rhadamanthus, the Africa, and the Confiance steam-vessels, the Diligence transport, and the Rochester and the Devon lighters.—Appointments: R. C. Mould and T. Simpson ordered to retire as Commanders. Lieutenants R. Williams, of the Thunderer, and Colin Kane of the Caledonia, have been allowed to exchange ships. Second Masters G. E. Maitland and W. H. Carver (additional), to the Caledonia; and J. J. Bell, to the Rhadamanthus.

PURSERS.—The half-pay of these officers will be increased from the 1st of April next, as we observe in the navy estimates an additional sum of £6200 is taken up on this head. Some are to have £155 2s. 6d. per annum, or 8s. 6d. per diem.

DEATH OF COLONEL MIDDLETON.—This officer, formerly a colonel in the 42nd Highlanders, was appointed Barrack-Master at Woolwich last year, on the retirement of Mr. Allen Mackenzie from the situation. About a fortnight ago, Col. Midd eton was taken ill from the effects of cold, and died on Saturday last at Woolwich.

The number of officers, non-commissioned officers, and rank and file which it is proposed to maintain for the service of the United kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland (exclusive of the troops employed in the East Indies) for the year, commencing on the 1st of April, 1843, to the 31st of March, 1844, is 100,846.

The total estimated amount to be provided for the army services for the year, commencing on the 1st of April next is £6,225,103. This amount, compared with the estimates voted for the year ending on the 31st of March, shows a decrease of £1,045,105 to be provided for £139 323, this amount being £94,836 less than 1842 3 for the effective services, and £44,487 less than the present financial year for the non-effective services.

The charge of the land forces at home and abroad for the ensuing year is £4,501,708. From this sum is to be deducted the expenses of four regiments of Cavalry and 23 of Infantry, employed in the East Indies; and the expenses of the East India depôts at Maidstone and Chatham. This charge, amounting to £909,200, is defrayed by the East India Company. There is also a deduction of £73,181, being appropriations in aid. This leaves the sum of £3,619,327 to be provided for her Majesty's land forces at home and abroad, exclusive of India.

We give an extract from a letter of a correspondent at Enfield, containing a challenge, which we have no doubt will be accepted by some chivalrous spirits in the same good feeling with which it is given—"As the representative of a small chess club in Enfield, I am desired to say that we shall be happy to play a friendly game by post, with any parties or club so desirous of playing. ENGLISH OPERA HOUSE.

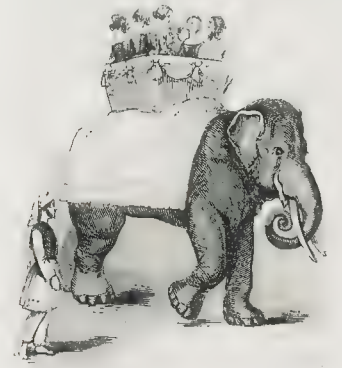
THE ELEPHANT.

We have had the task of introducing various theatrical lions to the readers of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, from tragedians to vocalists, from the professors of the poetry of motion to the supporters of the "heavy business"—each in turn has found a niche in our columns. From lions the transition is easy to elephants, and lo! another Chuny, not pantomimic, but a real, living, moving animal, who, having packed up his trunk and left his forest home, makes a nightly bow on his knees to the "enlightened audiences" who throng the English Opera to gaze at him. As one of the strange "sights of London" we give the sketches; and, subject to the reservations which we have before expressed as to the general nature and tendency of such exhibitions, we must do this theatrical novelty the justice of declaring him a very docile, quiet, and decidedly amusing performer, with less impudence and more skill than many of his biped predecessors upon the same boards. Our engraving truly depicts one of his feats as he carries his Mr. Jameson chardy and tenderly upon his monstrous tusks. The care with which he steps over the prostrate man who lies under his ponderous feet, and the caution he displays ere he plants his great limbs lest they hurt his keeper, are interesting evidences of the nature of the elephant, and afford another curious proof of the power of man over those animals physically capable of crushing him in a moment; another instance of physical force bowing before the supremacy of a superior brain.



NAPOLEON'S TOMB.—Marshal Duc de Reggio, accompanied by General Petit, Generals Athalin and Gourgaud, who had been deputed by the King, and all the staff of the Hôtel des Invalides, proceeded to remove, preparatory to the works of the monument to Napoleon, the imperial crown, the hat, and the sword of Austerlitz, which had remained on the coffin since the day of the funeral. The whole of the Invalides were in full dress, and were drawn up on either side of the procession. These relics were afterwards deposited in an apartment in the hotel prepared for their reception.

MURDER TWENTY-SIX YEARS AGO. DEATH-BED CONFESSION OF A MURDERER.—On Saturday, the 26th of April, 1817, a daring and revolting murder was committed at the house of Mr. Littlewood, grocer, adjoining the burial-ground of Brunswick Chapel, Pendleton. The victims were Mrs. Margaret Marsden, the housekeeper, aged 75, and Hannah Partington, the servant, a very fine young woman, aged 20. The object of the perpetrators of this foul deed was robbery; for, on the discovery of the murder by Mr. Littlewood, on returning at night from his shop, in Chapel-street, Salford, where he carried on the business of a grocer, it was found that upwards of £160, principally in one and two pound notes, a gold watch, and other articles, had been taken from a drawer in the room in which he and Mrs. Littlewood slept. The two servants were found dead in the kitchen, the elderly woman sitting in a chair, with her head bowed down upon her breast, and the girl lying on her face on the floor. Both their skulls were dreadfully fractured with the pistol and a cleaver, and altogether the murder appeared to have been of the most cold-blooded and determined character. From various circumstances of strong suspicion, five men, named James Ashcroft the elder, David Ashcroft, James Ashcroft the younger, William Holden, and John Robinson, were apprehended, and tried at Lancaster before Baron Richards, at the August assizes (Friday, September 5th), 1817. Although not direct, the evidence was strongly circumstantial, and the jury found the three Ashcrofts and William Holden guilty, but acquitted Robinson. On the following Monday (September 8th, the Ashcrofts and Holden were executed, but every one of them, "calling their God to witness," died protesting their innocence, and singing a hymn. Nevertheless, the public were perfectly satisfied of their guilt, about which there never seemed to be a doubt until Thursday, the 9th inst., when an old man, aged 74, named John Holden (the uncle, we believe, of the man who was hung), living at a very disreputable place, called Egypt, on the right hand side of the road between Leigh and Chowbent, finding himself on the point of death, confessed to two women, whom he called to the bedside for the purpose, that he was the perpetrator of the murder above referred to, but that he did not commit the robbery. On the following day he died.

ANNIVERSARIES.

FAIR ON THE THAMES.

Those who remember what has been, not at all improperly, called an "old-fashioned winter," will hardly give the name of winter at all to the state of the atmosphere and the elements by which the heat and cold of the last four months have been regulated; indeed, if it were not for the shortness of the days, the occasional visitations of the fogs, and the mud by which the streets and the passengers are defiled, and for a few hours here and there of what is now called frost, the inhabitants of London would feel but little difference between July and January; and, with the exception of harvesting and haymaking, things which require a certain portion of sunshine, the rural population of the kingdom might carry on their agricultural pursuits almost as well at Christmas as at Midsummer, without any reference to the diversity of their labours requiring a diversity of seasons for their perfection. But our ancestors were acquainted with another state of things, and they who lived in the year 1814 have experienced some difference of temperature between summer and winter.

It was in the winter of 1813-14 that Europe experienced, and England, in particular, a specimen of what the Genius of Frost was capable of doing when he went about his work in earnest. It was in this eventful winter that Napoleon retreated from Moscow, amidst the horrors of cold, desolation, and famine; and it was in the winter of this year that Winter, "canos hirsuta capillos," shook the icicles from his beard over the inhabitants of London, and took old Father Thames into custody. In other words, it was in the winter of 1814 that the Thames, as represented in the above plate, was so completely frozen over, that what has been very appropriately called "Frost Fair" was celebrated on its surface. The frost set in with a cold, piercing easterly wind, on the 27th December, 1813, and lasted, with little intermission of its intensity, until the 5th of February following. So hard was the surface of the river for several weeks, and so thick the ice, that a long road, or rather street, which was called the City-road, was formed from Blackfriars-bridge to old London-bridge (there was in those days no Southwark-bridge to intercept the view of the whole space of the river lying between the above-mentioned termini). On each side of this long street were booths of all descriptions; dancing, eating, drinking, smoking, &c. were going on without intermission all day and all night. There were printing-presses, "inter alia;" and songs, poems, and descriptions setting forth the triumphs of "Frost" were printed and eagerly bought up by the multitudes who thronged to see the wonders. Gambling-booths, shows, and so forth were in abundance; in short, the whole river represented an immense Saturnalia, an enormous Bartholomew fair. There were fires blazing, sausages frying, fiddlers tuning, horns blowing, and groups of dancers in incessant employment and requisition; such a scene had not been witnessed since the year 1788, when something of the same sort took place, but on a smaller scale and for a shorter time. In 1683-4 the frost fair described by Evelyn was held on the Thames, and from the description given by that amusing chronicler it must have been the very counterpart of the fair in 1813-14. What is a singular coincidence the thaw on that occasion took place on the very same day in 1684 as the thaw in 1814. There was a similar sort of fair on the Thames in 1715-16, but the cold was not so intense. Those who remember the frost in 1814 will congratulate themselves on the change which has taken place in the climate of England within the last few years. A frost fair is a very pleasant thing to read about, and a very agreeable thing to remember—"Olim meminisse juvabit"—but when Father Frost takes Father Thames by the nose, it is quite time for poor mortals to get out of the way and congratulate themselves for being exempted from a visit of this mighty and unrelenting potentate. Skaters might have complained of this absence of frost some few years ago, because in those days the ingenuity of the inventors of the artificial ice had not discovered itself, and helped the public to an agreeable amusement exempt from a very disagreeable concomitant. In other words there was not till within the last year a "Glaciarium," of which a view is given below, upon which the most delicate young lady or old gentleman, addicted to skating, could cut figures of eight, spread eagles, and such like devices, without the fear of being frostnipt, or destroyed in the bud. But now this pleasant pastime may be carried on at the Baker-street Bazaar, whatever may be the state of the weather. Art has supplied the forgetfulness of nature, and there the skaters can, and in fact do, enjoy the sport upon the artificial surface laid down by the patentees, as fully as if skimming the surface of a Dutch canal, or gliding through the mazes of a Lapland lake. The artificial scenery at this place is so well contrived, that the skater may imagine himself in the midst of Switzerland. The trees, the cottages, the shrubs, the very weeds, the sky, the distant prospect—all is winter, congelation, and frost, whilst, at the same time, the atmosphere is bland and genial. But to return to "Frost Fair." When the thaw came, and the ice began to break, the view on the river was one which, in strangeness of effect, and ruggedness of grandeur, was never equalled in London. The whole river was a mass of moving icebergs, rolling along with the tide, striking against each other, and against the piers of the bridges, with a most deafening and continuous noise, a miniature representation of what may be supposed to take place in the Arctic regions, when winter yields to the coming spring. This notice of "Frost Fair" will, with the engraving affixed, enable our readers to estimate what once was an "olden winter," and to rest satisfied with a sufficiency of real ice to cool their champagne at Epsom or Ascot races, without longing for such a taste of Boreas and his companion, "ruffian winds," as will congeal their blood, and bring coals to something like £5 a ton.

COURSING.

ASHDOWN PARK MEETING.

The papers now afford particulars of the meetings which form the latest of the present season; but ere coursing is over we make place for our sketch of the sport. On Tuesday the Ashdown Park meeting came off.

Various authors have taken up the pen in praise of COURSING, but too much cannot be said in its favour. The sport is good and the cost small, and the joys of this form of the chase are therefore more generally diffused than can be the case where expensive packs and five-hundred guinea horses are requisite. The "Oracle of Rural Life" says justly—

Coursing is productive of a great stock of amusement amongst country gentlemen and their tenants. With the latter it has been and ever will be a very favourite pastime, for more reasons than one. It is attended with expenses within their command, which is not always the case with the charges incurred by those who aspire to fox-hunting; and, as it is an emulative sport, it creates a spirit of rivalry amongst neighbours in the comparative excellence of their dogs, which tends greatly to relieve the somewhat dull routine of a farmer's life in retired parts of the country.

The comparative speed between the greyhound and the racehorse has been more than once tried, as far as circumstances would admit, although a difficulty has always been in the way of a really fair trial, from want of that command over the former which is always to be enforced over the latter. It has hitherto been found to be in favour of the racehorse, but doubts are entertained whether, if a hare could be made to run in view over a straight course of one mile, the greyhound would not be the winner. Still, whatever may be the symmetry and high breeding of the greyhound, he can acquire no celebrity in the field at the present day, unless he be brought into the highest state of condition of which his nature and physical powers are capable. In fact, he must undergo very much the same treatment in his training that the racehorse undergoes to bring him well to the post. The state of the blood, as well as the state of the body, must be strictly attended to, one being in a very material degree dependant on the other, for if the latter be permitted to become overloaded with flesh, the former will become sizy and viscid, considerably affecting respiration, which should be as free from such obstruction as possible.

The editor of the "Courser's Manual" says, "the good or bad condition of greyhounds almost entirely depends upon the manner as well as the means by which they are supported; those who keep them in high condition, and at all times ready for sport during the coursing season, are very particular in respect of their food, which, it is clear, should be highly nutritious without being difficult of digestion. Broths and gelatinous substances, incorporated with raspings, soaked biscuits, oatmeal, or bread made from the latter and wheat flour (equal parts), intermixed with a few beaten eggs, then formed into small loaves, and given with broth boiled from sheep's heads, properly broken to pieces for the purpose, are well adapted to keep the frame in a due degree of strength for bodily exertion without over-distending the intestinal canal, or tending to promote constipation, so soon as which is at any time observed a mild mercurial aperient ball should be administered.

Greyhound kennels should differ from others, inasmuch as they should be in small compartments, sufficient for four greyhounds and no more, and above all they should be of equal temperature. The temperature good for a horse is good for a box of four greyhounds. The feeding-place should be under cover, and close at hand. Not more than four should be fed at a time; in short, four are too many. For one will eat twice as much as another in the same time. In summer, the greyhounds may be let out in yards, but not more than four dogs in the same yard; and the yards should be walled, so as to prevent them from looking out. Greyhounds should be taken out with a man on foot every day during the summer, to run and play about; it keeps their muscles in good play, and they will be as quiet again in their kennels after it.

So passionately fond of coursing was the late Lord Orford, that, although in a very bad state of health, nothing could restrain him from appearing in the field on the day his favourite bitch, Czarina, from appearing in the field on the day his favourite bitch, Czarina, was to run a match of some consequence. The bitch won, when in the moment of the highest exultation, and in the eagerness of his triumph, he fell from his pony and almost immediately expired. His lordship was the first to try the bold experiment of crossing the breed of greyhounds with the English bull-dog, in opposition to the general opinions of the sporting world, but after breeding thus on for seven removes, it more than answered his expectations in producing the best dogs of his day.

FLORICULTURE.

THE TWO-EDGED LÆLIA—LÆLIA ANCEPS.

This elegant plant is of easy culture in an orchideous house; grows best in a pot half filled with broken pots—a little moss put over them, and filled up with a compost of tough fibrous peat, in roughish lumps, raised up above the rim of the pot. Temperature, when growing, 70 to 75 deg. Fahr.; when not growing, 60 to 65. deg. It is a native of Mexico, where, amid the profusion and gorgeous vegetation of that climate, it grows luxuriantly, without culture or attention. The generic characteristics of this race are—segments of the perianth spread wide open; sepals lanceolate, equal; petals rather larger than the sepals; labellum resupinate, three-lobed, wrapped round the column; column fleshy, destitute of wings; pollen masses eight. The specific characteristics—pseudo-bulbs, one-leaved, ovate, rather squared, seated on a stout rhizoma. Flowers in twos and threes, sometimes four, at the top of a two-edged muricated spike, two to three feet long, ovarium covered with a viscid matter; sepals and petals lanceolate, acuminate, of a beautiful rosy lilac colour. Labell ın with the lateral lobe rounded off, the centre projecting considerably, acute, resembling the richest purple velvet; the interior of the lip beautifully marked with crimson and yellow veins, traversed lengthwise by a thick fleshy ridge, which at its extremity divides into three points. The flowers are very durable, and give an odour like Lonev.

LORD BROUGHAM.

"A very gifted gentleman, a worthy friend of mine, M. de Tocqueville, absolutely wrote a book and made a speech a short time back, in which he said the right of search was never heard of before; that it was a horrible measure, because it was to be exercised in what he called the solitude of the ocean; and further, he said that it was more intolerable, because it left one foreign country to decide on the measures of another foreign country. Marvellous ignorance of the whole question! M. de Tocqueville should be more accurate as to facts; he ought to know, if not the X Y Z, at least the A B C of his subject, before he undertakes to discuss the merits of a question of which his ignorance at present is so extraordinary—so incredibly profound."

Is not the above extract of one of Lord Brougham's latest speeches a most characteristic touch of the great schoolmaster as well as of the man. How easily and gracefully does the noble ex-Chancellor annihilate the pretensions of his "worthy friend." With what inimitable irony does Lord Brougham convict the "very gifted gentleman" of utter ignorance on the subject about which he (M. de Tocqueville) "absolutely wrote a book* and made a speech."

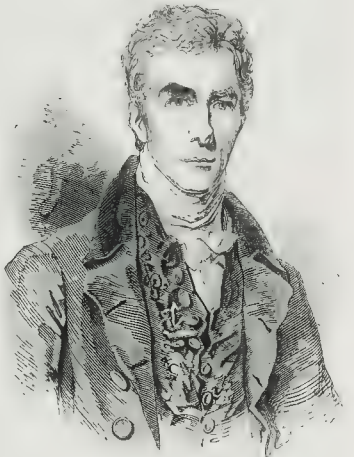
Seriously speaking, Lord Brougham's first attack on his absent friend, and on a distinguished foreigner and writer, was not signalised by much discretion and good taste; but, in the tone and temper of his lordship's reply to the very intemperate, and even coarse, communication of M. de Tocqueville, there is much to admire. Lord Brougham is not famed, generally speaking, for his moderation and delicacy when attacked, but in this instance he seems to have changed characters with M. de Tocqueville, who has the reputation of being a remarkably temperate and inoffensive person. It results from the very curious correspondence that has been exchanged between these two distinguished disputants, that one of the most eminent men in France has been writing and speaking on a subject in total ignorance of its right bearings, and that the French Legislative Chamber, without distinction of men or parties, has completely shared this ignorance. In short, to place the controversy in the fewest words—that France, who has been relying on the United States as the steady opponent of the principle of the right of search, has been unaware that the Americans had at one time actually agreed to a right of search stronger than the one that is now exercised by the Great Powers by virtue of the treaties of 1831, 1833, and 1841!

Now, whatever may be the merits of the mere personal controversy, it must be admitted that Lord Brougham has rendered an essential service to his country, and to Europe generally, by his happy exposure. It is of inestimable value as regards America, for, after the high-sounding pretensions of the Transatlantic statesmen, it is really quite "refreshing" (we believe we use a word of Lord Brougham's coining) to have their inconsistencies set forth, just as their good faith has been shown up by the awkward disclosures relative to the boundary dispute.

We can feel, therefore, a pleasure in gracing our columns with the portrait of Harry Brougham, for we liked him best when he was the bold, daring, and uncompromising opponent of slavery—when he was the eloquent, accomplished advocate of popular education—when he was the courageous counsel at the bar of the House of Peers, defending the honour of an oppressed queen—when he was introducing in the Legislature his great legal reforms—when he was the independent member of Parliament, working for his country's weal. We have liked him less as the political partisan or party man; we have not admired him in his cameleon changes; we have smiled often at his charlatan pranks, and we have pitied him sincerely when he has descended to be the mere mountebank. With all his faults we love him still. He is a man of whom we have reason to be proud. Advocate, legislator, abolitionist, reformer, schoolmaster, peer, and Chancellor, still there is Harry Brougham.

This is not the place, nor perhaps the fitting period, for a biography of this distinguished legislator. It is history which must hereafter decide whether Lord Brougham is to be classed amongst the patriots and benefactors of his country. We shall not enter here on the charges of rashness, folly, and instability brought against him by his enemies. It is posterity which will judge most accurately his efforts to improve the condition of the labouring classes by the march of education. But one grand experiment—one great work—speaks too home to our actual feelings to be unnoticed here. Lord Brougham is the parent of the new Poor-law Bill. He was the daring innovator on the humanity of the Elizabethian code. Lord Brougham's panacea for England's social misery has been a wretched failure. He has neither raised the character of the peasant and operative, nor has he yet found resources for the humane provision of the indigent. He has subjected the honest labourer to oppression and cruelty; he has attacked the dearest ties of kindred, and yet has the Poor-law Bill failed to reduce the rates of the tax-payer, to alleviate the distress of the industrious artisan, and to reduce the quantum of human suffering in the country.

Lord Brougham's political and parliamentary career has been marked by curious changes. It is difficult to follow him in his oscillations and tergiversations. The extraordinary evolutions of his fertile mind escape the most sharp-sighted vision. His ever-varying physiognomy is the type of his mind. The rapidity of his sensations is only equalled by the volubility of his speech. He is all parentheses, and his crotchets are innumerable. He is never still. His moving mind is described by his perpetual motion. He has talked, perhaps, more than any human being breathing, not excepting that greatest but one of talkers, Louis Philippe. The King of the French and Lord Brougham are sworn friends. His citizen Majesty likes his original "ami Anglais." The ex-Chancellor in one of his freaks took a château at Cannes. This is a small harbour on the Mediterranean, in the department of the Var, only 238 leagues from Paris! Napoleon landed at Cannes in 1815, after his flight from Elba, and Brougham dropped anchor there after his quondam friends the Whigs had deprived him of the cares of the woolsack. Some person remarked to Chateaubriand, "Why, what can possess Lord Brougham to choose his country-house at such an obscure gulf?" "Ah!" replied the great statesman and writer, "ces Anglais are singular beings. They select the most out-of-the-way places for their maisons de campagne. I know one who had his country residence in Greece, whose habitation was periodically pillaged during his absence, which did not prevent him from going there regularly every year to make his promenade."



LORD BROUGHAM.

Lord Brougham is the most indefatigable of men. When he visits Cannes he generally seizes the occasion to pass two or three days in Paris, and then everybody is sure to see him somewhere. From the earliest hour he pays his visits. If he finds a Frenchman in his bed, no matter, he will see him; if his friend be in a bath, n'importe, Lord Brougham talks to him as if he were on a parliamentary bench, instead of floating in a marble or a metal vessel. At breakfast or in his study, it is all the same, in his lordship boils, having no bar to his discretion. As he can pour forth a larger quantity of words within a given period than the most voluble of Gallicans, Lord Brougham disposes of an immense number of visits within a brief space. Men of no parties are exempt from his visitation. At the Tuileries he is a most welcome guest. The wordy warfare between him and Louis Philippe is generally very animated, although, strange to say, the Republicans once contemplated asking Lord Brougham to be their counsel before the Court of Peers, in one of the procès monstres which have taken place since the Revolution. If his lordship had pleaded, it would have been amusing to the French, for although fluent in the language, his pronunciation is rather ludicrous. Lately, some persons began building opposite his villa at Cannes, and Lord Brougham had an opportunity of judging law in France. On his inquiring whether, by the terms of his lease, he could not abate the nuisance of being overlooked, he was informed there was no remedy. "What," exclaimed his lordship indignantly to an English friend, "are there no laws in this country?" "Oh, yes!" replied his consoler, "there are thousands of laws, but there is little justice for the natives, and certainly none for an Englishman."

Lord Brougham is, after all, one of the most agreeable of men, despite his gossiping propensities. He is universally admired in society, and is an especial favourite of the fairer portion. Lord Lyndhurst and Lord Brougham, with their rivalry of position and politics, are sworn friends; and it would not be quite decorous for the world generally to be aware of the great pranks and practical jokes these two chancellors have committed together, and, for aught we know, are still perpetrating. They are like two schoolboys in their jokes and in their affections.

We question whether Lord Brougham, with his universal knowledge, has a very patient investigation of first principles. His perception is rapid, but it may be doubted whether he looks far into the past, and his glance at the future is very limited. He is, even a Whig, and something more. He has been a Tory, and something less. He may be classed as a Conservative, and he might be ranked as a Republican. He has been a great leveller in the march of mind. When he rises to support a motion, the odds are that his arguments will annihilate it. The first cause he ever espoused was dissolved when the tides of his mind. You never can tell how the current may go with him. There is an inundation of words, a perpetual flow of fresh ideas, but the precise tendency of them it is tantalizing to attempt to seize. Take Lord Brougham's speech, for example, on the right of search, which has excited the ire of M. de Tocqueville. What a cosmopolite is the noble lord! He is, in turn, English, American, and even French! Yes, French. Lord Brougham, a Frenchman! We incline to suspect that, after his withering exposure of their right of search bubbub, our neighbours on the other side of the channel will not naturalize him. His lordship will have seen by M. de Tocqueville that he has not even got his civil rights. One might be afflicted at Lord Brougham's harangue for all nations if we had not the confident expectation that he will, one of these days, favour us with one of the patriotic bursts of Harry Brougham's time. Until then we must take our leave of him. It scarcely required the talent of our artist to leave an impression of him in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, for his lordship is of a mould that is stamped for ever in the memory of England and Englishmen.

M. DE TOCQUEVILLE.

"Although your lordship seems, in your own country, to have acquired, by long habit, a sort of impunity in the employment of injurious language, it does not follow that foreigners must recognise any such privilege. If then, my lord, you have in reality, which appears doubtful, cast upon me this odious imputation, I must tell you plainly that it is a sheer calumny. It is not true that I endeavoured to increase the mutual irritation between our two countries. I flatly deny so hateful a thought. On the contrary, I have, in several parts of the speech, of which you have spoken without understanding it, said that I deeply deplored that irritation, and that my object was to find a means of calming it. My language throughout, I venture to affirm, bears the stamp of this conciliatory spirit."

Whew! Here is a Frenchman in a passion! Here is a philosophee in a boiling rage! What, M. de Tocqueville, with your placid expression, your ordinarily pacific tone, is it possible that you can so far forget the conventions of society? And has Anglophobia so spread in your country that you can turn round on your old friend and fellow-labourer for the abolition of slavery, and snarl at and even try to bite him? Is your letter to Lord Brougham of which a passage is quoted at the head of this article, a specimen of the talents and moderation of a member of the Academy of Moral and Political Science? Is it thus that you, a member of the Illustrious French Academy, address a brother schoolmaster? Have you no other picking rod, more learned and appropriate, than simply phraseology and shallow abuse? Oh! M. de Tocqueville! "Oh! mon Alexis!" How are the mighty fallen! To think that the author of "Democracy in the United States," the only great work on America up to this day, should make a long speech in the Chamber of Deputies on the principle of the right of search, and yet should have been entirely ignorant of the American treaty of 1823. Marvellous ignorance; as your friend Lord Brougham justly observed. But M. de Tocqueville insinuates that when he was delivered of his oration he was perfectly aware that the American treaty had signed a treaty (which was not ratified by England) to a more extensive basis of the right of search than even exists in the conventions of 1831 and 1833. We take leave to doubt M. de Tocqueville's insinuation. We have followed his discourse word by word in the Moniteur Universel, and our conviction is that he was totally ignorance of the 1823 treaty. If, then, he did not know that America had agreed to the right of search, M. de Tocqueville has uttered a falsehood. If he really was cognizant of the fact what a miserable party man does he display himself, and what a hypocritical supporter has he been of the slave suppression principle.

For the rest we regret deeply that a man like Alexis de Tocqueville should have so committed himself by his correspondence with Lord Brougham, for the French writer and philosopher has been hitherto regarded as a most notable person, although ardent in his politics. M. de Tocqueville, takes his seat in the Chamber as a moderate Liberal. His speeches are always listened to with profound attention, for they are carefully studied and prepared. He is not an orator of impulse, but a grave thinker, who rises rarely, and rately before his colleagues his solemn principles. De Tocqueville is no aspirant for place and power. He rests content with the reputation he has acquired by his one book, but he is annually delivered of a set speech on the "situation." He is no intriguer, and therefore has no party, nor is he calculated to lead one. But he is universally admired because of the supposed rectitude of his intentions, and because he is not offensive to any party by his general mode of making known his opinions. He has been and is one of the most active members of the Society for the Abolition of Slavery in the French colonies; and yet, oddly enough, he objects to the right of search principle, which is precisely the only effective remedy for the putting down of the detestable traffic in human flesh. We fear that M. de Tocqueville, like many more of the reflecting portion of the French community, has been carried away by the exasperation created by the July treaty of 1840, and that he has forgotten his formerly noble sentiments on behalf of the blacks, in consequence of his hostility to England on the question of preventing France from making the Mediterranean a French lake.

M. de Tocqueville has left a formidable career in France of a nature to interest English readers, but for his "Democracy," and for his tilt with Lord Brougham, in which he has got a settling.

We had written thus far when we received the Paris Constitutionnel containing M. de Tocqueville's answer to Lord Brougham's last sally. M. de Tocquevil.e contradicts the learned lord.

1st, As to the ex-Chancellor's assertion that M. de Tocqueville had sent him a corrected copy of his speech, when it was, in point of fact, the report of the Moniteur Universel, the officiel account of the Chamber of Deputies. 2dly, M. de Tocqueville denies that he did know that vessels seized as slave-traders were to be tried by a tribunal of their own nation. 3dly, M. de Tocqueville repeats that he was quite aware of the existence of the 1823 treaty of the United States, conceding the right of search, but he says that he did not speak of it for two or three reasons; because there was nothing to say, as M. Guizot had mentioned the fact in a debate in 1842, and, second.y, because it was useless for the expression of M. de Tocqueville's opinion. "He wished to prove that the exercise of the right of search was an honourable career in France of a nature to the peace of two great nations, as it was met with for the first time. What did he care for the idea of this right being old? What M. de Tocqueville wished to prove was the novelty of putting it into practice. What had the treaty of 1823 to do with this? Finally, Lord Brougham seems astonished that M. de Tocqueville should be met by his remarks. M. de Tocqueville might well be astonished at the surprise of Lord Brougham. It must hurt a person to say that he has spoken with marvellous ignorance on the greatest question of the moment. It is also very injurious to accuse a man of envenoming the quarrel of two great nations. It is not very extraordinary that M. de Tocqueville answered Lord Brougham's letter with some vivacity. The misfortune of Lord Brougham is that he has spoken of all this without taking the trouble of learning what was said for the last year in France. No one is more capable than Lord Brougham of treating the question with superiority; but he was wrong to talk of what he did not know."

We have deemed it but right after our own strictures to give M. de Tocqueville's last explanation. It is a very pretty quarrel. We do not think the squabble is over. Lord Brougham loves the last wor , and M. de Tocqueville's admission that it was useless for the expression of his opinion to allude to a treaty which upset the basis of his position supplies too good a chance for the noble lord to throw away.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts has adopted as its missionaries, on the recommendation of the Lord Bishop of Toronto, the Rev. Andrew Lawson, the Rev. T. Bolton Reid, the Rev. Paul Shirley; also the following clergymen, on the recommendation of the Bishop of Nova Scotia, the Rev. C. Scovel, the Rev. James Neale, and the Rev. George Arnold.

The Lord Bishop of Tasmania has appointed the Rev. F. A. Marriott, M.A., to the archdeaconry of Hobart Town, and also to be his lordship's domestic chaplain.

Her Majesty has recently presented £100 in aid to the fund for the restoration of Hanbury Church, Staffordshire. The Queen Dowager likewise gave a liberal sum.

Her Majesty the Queen Dowager has given £25 towards the erection of a school in connection with Christ church, Virginia Water, Egham. We hear that the church building at Malta at the expense of her Majesty is rapidly advancing to completion; it is roofed in, and will be probably completed before the close of the year.

A meeting of the members and friends of the Church Missionary Society was held in the Town-hall, Oxford, on Monday evening, The Rev. J. W. Doran, LL.D., formerly a missionary in India, attended as a deputation from the parent society, and addressed the audience. Several clergymen and gentlemen connected with the university also addressed the meeting.

Meetings have been held in Cheltenham, Bath, and towns adjacent, in favour of the Colonial Church Society, the Hon. and Rev. B. W. Noel, M.A., and J. S. Reynolds, Esq., attending as a deputation from the parent society. The society has now been in existence seven years, and its objects are twofold—to send evangelists, catechists, and schoolmasters to the colonies; and to send clergymen to the Continent, or to any part of the world where Englishmen are congregated. Upwards of £70 were transmitted from Bath to the society in London during the last year.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.

(Before Sir C. Cottenham.)

HARVEY GARNETT PHIPPS TUCKETT'S BANKRUPTCY.

This bankrupt, described as a merchant, and who has also acquired great notoriety from his "affair of honour" with the Earl of Cardigan, appeared before the court on his adjourned examination. His accounts were not satisfactory to his creditors, and therefore another adjournment was ordered, Captain Tuckett undertaking to wind up his affairs. It must be could, on the future occasion, to lay a proper balance-sheet before them.

INSOLVENT DEBTORS' COURT.

IN THE MATTER OF JOHN WHITELAW.

This case presented some remarkable features. The insolvent owed nearly £6000, of which upwards of £3300 arose on accommodation-bills. In July, 1841, he married a woman seventy-two years old, and two days afterwards was taken to prison. The old woman had £10,000 in the Consols, and the insolvent alleged that the marriage was null and void. A marriage settlement was made, and three of the insolvent's friends were trustees. Some money had been paid on his account, and it was alleged that he had an interest in the settlement, of which settlement no copy had been filed. He had been a sculptor, making about £80 a year. He admitted that he was to share in money obtained on his acceptances by a person named Roach, for whom he accepted about £2000 of accommodation-bills.—The case was adjourned for the settlement.

POLICE.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.—SINGULAR STRATAGEM.—William Hurry was charged with stealing a Chesterfield wrapper under the following remarkable circumstances:—It appeared that the prisoner and two confederates went to the shop of Mr. Fitzgerald, pawnbroker, No. 59, High-street, Bloomsbury, on Tuesday, about one o'clock, and, walking into the surgery, one of the party, who pretended to have the toothache, applied to the assistant to have the offending tooth removed. William Carrington, Mr. Fitzgerald's assistant, examined the alleged sufferer's mouth, but was unable to discover a tooth which had the least appearance of decay. While making this examination the prisoner crept round the other side and stood behind the assistant, being the one who had been seen by Mrs. Keall, a woman in the shop at the time, to pass out with the coat on his arm.—Mr. Maltby asked the first witness if he believed that the party he saw operating had a live tooth in his head.—He had done so to take off attention from the movements of the other two men.—Witness answered, he had no doubt this was the case. The man was very reluctant to fix upon a tooth, and when he took out the instrument he appeared about to be applied, he winced about in the chair, and protracted the operation as long as he could. The tooth extracted was also perfectly sound.—Proof was given that the prisoner had been convicted several times. In defence the prisoner declared he had not entered the shop, and the witnesses were mistaken as to his identity.—Mr. Carrington, however, had no doubt about the prisoner being one of the men.—He was consequently remanded for a few days.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—Notwithstanding we have to report the arrival of a very scanty supply of English wheat up to Monday last—for the week, the demand for all description on each market-day has ruled excessively heavy. The finest qualities of both red and white, however, have sold at prices about equal to those previously noted; but, in order to effect a clearance of the out-of-condition sorts, a slight statement has been submitted to by the factors. So little has been coming in foreign wheat, both free and in bond, that the current rates of that article may be considered nominally unaltered. Good sound barley is on the best malt have gone off steadily, but all other grads, including flour, has been a heavy sale.

Flour, Amerian, 22s to 24s. Baltic, 22s per barrel.

The Seed Market.—We have had rather more inquiry for clover and canary seeds, and their value has been well maintained. In other seeds, however, scarcely anything has been transacted.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed, English, sowing, 48s to 52; Baltic, crushing, 42s to 45s, Mediterranean and Odessa, 40s to 46s; hempseed, 32s to 40s per quarter coriander, 18s to 20s per cwt; brown mustard seed, 10s to 11s, white ditto, 10s to 12s; tares, 5s to 8s per bushel; English rapeseed, new, £20 to £22 per last of ten quarters; Linseed cakes, English, £10 to £10 10s, ditto foreign, £7 to £7 10s per 1000; rapeseed cakes, £5 5 to £6 per ton.

Bread. The prices of wheaten bread are from 7d to 7½d, of household ditto, 6d to 6½d for the 4lb loaf

Sugar.—For most descriptions of sugar we have had a slow inquiry this week. Fine colonary samples, being scarce, have sold on 1s. terms; but other kinds have been rather lower.

Coffee.—The public sales held since our last have been well attended; but prices have ruled rather in favour of the buyers. About 30,000 packages have now passed the hammer, out of which about 42,000 have been actually disposed of Coffee. The market has again proved heavy, and prices have fallen 1s to 2s per cwt

Cocoa.—West India supports its value; but other sorts are still dull

Indigo.—We have had but few transactions in this article, and the late advance is not maintained

Spices.—All kinds of spices move off slowly, at about previous quotations.

Tallow.—The market rules dull, and prices are depressed—the 5d being the extreme value of the T. C. on the spot.

Oils. We have had a dull inquiry, for oils are again lower.

Provisions.—The Irish butter market does not exhibit any improvement. Sales are chiefly confined to low qualities, from 54s to 56s per cwt. Foreign is also dull, but fine parcels still realise 114s to 118s per cwt. Bacon is heavy. Lard dull, but not cheaper

Wools.—The public sales have gone off slowly, and prices have receded about ½d. per lb. very little has been imported.

Hops.—The demand for fine kinds of hops is in a sluggish state, at barely last week's figures.

Potatoes.—This market has fluctuated in value, and sales are with difficulty effected.

Coals.—Adair's, 15s; Old Tanfield, 14s 6d; Tanfield Moor, 17s 9d; Haswell, 19s 6d; Hetton, 19s 6d, Braddyll's Hetton, 20s; Stewart's, 19s 3d, Caradoc, 20s; Killoe, 19s 9d Brownwood, 19s 6d; and Adelaide, 19s 3d per ton. Ships arrived, 4.

COMMERCE AND MONEY

The information received this week from the manufacturing districts, although by no means satisfactory, is still less despairing than that which we reported last week on this article. In the woollen districts the mills are generally on fair employment, although complaints of low wages continue to be made. Some extensive orders were in execution for our colonies, but in the home trade no amendment has as yet occurred. Hopes, however, were entertained that matters might yet be better amongst the consumers at home, just at the moment when the season amongst the master manufacturers for executing orders for the spring consumption is now rapidly drawing to a close. In the meantime sheep's wool continues to be freely purchased at prices a shade under last week's rates everywhere; and also, at all events may be considered as the turning point for the future. At Liverpool and the other seaports the arrivals of cotton wool are not so large as they were last week, but, as the market perfectly knows that country wants are the sole cause, the markets generally continue to be abundantly supplied, and large sales to be effected at rather lower prices. This event proves an influencing in the value of the raw material in favour of, at all events, the cotton-spinner and manufacturer, whose sales of manufactured goods are visibly on the increase; and the positive labourers in this line are consequently still well employed, though not at those rates of wages which, in better times, they formerly used to receive.

In all the large corn markets of consumption the sale is by of wheat and of flour considerably exceeds the demand, and, for the factors to effect sales of either, lower prices must be submitted to.

In the colonial markets generally, and more particularly in Mincing-lane, few sales of produce have this week been again effected, but the value of British plantation sugars, at the same time, is not exactly maintained. With larger crops, however, in prospect, the present prices are sufficiently remunerating to the planters. Some offers continue to be pressed on the market for sale, and its present value must be considered high by its proprietors, else large purchases would not have been effected during this week by the trade at drooping prices. Of Teas about half of the large quantity offered for sale this and last week has been disposed of, principally to the home consumption. Coffee, although they have been better supported than was generally expected previous to the sale. This article is now as low as it should be, either for the interest of the importer or for that of the consumer.

Money is tolerably abundant, but distributed amongst very few hands, and trade generally has not yet sufficiently improved to encourage any additional investments of it in commercial purposes. In the sales of public securities, therefore, the impression, which its abundance creates in the cause of a further advance, particularly in British stocks of all descriptions. At the present pressure which Exchequer bills command the annual interest on these securities is less than one per cent, and consequently no temptation is offered in this quarter to the capitalist for the productive employment of his property. In the Three per Cent Consols, however, much business has been effected during the week, and the value has been forced up to 90¾ ⅞, with every appearance of prices being still higher. Bank and East India Stock are also in demand, but the quantity of either at present in the market for sale is unusually small. The former consequently cannot be purchased under 177, and 268 can be easily obtained for the latter

The attention of the moneyed interest, also, still continues to be directed to the shares in railways and other public undertakings of that description, and for several of them higher prices have been again obtained. Those of the Great Western line have advanced to 94¾, and the Birmingham and London cannot be purchased under 210. The Brighton line is likewise much in favour from the late depression in prices which circumstances had caused, but when upper now to be removed, and, on the whole, the appearance of this description of property during the week is satisfactory.

On the Foreign Stock Exchange considerable animation has existed during this week, large purchases having been made, chiefly for Dutch account, in the Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cents, and also in Spanish Threes. In Dutch Certificates, and in Mexican Bonds a good deal of business has likewise been transacted since our last publication, at gradually improving prices. In the public securities of the United States of America no change whatever can be done in the selling trade, and Anexercising the dividends is at present considered to be out of the question to exist. On the Stock Exchange, therefore, matters are at present much more cheering than they have been for some time heretofore.

CAUTION in BUYING FURNITURE.—Purchasers attracted by the absurd offers of some puffing shops to furnish houses for little or nothing should pause, and consider whether economy is not to be better reference than those to a few interested individuals; or by inquiry among their own friends, many of whom may have suffered under the system practised. A few trifling articles are shown to commence with at a low price, and, when the confidence of the customer is secured, extravagant sums are obtained for goods of a very ordinary quality, and even inferior articles to those shown are ultimately supplied (after a large payment has been made on account); and, should any complaint be afterwards made, or dissatisfaction expressed by the purchaser, it is met by wilful misrepresentation, and the only remedy is by an action at law (the dealer not recognising to supply the parties a second time). In cases where estimates are given it will be found that the terms are both too late, but that the expense incurred is about double the amount first calculated on. Calculating that, by an opposite system of fair and open dealing at low prices, and by the manufacture, on a large scale, of such articles only as would ensure general satisfaction, a large and steady business might be obtained, Mr. Mansfield, by a quick return of the capital, the Manufactory and Warerooms at the Bazaar, Baker-street, were established by Messrs. Druce and Co., about eight years since, and, notwithstanding the unceasing efforts of interested persons in the trade to prejudice the public, an extensive business has been gradually secured. Among the advantages now offered is a selection from the largest stock in the Kingdom; and, as the prices are all affixed, buyers may make their own calculations, avoiding delusive estimates, at about two thirds of the usual prices elsewhere; and, if desired, a person in the trade may be sought to inspect the goods. Messrs. Druce and Co. solicit inquiry among the numberless parties (including a large proportion of the nobility) whose names appear in their books who have furnished from their manufactory.—A written warranty, if desired, for twelve months.

THE BEST MEDICINE IN THE WORLD.—Read the following statement, which must carry conviction to the mind of every impartial person; and affords additional and weighty testimony in favour of this singularly efficacious medicine.

TO THE PROPRIETORS OF PARR'S LIFE PILLS.

Gentlemen,—This is to inform you, in detail, what Old PARR'S LIFE PILLS (or Pills of Health) have done for me. First,—Perseverance (as you will see) for many years' duration, by which I could sleep very little, but the third night I took them I slept very comfortably, a blessing I had not known for many years. Secondly,—Of Nervous Affection, which I have been troubled for many years. Thirdly, Of Costiveness, from which I have suffered much for many years, having been constantly relieved by them, four, five, six, seven, and eleven days in torment, previous to going to the ground. Fourthly, Of the Rheumatism, from which I have suffered much for upwards of forty years. Fifthly,—Of a Scorbutic humour, with which I have been for twelve at least, for four years, having been lame with it, several times, for months together. This has been a very stubborn case. I do not know what I may have, but at present I have not a sore spot, or a pain about me. I am now enabled to bless and praise God for his mercies in bringing to light such a restorative of health and soundness of body. I am not like the same person I was a year ago, being so much altered for the better. All these cures have been effected in me, by the use of PARR'S LIFE PILLS. And I cannot but feel it a duty to be a safe preventitive of the Bowel Complaint, for neither I nor my wife have had it since taking them, also having frequently had it previously

I am, Gentlemen, your humble Servant, R. W. Richardson, Schoolmaster

Red-Lion-street, Walsall, Staffordshire, Oct. 1, 1842.

POPULAR PORTRAITS.—No. XXXII.

LORD DE GREY.

It is a peculiarity of our political system that every change of party changes the heads of every department in the state, the secondary and inferior members of those departments remaining in their situations, safe from the political storms that sweep away those above them. We have recently given a sketch of the Governor-General of India, Lord Ellenborough, who superseded Lord Auckland, and we now present the portrait of the individual who, next to the Governor-General of India, exercises the most important degree of viceregal power. Earl De Grey is the present Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, in which office he succeeded Lord Fortescue, according to the system above alluded to, by which employment under one Government condemns the holder of office, however able or fit for the situation, to remain idle under another.

Earl De Grey is the first holder of the title, which was created in 1816: his second title is Lord Grantham, and he is the eldest brother of the present Earl of Ripon. His lordship has undergone a singular change of names. That of his family is of course Robinson, which he dropped for that of Weddell, and since his accession to the earldom he has taken the name of De Grey only. Besides his present office he has filled that of First Lord of the Admiralty, so that he is not unknown to political life, though not what can be called a prominent name in the ranks of the Conservatives. He is also Lord Lieutenant of Bedfordshire, Colonel of the York Hussar Yeomanry Cavalry, and one of the Aides-de Camp to the Queen.

The office of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland is one of a peculiar nature. He holds the delegated royal authority in the only part of the United Kingdom that is so governed: if we add to this that the people whom he is called to rule are of a different religious faith from the inhabitants of the other two thirds of the kingdom, and that the country has been for ages a sort of battle-ground for the contest of two races, the conquerors and the conquered, with many of the feelings created by these relative positions remaining down to the present day in full force, it will be seen that there is ample reason why the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland should be less swayed by his personal feelings and by the prejudices of party than any other of the exalted functionaries of the Government. This is more necessary, now that old jealousies are dying out, and old causes of enmity between the two people are disappearing. The Governments of late years have endeavoured to rule in a spirit of impartiality and conciliation. The old bitterness of feeling which once animated party against party and creed against creed is gradually disappearing in the higher ranks; temperance and education are doing their beneficial work among the lower classes; and assuredly no attempt to disturb the harmonizing influences that seem at work in a country too long divided by faction would meet with any countenance or support amongst the mass of the English people. In fact, the time is past when anything very glaring in this way could be attempted with safety, or a regard to the maintenance of peace. Though Earl De Grey is understood to be attached to the more uncompromising section of the Protestant party, his Government is greatly influenced by the mildness and impartiality which distinguish the Secretary for Ireland, Lord Eliot, an excellent specimen of the English nobleman, who has gained for himself the respect and esteem of all parties.

THE CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS—No. XXVIII.

ST. SEPULCHRE'S.

To St. Sepulchre is not inaptly dedicated the church which overlooks the public Place of Execution; and had its grey time-stained walls the faculty of speech, a long and dreary chapter of human guilt and human misery could it tell. In its tower swings the bell which marks the last hours of the condemned, and the deep meaning of its tones speaks forth over the modern Babylon—happily less often than of old—that man is being openly sacrificed by man. Of the scenes which here occur it is not now the time to tell, or a gross picture must be drawn of vice lurking and pilfering round the gibbet erected to scare the vicious into honesty—of loose jest and ribald laughter in reference to the coming spectacle—and of brutalizing excitement gained and enjoyed by brutalized minds over the death-throes of a helpless, hopeless, unresisting criminal.

The early history of St. Sepulchre is obscure, and the precise date of its foundation unknown; our only certain information, however, links it to the priory of St. Bartholomew, near which it stands, and, in common with that once magnificent structure, its earliest records are associated with the tournaments, the processions, and, at a later period, with the tortures and burnings of Smithfield. Maitland affords the first authentic notice when he states that, "in 1178, Roger, Bishop of Sarum, gave the church of St. Sepulchre to the canons of St. Bartholomew's Priory." Stow speaks of the rebuilding of the church "in the middle of the fifteenth century;" and this second structure it was which in 1666 suffered, to nearly entire destruction, by the great fire. To Sir Christopher Wren was entrusted its reparation, and we must seek in the multiplicity of his engagements at that time an excuse for the hasty, inaccurate, and imperfect manner in which the task was fulfilled.

The interior is divided by two ranges of Tuscan columns into three aisles of unequal width, the centre being widest, the south narrowest. The columns on either side are connected by semicircular arches, with enriched archivolts and soffits, which spring directly from their capitals, without the interposition of an entablature, and support a large dental cornice round the church. The want of harmony between the interior and exterior induce the supposition that the work was done in great haste, and with but little attention from Sir Christopher Wren. Beneath the centre window, at the east end, is a large Corinthian altar-piece of oak, displaying columns, entablatures, &c., elaborately carved and gilded. There is a singular sounding-board over the pulpit.

The organ is the oldest and finest in London, is very large, and was built in 1677 by Renatus Harris and Byfield. It has forty stops, the reed stops are unequalled.

Among the numerous victims who suffered at the stake in Smithfield, during the protracted struggle for domination between the Roman church and the reformed religion, was John Rogers, at one time vicar of St. Sepulchre's. It is stated that when the bishops had resolved to put to death one Joan Bocher, a friend came to Rogers, and earnestly desired him to use his interest that the poor woman's life might be spared, and other means used to prevent the spread of her opinions. Rogers, however, contending that she ought to be executed, the friend then begged him to choose some other kind of death, which would be more agreeable to the gentleness and mercy prescribed in the Gospel. Rogers replied, "that burning alive was not a cruel death, but easy enough." The friend hearing these words, answered with great vehemence, striking Rogers's hand, "It may so happen that you yourself shall have your hands full of this mild burning;" which came to pass, Rogers being the first person who was executed at the stake in the reign of Queen Mary.

The principal entrance is on the south side, by a beautiful porch. The groining of the ceiling takes a form almost unique. The ribs are in very bold relief, and the bosses at the intersections are carved to represent the heads of angels, shields, roses, and other devices in great variety.

POSTING THE NEWS.

That little word post
Has meanings a host,
And in this respect is the lexicon's boast,
For there's no other word
That ever we heard
That has been more twisted, and bother'd, and blurr'd.

There are posts of honour and posts of pride,
And a thousand posts in the world beside;
Posts in the streets, and posts to the lamps,
And some walking post-men—remarkable scamps!

There are bank-post bills as current as gold,
And cheques post-dated not pleasant to hold;
And that wonderful post with but four letters to it,
That has all other letters in Europe pass through it!

You post in the navy, promoting the brave,
You post in the army for being a knave;
You post the pony whenever you bet,
And you post off to prison when taken for debt!

Post-obits are given for gold on your life,
You're examined post-mortem if murdered in strife;
You post by horses, or post by train,
And the latter steam-style is styled posting amain!

If a man any great punctuality boast,
You say of him "he's to be found at his post;"
But if you're kept waiting you inwardly groan,
And say "What a devil he is to *post*pone."

You post your books of accounts by millions,
You call your galloping boys *post*illions;
And you try to save your tin of a verity,
Just to leave to your young post-erity.

An authors' friends, to amuse or fume us,
Print, after his death, his works *post*humous;
But we, to give our paper a lift,
Prefer to print, living, this plain *post*script.

POSTSCRIPT.

Of all the posting that ever you saw,
Posting by chaises or posting by law,
Posting a captain or posting a bill,
Posting a letter selon Rowland Hill;
Posting a ledger, or wager you owe,
The most remarkable posting we know,
Pleasure, and knowledge, and art to diffuse,
Is the beautiful practice of POSTING THE NEWS.

DEATH OF THE OLDEST MAN IN LONDON.—Louis Pouché, who underwent an operation for hernia in December last, died a few days since in Castle-street, Leicester-square. He was born at Rouen, January 17, 1750. He was kind and good natured, and gentlemanly in his conduct; no one could sit in his company without being delighted with his manners and amusing tales. He usually took his chair at the Cambrian Tavern, in Castle-street, during the latter part of his life, where he often amused the company with his favourite song, "I've kissed, and I've prattled with fifty fair maids."

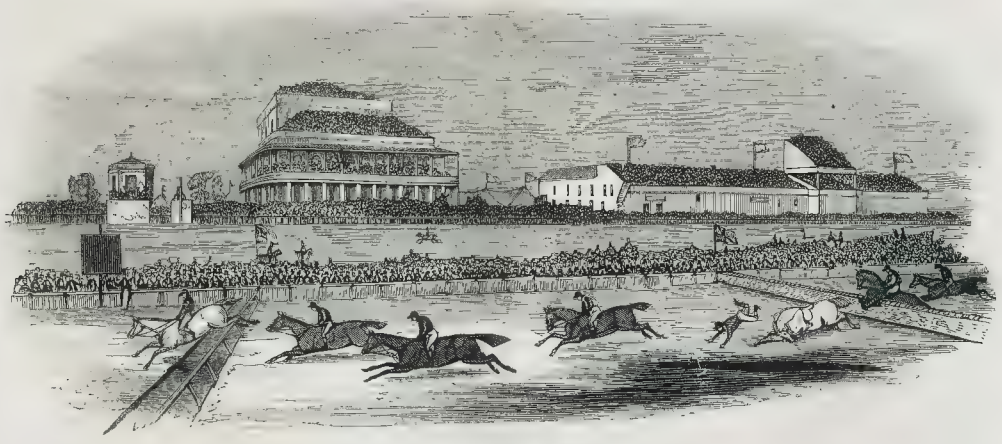
EDUCATION OF THE WORKING CLASSES.

BEAUTIFUL purpose — a purpose which it shall be the pride and glory of this journal to nurse into life, activity, and power, was emphatically declared by the Legislature in the House of Commons on Tuesday night, and has, by this time, ministered a delightful satisfaction to thousands of Christian beings in this country, who have within them enough of brotherhood, unselfishness, and heart-purity to take a wise and holy interest in the moral condition of the poor. The purpose of which we speak, and the declaration of an intention to bring it into practical operation, was distinct, emphatic, decided—bearing with it the concurrence of all parties, and involving no less important, generous, and charitable a scheme than the moral and religious education of all the lower classes of our fellow-creatures in this land. The very interesting debate in which the subject was discussed originated in that most excellent Christian, and just, humane legislator, Lord Ashley—a nobleman in whom the rich have an example, and the poor a champion; who works out with industrious perseverance the lofty principles of benevolence; who watches tenderly, and with anxious carefulness for their relief, the victims of oppression among his countrymen; who advocates humanity with a glowing fervour, and the duties of brotherhood with a kindling heart; who gathereth little children under the protection of his virtue, and performs the highest duties of his ennobling calling with a gentle spirit and a modest, unaffected grace; who, in a word, wins the love, gratitude, and admiration of mankind, by seeking to benefit them without ostentation, and to bless them without reward. This is no exaggerated eulogy — it is the tribute of a well-earned praise.

Lord Ashley based the propositions he had to make upon the simple motion, "That an humble address be presented to her Majesty, praying that her Majesty will be graciously pleased to take into her instant and serious consideration the best means of diffusing the benefits and blessings of a moral and religious education amongst the working classes of her people;" and upon this motion his lordship then proceeded to ground a speech and statements which deserve the most careful perusal and attention at the hands of the whole community. And as when he had the crimes and cruelties of the factory system to expose, so now, from the hot-beds of dissoluteness, the waste deserts of dreary and pitiable ignorance—the pollution of profanity without awe, poverty without honesty, and misery without religious hope—he conjured before his hearers many a frightful and appalling picture, and painted a condition of society without education in the most quickening atmospheres of vice, broad and glaring enough to alarm the most fearless lest it should spread and fester into a moral sore, that might gradually eat into the vitals of our social system, and ulcerate incurably the whole heart of the empire. It is beyond question that the demoralisation of ignorance is fearfully overlaying the humbler classes with its black and cheerless mantle, which only the light of Christianity can penetrate, or the spirit of education tear away. The instances of hopeless, heartless brutality of condition adduced from the population returns and statistical inquiries with respect to nearly all the populous districts of England—and in crowded towns especially—are literally terrifying. The infamy of lower life, for example, in Manchester, strikes the mind aghast; and it becomes still more dreadful to be confirmed in the conviction that the most wide-spread depravity is chiefly among the young—that childhood, without one ray that points to heaven upon its path, is walking upward into life, as it were, bound and handcuffed between ignorance and crime. It surely becomes a national duty to check this growth of vice, and under Providence,



GREAT NATIONAL STEEPLE-CHASE AT LIVERPOOL.

For the last five years this event has been the Derby of steeple-chasing, and, if we are to argue from the present, its popularity is on the increase. On Wednesday last the town of Liverpool was filled by one of the most brilliant companies that ever graced a provincial meeting. Indeed, the whole élite of the sporting circles of England, Ireland, and Scotland had made it their rendezvous; and at two o'clock, the hour originally named for the sport to commence, the course at Aintree would have lost little by comparison with Epsom Downs, on either of their great days. The grand stand and its enclosure were filled with fashionables, while all the minor buildings for the convemence of spectators had their share of patronage. There had been but little betting on the event of the day in the town, and there was little move in the ring on the course. The closing prices being—3 to 1 against Peter Simple, 4 to 1 against Lottery, 5 to 1 against The Returned, 8 to 1 against Redwing, and no others backed. The bell for saddling was rung at three, and the sun shone splendidly out as the saddled coursers were brought forth. These were all, of course, stately steeds, and, but for one Samaritan among the party that bestrid them, the exhibition would have been as dull as dignified. Mr. Whitworth, however, who hung across Bucephalus as those wooden gentlemen do who preserve their perpendicular upon Tonbridge horses by means of leaden balances at their nether ends, helped us to a most seasonable laugh: certes, he does not ride amiss, though his style is eccentric. In another quarter of an hour the field was called together, and the following sixteen set forth on their perilous journey:—

With the exception of Victoria, who tumbled over one of the early fences, the whole party made the first round upon good terms, Peter Simple cutting out the work, and leading to the wall at the Stand. This he cleared, followed by Nimrod, Vanguard, Dragsman, Consul and Lottery. Tinderbox in attempting to follow suit fell with an awful crash, breaking his rider's collar-bone, who was presently jumped upon by Claude Duval in the manner set forth in our engraving. All took the brook opposite the judge's chair admirably, and, mending their pace, went to work wickedly. At the second round Nimrod took the lead from the favourite, who had met with a misfortune and lost ground considerably, but still being tolerably well up with the second division. As they entered the course for the finish the race lay with four—Nimrod, Vanguard, Dragsman, and Consul. The former of these was the first over the hurdle, which constituted the finishing leap; but the instant Vanguard collared him he stopped, and threw away a race which it was pence to pounds he would have won. Vanguard then, magnificently jock'd by Oliver, took a lead of several lengths, and won an honest race like an honest horse. Peter Simple would have been beaten by the weight had no accident occurred; Lottery did all an infirm, worn-out horse could do; while The Returned was short of speed, as indeed were the rest of the field. The stakes, after the deductions, were worth close upon six hundred pounds. The result of the present anniversary went to prove that Liverpool is the Olympia of the steeple-chase, and that she merits the honour of taking the lead in one of the most popular of our national sports.

and by a wise and active exertion, to sow some seed from which a harvest of intelligence and virtue may spring up in its stead. The mind naturally points to systematic education as one of the best and most palpable means for exciting the spread of order, morality, industry, and content. We do not rush into any wild speculation upon this subject. With education we do not cry Eureka, and claim it as the philosopher's stone and only panacea against all human evils; but we regard it as the true, beautiful, and powerful instrument for effecting an immense, nay, an incalculable amount of good in a Christian, a social, a religious, and a national sense. It must instill first principles; it must humanize and diffuse benignant light; it must increase the sum of knowledge and fear of God; it must speak of social duty, and of a sense of the responsibilities of conduct to the impressed and pliant hearts of children; it must bend the twig and direct the branching of the tree of youth, while it will be in its nature to set up order and propriety as its symbols before men, and to make the principles of anarchy and revolution bite the dust. It was mentioned in the Commons' debate that at the recent riots in the country the disaffection of the people was in proportion to their ignorance, and that there was nothing like desperation wherever education had spread.

The imperative necessity, then, for a measure of education was thus beautifully enforced by the conclusion of Lord Ashley's speech:—"The country required such a measure, and, though many disappointments and failures might be encountered, it would nevertheless bear an exalted harvest. We call the working population," continued the noble lord, "improvident and immoral, and so they often are; but that improvidence and immorality are the results, in a great measure, of our neglect, and in not a little of our example. We owe them, too, the debt of kindlier language and more frequent intercourse. This is no fanciful obligation. The people of this country are more alive than any other to an honest zeal for their welfare (hear, hear). Let them experience it; and, though that sympathy may often fall on unimpressible hearts, it never fails to find some that it comforts and many that it softens. Only let us now declare that we will enter on a better course; that we will seek their temporal through their eternal interests; and half our task will be accomplished. There are many hearts to be softened—many minds to be instructed—many souls to be saved.—O patria! O ruum, dimus! If we engage in such a task the blessing of God will rest on our labours, and the oldest among us perhaps may live to rejoice, for himself and children, at the opening dawn of the immortal, because the moral glory of the British empire." We have now most heartily to congratulate our readers and the country at large upon the spirit in which the resolution proposed by Lord Ashley was met by the whole house. With the exception of one surly growl from some grumbling Irish member, it was carried unanimously by the vote of all parties, and the advocacy of Graham, Russell, and Peel.

The Home Secretary followed the noble mover, and at once declared the intention of Government to submit a scheme of education to Parliament, of which he then and there gave an outline to the house. We must give a brief epitome of this important sketch. "With respect to the future, he would first propose that parishes should be united for the formation of district schools. The children to be there instructed should, in the first place, be orphans and other destitute paupers, or the offspring of poor parents willing to let them be educated there. He would attach to each school a chapel, with a clergyman who should teach the liturgy and catechism of the church; the children of dissenters, however, being exempted from attendance on those ministrations, and allowed to receive religious instruction from any licensed minister of any denomination. He gave several particulars respecting the state of some of the large manufacturing districts, showing a total want of the means of instruction there; and then proceeded to the case of children not dependent on parochial relief, but employed in factories. He would propose that no child should be suffered to work more than six hours and a half in one day, and that each should be obliged to attend school daily for three hours. The principle upon which grants had been usually made for the building of schools was, that two thirds of the cost should be raised by private contribution. He would recommend that for the future one third only should be required from private sources. The maintenance of the school when built might be defrayed partly from small payments to be made by the children themselves for their schooling, and partly by a parochial rate of 3d. in the pound. He would have the schools managed each by seven trustees, who should be the clergyman, the two churchwardens, and four persons to be nominated by the magistrates. The trustees should appoint the master, with the sanction of the bishop. No child should be required to attend the worship of the Church of England, or the religious instruction imparted by the master, if the friends of such child should object to his being brought up in conformity with the Church of England. These provisions, he trusted, would protect all classes, and afford complete security against all attempts at proselytism."

We shall reserve any remark upon these details for the occasion when the perfected plan of the Government shall be officially developed before the house—for the present they stand only as an indication of what is to come. But the principle—the principle is gained, and that is everything. The Government and the Opposition have alike expressed themselves alive to the debasing influences of immorality, ignorance, and irreligion among the people—affecting their labour—affecting their health—affecting their happiness—affecting their lives. The leaders of party have made the great admission in favour of the purest social reform. The Home Secretary avowed his fear that Protestant England had made neglected the great duty of educating the people than any other nation in Europe. "The law had been victorious—the soldier and the policeman had done their duty—and the time was come when the public instructor must go forth." Lord John Russell and Sir Robert Peel echoed these opinions in other words—and now we may be said fairly to witness the dawn of a new day of religion, intelligence, and happiness upon the humbler classes of the English human race.

This is the bright result of one of those beautiful conferences in our Legislature, of which, for ennobling purposes of humanity, without the pride of condition or the perversions of party, the constituency of the empire may be honourably and legitimately proud.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.—M. Guizot entertained a grand party last week at the hotel of the Ministry for Foreign Affairs. In the great yard of the hotel, near the Boulevard, a covered way had been made for carriages, and the entrance of the chief staircase, where the guests alighted, was profusely adorned with fine shrubs. The yard in the Rue Neuve des Capucines was tastefully hung with drapery to imitate a tent, and lined with trees. All the rooms for the reception of the company were splendidly decorated, and splendidly lighted up, and a temporary room was erected in the garden, communicating with the supper-room. The grand saloon had an imposing effect, from the number of looking-glasses that it contains, its gilded columns, and its lustres, which were filled with many hundreds of bougies. About 1,800 invitations had been issued for this fête, and the number who attended exceeded 1500. Amongst the company were all the members of the Administration (with the exception of the Spanish Ministers), as the Cabinet Ministers, Baron Louis, Count Molé, Count Pasquier, Marshal Soult, Duke de Mortemart, Duke de Broglie, Prince Paul of Wurtemberg, Prince de la Moskowa, three ex-peers—Baron Mounier, Count Bergeon, and Count de la Rochefoucault, the Chevalier Zea de Bermudez, the Duke and Duchess de Praslin, a great number of peers, the President of the Chamber of Deputies, and a great many deputies, but few peers or deputies of the Opposition.

Whole columns of the official prints of Sunday were taken up with despatches from the generals employed in Africa, including the Duc d'Aumale. These reports detail their operations in pursuit of Abd-el-Kader, who has once more escaped their grasp. The result has been what has been all along witnessed. The Emir has plundered such Arab tribes as had submitted to the French, and the French have plundered such as have yielded to the Emir.

We could glean no news of interest to the English reader in the French papers of Monday. The debate, which was to commence on Wednesday in the Chamber of Deputies, was their principal theme, and is likely to continue so for several days more.

Papers have been received from the Cape of Good Hope to the 25th of December, being seven days later than those noticed in our paper last week. But little additional information is given relative to the insurrection at Natal. The expedition was still on its way towards the disaffected districts, and the fact of it having marched had been the means of preventing some farmers from joining the rebels, as well as hindering the seditious meetings which had been so frequent.

PORTUGAL.—The Lisbon mail of the 21st ult. has arrived, with advices from Vigo to the 23rd. Tranquillity, it appears, has been restored at Oporto, although, from the prevailing distress, it was impossible to collect the taxes.

The Portuguese government still urn a deaf ear to any commercial treaty they are satisfied to maintain the statu quo, although the reduction offered in brandies would be a great boon to the trade, which is glutted with an unsalable low wines, which might be distilled if an offer was offered. It is agreed by all parties that an immediate solution of the question is called for; which another fortnight will produce.

THE LEVANT MAIL.—Letters and journals brought by the Levant Mail from Constantinople, Alexandria, Syria, and Malta, reached us by last Monday's post. From Constantinople, letters dated the 7th ult. mention a hostile invasion of a neighbouring territory, bordering on the Euphrates, by the Pasha of Bagdad. The affairs of Servia remain in statu quo. A counter-revolution was, nevertheless, confidently looked for. Accounts from Beyrout of the 1st ult. announce the release of the Druse Kaimakam, Assad Bashan, from prison, and his reinstatement in his post by Assad Pasha. The Turkish authorities have interposed to arrest the building of the Protestant Church at Jerusalem, but their conduct has been referred accordingly to the British and Prussian Consuls-general at Beyrout. From Alexandria we learn that Mehemet Ali left Cairo for Lower Egypt on the 28th of Jan. He was expected to return to Alexandria in a few days. The news from Syria comes down to the 16th ult., but is of little interest. Letters from Athens of the 5th ult. state that the Greek Government had demanded new successors from the allies.

Accounts from Damascus state that Ali Pasha was about to decapitate all the Druse Sheikhs indiscriminately, in virtue of an Imperial firman, which had been transmitted to him by Assad Bashan. Mr. Wood, on knowing this, immediately took measures for the protection of the Druses who had come to Damascus under his guarantee; and having sheltered about fifty in the British Consulate, he was, on Ali Pasha, on whom he prevailed, after much discussion, to spare the lives of the prisoners.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

Lord CAMPBELL moved for the production of two proclamations issued by Lord Ellenborough respecting the removal of the gates of Somnauth.—The Duke of WELLINGTON said, he saw no objection to the production of the papers.—Lord CAMPBELL gave notice, on the part of the Marquis of Camreathe, that he would call the attention of the house to these proclamations on Thursday, the 9th of March.—Lord MONTEAGLE, at the request of the Duke of Wellington, postponed, for the present, a motion respecting the corn-laws, in consequence of the indisposition of the Earl of Ripon.—Lord BROUGHAM gave notice that he would next day call the attention of their lordships to the operation of the law relating to the slave-trade on the coast of Africa.—Some bills on the table were forwarded a stage, and their lordships adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY

Mr. T. EGERTON replied to some statements made on a former evening by Mr. Duncombe, reative to the treatment of toe Chartist prisoners in the Knutsford House of Correction.—Mr. F. DICKINSON seconded his statements; after which Sir J. GRAHAM said that the matter should be inquired into, and the result reported to the house.—Lord ASHLEY drew attention to a case of hardship towards an orphan apprentice belonging to the Halifax union, and hoped that an investigation would be directed to the subject as readily as investigations had formerly been directed into similar cases by the Marquis of Normanby and Lord John Russell.—Sir J. GRAHAM said an inquiry should be made with a view to prosecution if the alleged facts should be proved to be true.—Lord J. RUSSELL then called the attention of the house to the fact that the Duke of Wellington, holding a seat in the Cabinet, had accepted also the office of commander-in-chief. It was impossible to suppose that, as the leader of a party, he should be wholly free from political bias; and he could not but have thought that search and inquery declared that the commander-in-chief ought not to hold a seat in the Cabinet.—Sir R. PEEL admitted that it was an unusual circumstance for a commander-in-chief to have been at some times a seat in the Cabinet; but he denied that it was unconstitutional to do so. When he and Lord Hill resigned, he (Sir R. Peel) had advised her Majesty to appoint the Duke of Wellington to the office. The duke had taken it with the consent of his colleagues, who were unanimously of opinion that it would be for the public service which his grace had rendered to the country, that, in conjunction with the command of the army, he should retain his seat in the Cabinet. On the motion for going into committee of supply, Mr. S. CRAWFORD moved, as an amendment, "that at the present period of extended distress, it is the duty of this house to consider the propriety of lightening the pressure of taxation on the people, by reducing, to the greatest possible extent, the expenses of the military as well as the civil establishments of the country; that therefore it is expedient that the estimates of any supplies should be postponed till the estimates of the whole expenditure, and more especially the miscellaneous estimates, be first furnished to the house."—Mr. HUME seconded the motion.—Mr. WILLIAMS also supported the motion, and said it was unnecessary to have such an army in Ireland when they had an army of police there as fully equipped as any troops whatever, and excellently disciplined. The immense police force of 12,000 rendered such a large military force perfectly unnecessary. The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said he would decline to reply until the estimates should come under discussion.—Mr. HUME contended that if proper reductions had taken place, the income tax would have been wholly unnecessary. General JOHNSON attributed the present distress to over-taxation.—Captain POLHILL said the causes were over population and foreign slavery, which was the curse of the country.—The house divided, and Mr. Crawford's motion was negatived by a majority of 62 to 15.—The house then resolved itself into a committee of supply. Sir H. HARDINGE brought forward the army estimates for the present year, in which there had been a reduction, as compared with last year of 5,740 men, the number he proposed for the current year being 100,846. The total saving in money would be £139,000. The right hon. gentleman concluded by moving for the number of men above stated.—Mr. HUME was opposed to such a large number, and contended that too many troops were employed in our colonies. If the government would reduce these troops one half, they might do away with the income tax at once and on for ever.—The hon. gentleman concluded by moving that the number should be 80,846 men, being 10,000 less than the number proposed by the Government.—Lord ARTHUR LENNOX said that many gallant non-commissioned officers should be encouraged in the army, and that the retiring pensions of 6d a day to soldiers should be increased to 1s. He also wished to have a better class of men in the army.—Captain LAYARD supported the larger proposed by the ministry.—Mr. HUME replied to the observations of Mr. Williams, who had not moved for a much larger reduction of men than 10,000.—Sir H. HARDINGE defended the proposed reduction.—General JOHNSON attributed the prevalent distress to over-taxation.—Captain POLHILL said the causes were over population and foreign slavery, which was the curse of the country.—The house divided, and Mr. Crawford's motion was negatived by a majority of 62 to 15.—The house then resolved itself into a committee of supply.—Sir H. HARDINGE brought forward the army estimates for the present year, in which there had been a reduction, as compared with last year of 5,740 men, the number he proposed for the current year being 100,846. The total saving in money would be £139,000. The right hon. gentleman concluded by moving for the number of men above stated.—Mr. HUME was opposed to such a large number, and contended that too many troops were employed in our colonies. If the government would reduce these troops one half, they might do away with the income tax at once and on for ever.—The hon. gentleman concluded by moving that the number should be 80,846 men, being 10,000 less than the number proposed by the Government.—Lord ARTHUR LENNOX said that many gallant non-commissioned officers should be encouraged in the army, and that the retiring pensions of 6d a day to soldiers should be increased to 1s. He also wished to have a better class of men in the army.—Captain LAYARD supported the larger proposed by the ministry.—Mr. HUME replied to the observations of Mr. Williams, who had not moved for a much larger reduction of men than 10,000.—Sir H. HARDINGE defended the proposed reduction.—General JOHNSON attributed the present

W. COWPER gave notice that he would move a clause in committee on the Registration of Voters Bill, to limit the duration of the poll in county elections to one day.—Lord ELIOT, in reply to Mr. Shaw, said he hoped shortly to be able to propose a measure on the subject of vestry proceedings in Ireland.—The appointment of Justices of Peace (Ireland) Bill passed through committee. The committee on shipwrecks was, after a division, ordered to consist of 23, instead of 15 members.—Mr. ROEBUCK brought forward his motion for a select committee to inquire into the circumstances that led to the war in Affghanistan, and to report the evidence and their own observations thereon. He accused the late administration of rashly running into a war which was wholly unnecessary, impolitic, and unjust—and without the sanction of Parliament. The mischievous activity of Lord Palmerston had excited war and injustice from the western shores of America to the coast of China. Lord Auckland had issued proclamations which contained positive falsehoods, and which were, therefore, derogatory to the honour of the country. He reviewed the transactions that had led to and followed the expedition into Affghanistan, and denounced them as contrary to all international law—as disgraceful to the British name, as foolishly conceived, and shamefully executed. Sir Alexander Burnes's papers, which had been suppressed, proved that he was altogether opposed to the war; and his despatches had been garbled by the late Government, in the extracts they had thought fit to place on the table of the House. The honourable Member concluded a speech marked by passages of extraordinary sarcasm, by declaring that all he asked then was inquiry, and not condemnation.—Mr. Hume seconded the motion.—Lord J. RUSSELL maintained that the whole substance and form of the motion was unusual and unparliamentary. Mr. Burke's motion for an inquiry into the war in India could not be held as a precedent, for that took place during the war, whereas, in the case of the war was brought to a termination. The same argument applied against the other cases cited by Mr. Roebuck. The terms of falsehood and villany lavished upon Lords Auckland and Palmerston were not applicable to those persons; and, on hearing them, he thought of what the Prince of Condé had said of some shelters:—"These hebelters impute to us the same sort of treason that would attach to Lord J. Russell, were he in our place." The favourite pursuits of Lord Auckland were those of peace, and it was only when he was obliged to adopt a warlike policy that he engaged in these military operations. Lord Palmerston first proposed the war, whereas, in the case of wedding policy, which tended to endanger the peace of the world; but his able conduct in the complicated affairs of Belgium and Turkey sufficiently proved that he could maintain the peace of the world, and that he was not subject to the ignorant calumny and vituperative abuse which had been heaped upon him by the Member for Bath. The noble lord said he should negative the motion, intended, as it was, to be a condemnation, and supported by a speech of unparalleled invective, which had been reserved for a House of Commons, of which the enemies of the late Government formed the majority, with the hope that they, actuated by paltry party motives, would be induced to give their votes in its favour.—Mr. DISRAELI thought that Lord John Russell had failed in showing that the conduct of Russia, or of its agents, had at all justified the immense preparations which had been made. He admitted that, without provocation, and against an unseen enemy, the late Government had undertaken the war that had ended in disaster and dishonour; and now, after murder, massacre, and disgrace had followed their infatuated policy, he called on the House of Commons to vote that the responsibility of Ministers was but a dream.—Mr. ESCOTT hoped that the present Government would not be found on the side of those who would screen the foul delinquency which had led to this war from investigation and exposure. Sir R. PEEL said that two questions, not necessarily connected together, were to be discussed. One, whether or not the expedition undertaken by the late Governor-General of India was consistent with sound policy; and the other, whether or not it was now fitting for the House of Commons to appoint a select committee to inquire into the circumstances that led to it. He had entertained from the first strong doubts of the policy of the expedition; and the Duke of Wellington, with great prophetic wisdom, had foretold that, if undertaken, it would not succeed. If, therefore, he could not support the motion, it should not be supposed that he had abandoned his original opinions of the policy of the expedition; and the statements of Government had confirmed that opinion. But, then, could he lend his sanction, as a Minister, to the appointment of a committee to inquire into the policy of military operations undertaken four years ago, which, in opposition, he did not thought fit at the time to move for? He could not; nor would the public interest be advanced by the inquiry. Were the committee acquiesced in, others would be demanded, and the attention of the Queen's Government would be transferred from the Crown to the House of Commons. The disasters had been retrieved and the insults avenged; and his counsel to the House was not to risk a disturbance of our present most friendly relations with Russia, or sanction a precedent which would act most disadvantageously to the public service, by voting for this committee.—Lord J. LAMBTON accepted the unintentional disavowal of support from him by Mr. Roebuck when he accused him of mischievous and reckless activity: for, as that gentleman's notion of mischief was notoriously peculiar, it was the duty of every man engaged in the service of the public service, such an accusation was as high a compliment as could be paid to him. Language such as that used by the Member for Bath was derogatory only to him who employed it, and he would not condescend to imitate it. It was erroneous to say that the papers already before the House were garbled, and it was equally erroneous to say that Sir Alexander Burnes was overborne by any of the persons implicated. Every document that encompassed our Indian empire simultaneously on every side, that no other course remained for Lord Auckland to pursue save that which he had adopted—of establishing in Affghanistan some regular authority with which relations of peace and alliance could be permanently maintained. The papers before the country fully justified the necessity of the expedition. But, while he could not withhold his support from the present Government in

THE TESTIMONIAL TO SIR MOSES MONTEFIORE, F.R.S.

THE MONTEFIORE TESTIMONIAL.

It will be recollected that, in 1840, Sir Moses Montefiore undertook a mission "in defence of the Jews of Damascus and Rhodes, from the false accusations which had been made against them, and in consequence of which they had suffered unexampled persecution, and some of them had died under torture. His exertions were eminently successful: such of the accused as had been imprisoned were restored to liberty; others, who had sought safety in flight, were permitted to return to their homes in peace; and he obtained a firman from his Imperial Majesty Sultan Abdul-Medjid, proclaiming the innocence of the accused, the falsehood of the aspersions cast on the Jewish religion, and also declaring that the Jewish people throughout the Turkish dominions shall enjoy the same privileges as all other nations subject to the Ottoman rule." Many of the friends and admirers of Sir Moses in this noble expedition were desirous to commemorate his laudable exertions, and raised a subscription in order to present him with a piece of plate indicative of their esteem. The result has been the following splendid work of art, which was designed by Sir G. Hayter, sculptured by E. Baille, Esq., R.A., and executed by Messrs. Mortimer and Hunt. It is exclusively ornamental, being adapted for no special purpose, but being as it were a kind of miniature monument. It is 3½ feet high, weighs 1319 ounces, and covers a large quadrangular base. The prominent figure surmounting the work represents David conquering the lion and rescuing the lamb (1st Sam. xvii.), and is emblematical of the conquest of oppressive force and the delivery of innocence, effected by the mission. Immediately under this figure are four bas-reliefs. The first represents the landing of Sir Moses Montefiore at Alexandria. In the boat are Lady Montefiore, Dr. Loewe, Dr. Madden, and Mr. Wire.—The second represents the audience with the Sultan at Constantinople, and the granting of the firman.—The third is figurative of the liberation of the prisoners at Damascus; they are crowding round Sir Moses, offering to him their thanks, while he (in his uniform as deputy-lieutenant of an English county) occupies a commanding position, and points to Heaven as the place to which their thanks should be addressed.—The fourth represents the public thanksgiving, after his return, at the ark of the synagogue in Bevis Marks. Beneath the four compartments just described, and at the corners of four others, stand out four exquisitely executed figures in frosted silver. Two represent Moses and Ezra, the great deliverers of their people: Moses supports the tables of the law; Ezra is reading a scroll on which is inscribed the 21st verse of the 8th chapter of his book. The two other figures represent the Jews of Damascus—one is loaded with chains, bare-headed and bare-footed, with an expression of deep misery depicted on his countenance. The remaining figure is on his knee returning thanks to God for his liberation: the fetters are broken at his side. Under each are verses in Hebrew, allusive to the figure above. Over these four principal figures hangs the foliage of the fig and the vine, adding great richness and delicacy to the general effect. There are four compartments on the base; one contains a suitable inscription, surmounted by the arms of Sir Moses Montefiore, in relief, and having the royal supporters, as granted by her Majesty in recognition of these his services to the cause of humanity and religious freedom.—The second, opposite to this represents the passage of the Red Sea, and the Egyptian oppressors of Israel being overwhelmed at the intercession of Moses.—The third indicates the state of lawless violence in the world, typified by lions and wolves devouring flocks—the strong destroying the weak.—The fourth, opposite to this, represents the state of general concord, security, and happiness—the various animals living together as described by Isaiah. The whole is supported by sphinxes, indicative of the nation (Egypt) which so long held Israel in bondage.

The work altogether is a magnificent specimen of British art. Let us hope that it will fitly perpetuate the memory of this important event, and be an acceptable tribute to the illustrious champion of Israel, for whom it is intended.

We now give the other portions of the testimonial not seen in our large engravings.

SECOND BAS RELIEF.

THIRD BAS RELIEF.

The presentation of this most valuable token of regard took place on Monday last, the 27th ult., at the residence of Sir Moses Montefiore in Park-lane. The deputation was headed by H. de Castro, Esq., the chairman, when the following address was delivered by Mr. De Castro, to which a suitable reply was given:—

To Sir Moses Montefiore, F.R.S.

Esteemed Sir,—We have long looked forward to the present, as a moment of high and honourable gratification, when we should come forward on behalf of the Jewish community, to present to you this manifestation of their gratitude and esteem. The services which, at a period of excitement and persecution, you rendered in a foreign clime to religion and humanity were such as are rarely called into requisition. The alacrity, spirit, and zeal with which you embarked in the cause were only equalled by the liberality, judgment, and decision you evinced in the accomplishment of the end you had in view—the restoration of the oppressed to liberty, and a full refutation of the vile calumnies brought against our faith. Both these great objects, by the aid of a gracious Providence, have been attained. The grateful thanksgivings of the liberated prisoners pronounce you their deliverer. The firman of the Sultan denies those calumnies of which they had been the unfortunate victims. It may be truly said of you, Sir, and of your amiable lady, the companion of your anxieties and dangers, that your services were the labours of the heart, works of all others most deserving of distinction and reward. May you ever be the harbinger of glad tidings to Zion, and long live to continue your watchful care to all who need your solace and support. How will your suffering brethren of Jerusalem hail your last act of munificence, the founding of a dispensary for the poor of our community now dwelling in the land of our fathers. In the name of the Jewish people, we present to you this testimonial of your great and successful labours, with the hope that the blessing of our Heavenly Father may vouchsafe to you and Lady Montefiore many, many happy years to contemplate and enjoy it.

On behalf of the Committee, HANANEL DE CASTRO, Chairman.

After which Sir Moses entertained the committee and some near relatives and friends to a splendid banquet. The company comprised about thirty-two guests; amongst which were Baroness de Rothschild, Baron Lionel de Rothschild, Mr. Anthony de Rothschild, Sir Isaac Lyon Goldsmid, Bart., Mr. David Salomons, Mr. Benjamin Gompertz, Isaac Cohen, Esq., Benjamin Cohen, Esq., I. Samuels, companions of his mission; David Williams Wire, Esq., and the learned Dr. Loewe, &c. &c. &c. The meeting, which was one of the most interesting and animated character, did not separate until a late hour, all parties highly gratified—the guests with their estimable host, and the host with his warm and valued friends.

THE CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS.—No. XXIX.

MORTLAKE CHURCH.

Though not distinguished for any architectural pretensions, the old church of Mortlake is not without its claim to our notice. It was first built about the year 1348, as appears from a record in the Tower, being a license "to the Archbishop of Canterbury to give a piece of ground in Bercroft—nine perches square—to Adomar, parson of Wimbledon, and his successors, to erect a chapel for the ease of the bodies and the health of the souls of the inhabitants of Mortlake." Of this original structure the only portion that now remains is the outward door of the belfry. In 1543 the church was rebuilt; as we find by the date upon the tower, and from an inscription on the east wall of the chancel—over it is "Vivat R. H. 8." The walls, as in so many of our old parish churches, are built of flint and stone chequered, which, if not productive of the beautiful, has at least the advantage of an enduring utility. A few of the windows, with the flat arches which were in use in the reign of Henry VIII., are still remaining, but the greater portion have made way for others of a more modern date. The tower, which is at the west end, is square and embattled. In 1725 the south aisle was rebuilt, considerably enlarged, and a gallery erected, by the voluntary subscription of the inhabitants. The font, which is ornamented with rich Gothic tracery, was given by Archbishop Bourchier, as appears by his arms upon it, and is an enduring memorial of both his piety and good taste. While the manor belonged to the see of Canterbury the manor-house at Mortlake was dignified as the occasional residence of the archbishops, most of whom dated some of their public acts from that place. Of these Archbishop Anselm is the first of whom we have any record, he having celebrated the feast of Whitsuntide there in the year 1099. It remained in their hands down to the time of Cranmer, who alienated the manor-house and lands to Henry for other lands adjacent; and it is probable that the house was shortly afterwards pulled down, not a trace of it now remaining, except the foundation of a wall, which forms a garden boundary by the river side. In exploring the tombs of this ancient burial-place, we stumbled upon that of John Partridge, the "famous astrologer." After all his efforts to convince Sir Richard Steele and the town to the contrary—"life and its fitful fever o'er"—he sleeps well at last. Here was also interred, after attaining the highest honours of the Irish bar, Sir John Temple, in 1704; as also John Barber, memorable for his successful opposition to the ministerial scheme of a general excise. Sir John Barnard, too, who is mentioned by Pope, in the same line with the man of Ross, and of whom it is mentioned, that having been honoured by having his statute placed in the Royal Exchange, he could never afterwards be persuaded to enter that building. The celebrated Dr. Dee, whose threatened earthquake made such a sensation in the past year, was a native of this parish, having been born here in 1527, He was sent at an early age to the university, at which he greatly distinguished himself, and obtained his degree, soon after which he made a considerable sensation at the court of the youthful monarch by his pretended discoveries. On Mary's accession he was neglected, when he obtained permission to travel on the Continent, and was supplied with means to enable him to do so. He was received by the continental sovereigns with extraordinary favours, and at length returned home at the commencement of Elizabeth's reign, by whom he was favourably received. He gave out that by means of a miraculous glass which he possessed, he could at will hold communication with invisible spirits of good and evil, over whom he had controul. After a life of extraordinary vicissitude, principally brought on by his own extravagance, he died here in 1608, having been so poor in the latter part of his life as to be obliged to sell his library piecemeal for subsistence. The house in which he lived is still standing; it was most probably built in the reign of Henry VII., and until within a few years since a room was shown as his favourite apartment, which, in the taste of the time, was profusely decorated with red and white roses.

THE FASHIONS.

Paris, Rue Charles d'Anjou, Feb. 21, 1843

Mon cher Monsieur,—So little alteration has taken place in the form and fashion of our dresses since my last letter, that I think it may perhaps suit your readers better were I to give you a description of some of our most admired accessories to the toilette. In the first place, then, let me mention that among the flowers used, either as head-dress or as trimmings to robes, none are more worn than garlands of jessamine mixed with roses; and that for crowns for the head, such as the coronne Norma, camellias in velvet, or the cactus with purple foliage are much preferred, and, indeed, the latter are almost equally in request for garlands à la Pompadour to be placed upon the triple skirts of gauze or stuff robes now worn. As regards head-dresses I have just seen a most charming eccentricity from the atelier of Alexandrine, called a bonnet Phrygien, and which has a little point of cashmere completely embroidered with gold and pearls, terminating in a tassel which falls upon the shoulder. It is difficult to imagine anything more coquettish, more uncommon, or more strikingly pretty than this head-dress. Equally remarkable, but in a very different style, is the coiffure Anne Boleyn, by the same artist. This is composed of violet-coloured velvet fringed with pearls falling like brides on each side of the temple, and which forms a very effective head-dress for a brown-haired beauty. But perhaps the greatest success of the season is the re-appearance of the Marie Stuart head dress. We have seen several of these in sky-blue and white velvet with the triple point ornamented with pearls, and the bottom formed with a fringe of the same precious material. An English lady has just had one made in bright green velvet ornamented with diamonds and fringed with gold. The toque Lavallière is also one of the most distinguished coiffures of the present day. It is a little scarf of gold intermixed with and wreathing round the plaits of Carmelite velvet, which is surrounded with a fringe of gold lace falling down like a veil on each side of the neck. One side of this golden veil is slightly sustained by a white camelia with a centre of diamonds, the other by a little branch of brown foliage mounted upon a sprig of gold or of diamonds. At the late Court Last Ball nothing could exceed the beauty or the richness of many of the toilettes worn; perhaps, however, the dress of a distinguished foreign ambassadress may be considered entitled to claim pre-eminence. It was a robe of Medicis satin on a white ground, embroidered with rosebuds and heartsease, emblems of pleasure and ease; a garland of the same flowers surrounded her forehead, of which the foliage was composed of magnificent emeralds. This dress, which was said to have been presented to the fair wearer by the Empress of Russia, was of surpassing beauty, and agreed marvellously with the light hair of the noble lady who wore it. Velvet robes were very numerous at this ball, and as they are now made are very becoming. I should remark the openness of the dress at the front of the bosom is not increasing, for the single reason that the thing is impossible; but the nakedness of the shoulders is much augmented, and I almost fancy it has now attained its utmost limits. White crape, rose and skyblue embroidered organdy, ornamented with little bouquets of silver and silk, are the most fashionable stuffs for ladies who dance. These robes have often two, and even three, skirts, and the borders of each of these are trimmed either by a ribbon or by tufts of flowers; the busts come down to a point in front, and sometimes behind, and the turn of the skirt is always crossed. As regards the form and fashion of these dresses, as I have before said, we have nothing new since my last letter. I shall, therefore, content myself with the description I have just given you, and shall reserve any further observations till my next. Adieu.

HENRIETTE DE B.

POPULAR PORTRAITS.—No. XXXII.

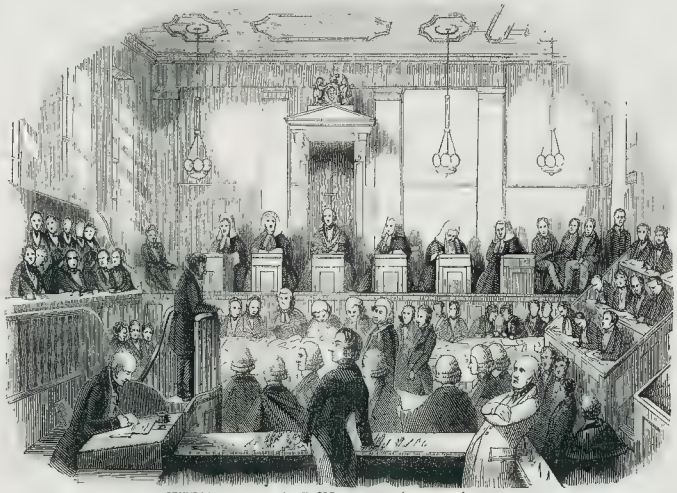
LORD ABINGER.

Lord Abinger has for some time past had a considerable share of public attention drawn towards himself, first from the proceedings connected with the trials of the Chartist rioters last autumn, and next by the debate in the House of Commons on the subject, on the motion of Mr. Duncombe. It scarcely needed a formal motion or debate to make the world acquainted with a fact of which it was perfectly cognizant before, that Lord Abinger is a strong political partisan. It may be conceded, too, that the motion proved him to be less cautious in his language than befits the calmness and dignity of the judicial bench. Beyond this there was nothing blameable established: it was not proved that the somewhat intemperate words had preceded actions intemperate also; it was not shown that the prisoners were dealt with in any way unbecoming the high character which attaches to the general administration of our criminal law. The "dread goddess" did indeed "lay her chastening hand" upon the offenders, but it is generally conceded that it was as "gently" as was consistent with the public safety and the continuance of public peace. She visited them not "in Gorgon terrors clad;" she did her duty, but can hardly be said to have done more, or pushed punishment to any approach to vindictiveness. If, then, in point of fact, all the forms and essentials of law and justice were observed—if the prisoners' witnesses were neither coerced nor browbeat—if the criminals had every opportunity of defending themselves we cannot bring ourselves to believe that a formal parliamentary censure could be grounded on language applied to speculative doctrines of politics, and which did not influence the after conduct of the judge to the prejudice of those brought before him. It would be better that such addresses should be abstained from on the bench; that they are out of place all will agree, but they rather offend against good taste and feeling than amount to a positive breach of judicial impartiality. Compare the conduct of Lord Abinger with the brutality of Coke on the trial of Sir W. Raleigh, or with that of the bloodthirsty Jefferies on the trial of the insurgents in the west of England (a nearer parallel), and what we mean will be at once made evident. These men perverted every rule and form of law, made themselves vindictive persecutors, and violated every decency of society and humanity. It is almost an injustice to Lord Abinger to couple his name for a moment with them.

James Scarlett Lord Abinger is the son of Robert Scarlett, Esq., of Jamaica, and brother of the late Sir William Scarlett, who was for some time chief justice of that island. He is one of those legal men of whom it is difficult to say whether they are better known as politicians or lawyers. For many years, first as Mr. Scarlett, and then as Sir James, he was busily employed at the bar and in Parliament, establishing a reputation in both; but we know not that there is anything in his career to distinguish him particularly from those who raise themselves by the same talents and energy to the same elevation. He was the attorney-general of the Wellington administration, and was raised to the peerage in 1835, with the title of Lord Abinger. His judicial situation is that of Chief Baron of the Exchequer, to which, on his retirement, which is spoken of, Lord Brougham is said to have some desire to succeed. His abilities as a lawyer are too well known to require any observation here; of his merits as a judge there will be a more divided opinion. His greatest failing appears to us to be one of manner rather than any essential defect. He does not sufficiently weigh his language. The late proceedings were not the only instance of this; he was considered to have given far too decided a concurrence to the observations of the counsel of Nicolas Suisse as to the "excellence" of the character of that most wealthy of valets. Lord Abinger is of a tall and portly figure, with a full, florid countenance, which would seem to indicate a better state of health than he is said to possess.

SHERIFF'S PROCESSION—MANCHESTER.

The spring assizes for the northern division of the Lancashire Assizes commenced at Lancaster on Saturday last. On the evening of that day, Sir Robert Mousey Rolfe, Knight, one of the barons of her Majesty's Court of Exchequer, arrived in Lancaster by railway-train from London, which reached Lancaster about eight o'clock. William Garnett, Esq., of Lark Hill, Salford, the high sheriff, arrived with his cortége and retinue, by special train from Manchester, about four o'clock; and he proceeded with his train to the railway-station to receive the lord baron on his arrival. We are enabled to introduce here a scene, illustrative of the progress of the high sheriff, as the procession appeared whilst passing down Victoria-street, Manchester, towards the railway terminus. On the arrival of the learned baron, he proceeded at once to the castle, and opened her Majesty's commission in the Crown Court, adjourning the court to Monday morning at ten o'clock. On Sunday morning the learned judge, accompanied and attended by the high sheriff, the mayor, and several of the aldermen of Lancaster, &c., attended divine service at St. Mary's. (The trials of the Chartists will be found in another column.)



CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT, OLD BAILEY—M'NAUGHTEN'S TRIAL.

This is an eventful season of trials at sessions, and the few days that comprise their varying details will occupy no small share of public interest and attention. We take the opportunity of exhibiting the interior of the Central Criminal Court at the Old Bailey; and while his trial is yet in progress, we have introduced the person of one individual whose crime has created so powerful a sensation of horror in the public mind.

TRIAL OF DANIEL M'NAUGHTEN, THE ASSASSIN.

FRIDAY.

This being the day appointed for the trial of Daniel M'Naughten, the assassin of the late lamented Mr. Edward Drummond, the greatest bustle and excitement prevailed in the vicinity of the Old Bailey from an early hour in the morning. Numbers of carriages were seen setting down at the entrances of the court ladies and gentlemen who had been fortunate enough to obtain orders of admission.

The body of the court around the counsels' table was, as usual on such occasions, crowded by young and brieflees barristers, some of whom never put on their wigs and gowns, except to convert them into a pass-ticket to some "show" trial, for such do all trials of extraordinary character become at the Old Bailey. The crowding, bustle, and excitement, were, however, equal, if not greater, than at the trials of Courvoisier and Daniel Good.

The counsel for the prosecution were the Solicitor-General, Mr. Waddington, and Mr. Russell Gurney; and Mr. Cockburn, Mr. Bodkin, Mr. Clarkson, and Mr. Monteith, appeared for the prisoner.

At ten o'clock the Judges entered the Court, and took their seats on the bench. They were Chief Justice Tindal, Mr. Justice Williams, and Mr. Justice Coleridge. At this time every seat was occupied, and the court presented a most animated appearance.

The prisoner was then brought into the dock, and placed at the bar. He looked still in good health, and his cheeks wore the same florid appearance as before, although he manifested considerable trepidation, and appeared to breathe very rapidly—has up especially indicating the painfully excited state of his feelings.

Mr. Clarke, the Clerk of the Arraigns, then proceeded to read over the indictment, which charged the prisoner with the wilful murder of Mr. Edward Drummond, by shooting him with a pistol and ball, by which he did mortally wound and kill the said Mr. Edward Drummond. Having done so, he asked the prisoner whether he pleaded Guilty, or Not Guilty. The prisoner, in a tolerably clear and firm tone of voice replied, Not Guilty

The Solicitor-General, amid profound silence, proceeded to address the jury, and stated calmly and dispassionately the facts and circumstances connected with this most melancholy occurrence. He told them that Mr. Drummond, whose death it was their duty to inquire into, was, as they were, doubtless, well aware, the private secretary of the Premier. he was on terms of intimacy and friendship with that right hon. gentleman, and by virtue of his office he occupied apartments in the Premier's house, in Downing-street, and that he was in the constant habit of passing from those apartments to the private residence of Sir —— Peel, in Whitehall-gardens; and it would be proved before them in evidence that on the prisoner at the bar was, previously to this transaction, been for many days seen loitering about the public office, and passing by the office in Downing-street; that his conduct had excited the attention of many persons, and, among them, the attention of several soldiers and policemen, who had spoken to him; but, unfortunately, no steps were taken to remove him away, or prevent his continuing to remain there, and on Friday afternoon, the 20th Jan., at about three o'clock, Mr. Drummond left his apartments in Downing-street, and proceeded to the Treasury, from the Treasury he proceeded to the Admiralty, in company with Lord Haddington. Lord Haddington he left at the Admiralty, and proceeded across into the home of Messrs. Drummond, which, as they knew, was in Charing-cross, and in returning towards his apartments, when he came near a coffee-house called the Salopian Coffee house, the prisoner at the bar—for there was no doubt of the evidence behind him and discharged a pistol almost close to him. After he had discharged that, he was seen to shrink his hand into his breast and pull out another pistol, and he would state that discharging, when a policeman ran across the road, and, throwing his arms round his body, prevented him from so doing. A violent struggle ensued, during which the second pistol went off, without doing any damage. He was then secured, and taken to the police station to Gardiner's-lane, where he was searched, and a 5l. bank-note, a deposit-note upon a Glasgow bank for 200l, and some prayer-books, which, doubtless, he was going to read after his arrests were found upon him. Mr. Drummond, after the pistol was fired, staggered, but —— walked, almost without assistance, back to the office, where he was assisted —— gentleman was procured, and he was removed to his own private residence ——. He was —— attended by two surgeons of great eminence, namely, Mr. Guthrie and Mr. Brandis. Considerable hopes were entertained that the wound might not prove mortal. Unhappily, however, these hopes were disappointed, he lingered in great pain, until Wednesday, the 25th of January, when he died. His death had given great and bitter pain, for he was —— man who was universally beloved. He was of a disposition so altogether amiable, that it was impossible he could have had a personal enemy. They would ask, what could have induced the prisoner to wish to deprive of life a being so amiable? For Mr. Drummond did not fill that prominent situation before the public which should render him obnoxious to any political enmity. But he was private secretary to the Prime Minister of this country. He was the inmate of that house in which the Premier transacted his official business, and he was constantly passing to and from that house, and the prisoner, as would be proved, was continually watching him about. He had himself made the declaration, that it was not the life of Mr. Drummond, but the life of Sir Robert Peel, that he had intended to take. It was Sir Robert Peel's life that he believed he was destroying, when he discharged that fatal pistol. But the nature of the crime was not altered by that fact, and he (Sir W. Follett) need not tell them that the prisoner was equally guilty of murder, although he had mistaken the person against whom he had discharged the pistol, and of the guilt of having deprived Mr. Drummond of his life, it was impossible that he could suggest a doubt. It was equally impossible to doubt that that crime was murder. He was aware, however, from an appearance on which he had been sworn to this court, that it was intended to rest the defence of the prisoner upon the plea that he was insane at the time of his committing the act; and it would be their painful duty, and a most painful one it was, to say whether the prisoner was or was not at that time in such a state of mind as not to be responsible or answerable to the laws of his country. This was a defence which was admitted at all times, if it could be proved to be well grounded. On the one hand, it was one which must be effectual in point of law, if made out; but, on the other hand, the public were demanded that so atrocious crime of that nature should not go unpunished from an imagined insanity. It was often dreadful for persons of well regulated minds to understand the motive that could have prompted a person to the commission of such crimes, particularly when directed against those against whom no feeling existed in their favour. If they looked back to history, they would see that many persons had been deprived of life by the hand of the assassin, and they must look far back. The occurrences of our own time, unfortunately, afforded too many instances. If we turned our eyes abroad, we should see, in the midst of open day, and in the crowded streets of the metropolis of France, in the midst of the people, and close to the Tuileries, an assassin had discharged their weapons against the Sovereign of their country. For this they have no mercy to plead at the hands of the law. There were instances in which persons had discharged instruments, regardless of how many or what lives they might destroy, provided only that they succeeded in killing that one King. As the defence would be rested on evidence to show that the prisoner was not in a sane state of mind when he committed the offence, he would refer to some of the legal authorities upon the point. Not that he for one moment meant to say that the opinion which they (the jury) would have to decide was a question of law. It did not regard it as a question of law, but as a question of fact—a question for a jury. The question for their question would be, whether they were or were not satisfied that the prisoner, at the time of committing the crime, was in a state of mind which entitled him to be acquitted on the principle of distinguishing between right and wrong, and under the influence of some disease of mind which prevented him from being conscious of what he was doing, and from knowing that he was violating the laws of God and man. If they believed that he was so incapable of distinguishing, then the prisoner would be clearly entitled to his acquittal. But it was his duty to tell them that by the principles of the law of England it was by no means an excuse the crime. It would not be sufficient to show that he laboured under partial insanity, or a merely partial delusion of the mind, if it was not an act of insanity, whatever delusions he might have laboured under, if he knew how to distinguish between right and wrong. If he knew what he did, and was conscious that what he did was wrong, he was guilty of murder. It appeared to him almost impossible that by which insanity could be defined. It assumed so many and various shapes, that it could not be strictly defined. But the rule which was laid down was this—that it was a question for the jury, whether, upon all the facts and circumstances of the case, they could say that the prisoner was a responsible agent, and that he was capable of distinguishing between right and wrong, and that he was conscious that he was acting against the laws of his country and his God. The public safety was the object of all laws, and it was entrusted to the criminal tribunals to put in force and administer these laws, with a view to the preservation and safety of the public. Lord Bacon, in his text-book said, that there was a partial insanity and a total insanity. The former was one respect of some persons who were competent to the ordinary business of life, but who yet abnormal under some dominant regarding others. It was quite appearing with absolutely persons, in whom it existed fear and grief, and who were yet not destitute of reason, and the persons' insanity seemed not to excuse them for any offence which they might commit. That learned authority Lord Hale further said it was very difficult to define the certain lines of insanity, but it must rest upon the circumstances to be weighed by the judge and jury to determine. This was the leading principle of law. The Solicitor-General then proceeded to refer to the case of Lord Ferrers, and pointed out to them that the plea of insanity had there failed, although it formed a feature in the symptom which he had previously manifested, contemplated putting him under restraint. He next referred to the cases of Arnad, who had well for Lord Onslow, as well as those of Bowler, of Hadfield (for shooting at his Majesty George III.), and of Bellingham, for the murder of Mr. Perceval; in all of which the same principle had been laid down by which to test the sanity or insanity of the prisoner at the bar. He detailed the circumstances attending the life and conduct of the prisoner during his residence in Glasgow, at his visits to this country, and immediately previous to the dreadful act which he now stood charged. He concluded by telling the jury that it was some consolation to him (the Solicitor-General) to know that the interests of the prisoner would be most ably and powerfully advocated, it would be their duty to listen attentively to the statements of his learned friend (Mr Cockburn), and to weigh the evidence which he should adduce against that which would be produced on the part of the Crown, and then say whether the prisoner was or were not satisfied that the prisoner was a responsible agent. If they thought he was not a responsible agent, they would acquit him; but if they thought he was responsible, the result would be a different verdict. It was a painful duty, but a duty which must be discharged, and he was perfectly satisfied that were they had heard this evidence their verdict would be a verdict of justice between the Crown and the prisoner at the —The learned Solicitor-General then sat down amid a profound silence

The prisoner at first maintained great self-possession, but before the Solicitor-General had concluded his opening address, he became very weak as I faint. He was provided with a chair, and during the remainder of the morning appeared suffering great mental agony. He paid but little attention to what was going forward.

The first witness called was James Silver, a police-constable of the A division, who, having been sworn, deposed as follows: On the 20th of January I was on duty near Charing-cross, about 30 minutes before four. I was on the right hand side coming from Whitehall, near Mr. Grove's, the f shmonger. My attention was attracted by the report of a pistol on the opposite side of the street, and I saw a gentleman leaning with his hand resting on his left side, and his coat was burning; and I also saw the prisoner in the act of putting a pistol into his breast with his right hand, and he was standing behind the gentleman who appeared to be wounded. I then saw the prisoner draw another pistol from his right breast with his left hand, and he placed it in his right hand. I immediately ran to him and seized his right arm as he was in the act of presenting the second pistol at the gentleman whom I first saw: the prisoner struggled very hard with me, and in the course of it the pistol was discharged upon the pavement. The prisoner struggled with great force to get from my grasp, and I tripped him up and he fell to the ground. I then took one pistol from his right hand and a second from his breast, and took him immediately to the station-house. As we were going he said, "What a pity it was I did not break my peace of mind any longer. The pistol-ball, which I also produce, was given to me by Colonel Drummond, the brother of the deceased.

Cross-examined: No more than a few seconds elapsed between the firing of the first pistol and the second being produced.

Benjamin Weston, an office porter, corroborated this testimony.

Mr. Richard Jackson, examined by Sir Richard Gurney: I am a surgeon, and I was acquainted with the late Mr. Drummond from his infancy. On the day in question I was sent for to see the deceased at the banking house at Charing-cross. I found he had been wounded, and accompanied him in his carriage to his own residence. Myself, Mr. H. Cooper, and Mr. Guthrie, afterwards attended the deceased, and we extracted the ball the same day. Mr. Drummond died on the following Wednesday

Mr. G. J. Guthrie: I am a surgeon, and I was called in to attend the deceased on the day this occurrence happened. I found Mr. Bransby Cooper also in attendance, and we both examined the wound; and, judging the direction the ball would take, we found it immediately, and extracted the ball in the front of Mr. Drummond's person. I continued to attend Mr. Drummond until his death, and was present at the examination after death. The nature of the wound was such that it was utterly impossible a person should recover from it, and it was, of course, the cause of death. The ball had passed through the body, but not quite straight. The diaphragm was wounded, and that is a part of the body which never heals. I never knew any man recover from such a wound as Mr. Drummond had received.

Mr. Bransby Cooper examined by Mr. Waddington: I also attended the late Mr. Drummond, and I took the bullet from the incision that was made. I marked that bullet, and know it to be the same now produced. I concur in the evidence given by Mr. Guthrie, and I have no doubt that the wound was the cause of death.

J. M. Tierney examined: I am an inspector of police. I went to the station house in Gardiner's-lane on the 20th of January. I saw the prisoner there. I visited him during the evening four or five times. I never knew any man recover from such a wound as Mr. Drummond had received.

By Mr. Cockburn: I was not directed by any one to put any questions to the prisoner. I had my uniform on at the time, I conversed with him. I cautioned him several times before he told me what I have stated. If he had not said he thought it was Sir Robert Peel, I should not have said anything about my conversation with the prisoner. My object in putting questions to him was for the purpose of ascertaining who he was, where he came from, and what induced him to commit the act. I mentioned the conversation shortly after it occurred. No one was present at the time it occurred. I first mentioned the conversation to Mr. Burnaby, chief clerk of Bow-street, and afterwards to the magistrate, Mr. Hall. I do not give evidence on the first examination of the prisoner. I sent a written report of what passed between the prisoner and me to the Police Commissioners.

Mr. Cockburn: What I stated was not directed by any one. I do

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MARCH 4, 1843.

"Out of evil cometh good." A case of cruelty perpetrated upon a poor and helpless orphan in the mining districts,—a case which it is appalling to read of, and, as a vile debasement of human nature, most melancholy to record, has created, by exposure, not only the certainty of a just retribution upon the wretch who committed the tyranny, but, having been, by the virtuous instrumentality of Lord Ashley, forced upon the attention of the Legislature, has produced fair reason for the belief that the full, generous, and humane purpose of that nobleman's original bill of last session will, ere long, be carried out by the Legislature, stripped of the modifications, or rather drawbacks, which it has already undergone. If, for instance, that particular clause of it which cancelled the power of apprenticeship for underground labour had not been expunged from the measure before it was carried, it would have remained so much the more excellent, and we should not now have had to record the atrocious tyranny for which we are only mournfully consoling society as far an evil out of which good may yet arise.

The narrative we have to adduce is one to excite loathing and abhorrence, and but for the clear and broad authenticity which has made credence of it imperative, would almost defy belief; at least we are sure that in any civilized society in which it might be told without the palpable confirmation we speak of, its verity would not only be doubted, but indignantly denied, as a horror impossible of occurrence in free England. The worst brutalities of that slavery which this country and her patriots have eradicated with so much enthusiasm and glory did not surpass, in their ancient cruelty, the torturing ingenuity of a modern master of an English mine.

It would appear, from the statements in the Halifax Guardian, that an orphan boy, named James Whiteley, was apprenticed to a collier named Joseph Whiteley (from the identity of nomenclature we presume the existence of some tie of kindred between the brute and his victim, which only aggravates the dark infamy of the former's crime), as a hurrier at Blackly, near Elland. The boy was then only nine years of age; he is now seventeen, and during all this interval of time he had had practised upon him a series of cruel, unrelenting, and disgusting barbarities. We cannot go into the long and sickening detail of these remorseless wrongs, of the agonies he was made to endure, the refined inflictions of misery he was forced to undergo, the complications of mental and bodily wretchedness which broke his health and spirit, and made anguish the very badge and symbol of his tortured being. It will be more than our readers will like now, or desire again to contemplate, if we lay before them the revolting story of what this helpless and world-forsaken orphan boy has had compressed into the endurance of only two weeks by the monster to whom the law allowed him to be bound.

It appears that the severe flogging which Whiteley received caused him once or twice to run away from his master. A short time ago he was so beaten with a hurrier's strap, and a heavy piece of wood (piece of an old cradle), that the again resolved upon running away. He did so, but on Tuesday fortnight he was brought before the Halifax magistrates by his master, charged with disobedience. Through the threats and menaces of the cruel tyrant who had treated him so barbarously he was prevented stating the whole facts of the case to the bench. The lad had intended showing the various wounds inflicted upon his person; enough, however, was said to induce the magistrates to reprimand the master, and the boy was ordered to go back again, and the master warned not to ill treat him in future. The warning, however, was neglected. The same day he administered a most brutal castigation to his victim, which he repeated every day while the lad remained with him. Our readers may imagine that the barrowman's duties which are to follow are tinged with an air of fiction. They are facts. The poor lad, when down in the pit, was beaten with a stick, and between each stroke the instrument was dipped in water. The lad's back became one mass of sores, and it was impossible for him to lie in bed. While subjected to this inhuman treatment, he was allowed three meals per day of thin water porridge only; and, in consequence of his having no clothes, he was forced to do all parts of his body. Frequently was he sent into the pit without breakfast, and obliged to perform the whole of his drudgery. What made this the more painful was the fact of his labouring under the effects of a severe wound inflicted upon his right knee some time since. On that occasion, while beating him with a hurrier's strap, the master took hold of the end opposite the buckle (which is generally a tolerably large one), thus causing a more severe punishment; in one of the strokes the buckle caught the poor lad on the right knee, and tore away a large piece of flesh! The lad, however, was still forced to work.

On Thursday fortnight this monster master ducked the lad's head three or four times in a bowl of water, wetting his shirt all over, and then forced him into the cellar, where he was locked up all night, without bed, chair, table, or even a morsel of wheat! The same treatment was about to be practised on the next night, but he begged so pitifully for mercy that he was al owed to go to bed. On the following Saturday night he was again forced into the cellar, where he remained all night. The next morning (Sunday) he was brought out; no breakfast was given him; but as a further punishment, his master suspended a heavy bag of iron round his neck and forced him to walk up and down the room under the terror of another flogging. Some cold porridge (which had been left the previous day) was warmed up and offered him, but he could not eat. His master then left the house, saying he would look out for a good thick stick. The woman shortly after left the house for the purpose of fetching some water from a neighbouring well, and the lad being thus for a few moments left alone, resolved upon trying once more to escape from a worse than African slavery. With great exertion he managed to unloose the bag of iron from his neck, and made his escape into Grimscar Wood. From thence he steadily proceeded to the old Copperas Works, where he remained till nightfall. During his concealment in the old Copperas Works he heard his master seeking him. The lad, when referring to this circumstance, shudders involuntarily, saying, "I did tremble then." Fortunately, however, he was not discovered.

The will of Providence, and the humanity which became God's instrument in the hands of the charitable people whom the boy encountered, not only rescued him from discovery and saved his life, but has led to the dreadful exposure we have given, and to the interference of the British Legislature—in the true spirit of the native freedom of the country and constitution—to extend its protection even to so poor and powerless a creature as this crushed and orphan lad. This protection, however, should not, let us submit, be isolated in its effect; its application should be, not only to the single child of grievance, but to the grievance itself, of which he is the miserable object and example, and it should enforce its power, not only in retribution upon an abuser, but in reform of an abuse. From this hour forth that part of the law should be expunged which tolerates "underground apprenticeship," that is, which tolerates a state of licence under which similar cruelties to those we have narrated could have a possibility of occurrence within the English realm. Thus the good may come—and furthermore there is some already worked in the amount of publicity which the poor boy's terrible affliction has already obtained.

He, sad creature, is at least relieved; but we still further rejoice at the ready indignation of Sir James Graham's reply to the powerful and finely-prompted eloquence of Lord Ashley in bringing forward the cases. "Sir James Graham said he could assure his noble friend that, until he had commenced his address to the house, this case was entirely unknown to him. He quite sympathised in the feeling of disgust which the noble lord had expressed, and in which he was sure the house participated, and was ready to institute an inquiry into all the circumstances. He was prepared to send down persons worthy of confidence to inquire into the facts alleged, and, if they should be substantiated, it would be his duty, on the part of the Crown, to direct a prosecution. He was glad to have that opportunity of stating to his noble friend that, notwithstanding anything that had occurred during the progress of the bill to which he had alluded last session, there was no man in that house more anxious than he (Sir J. Graham) to give effect both to the spirit and the letter of that bill, and to adhere most strictly to all its provisions." This was as it should be, and exactly what the Minister should have said. It not only gives direct promise from the Home Secretary of punishment upon the wretch who has oppressed the miscrable boy Whiteley, but it is the earnest of an intention on the part of Government to enforce the letter and spirit of Lord Ashley's glorious humanity against all the horrid and hidden tyrrany that has been so long practised in the mining and colliery districts of the empire. Again we repeat, that "out of evil cometh good."

THE Globe of Thursday evening has an article, some of the arguments of which we fear and hope it can hold in no very lively repute, as it envelopes them entirely within the mysterious authority of "a correspondent." The Globe is wise not to take the onus of writing them upon itself (the onus of publication is more than we should aspire to), for the Globe aims at liberalism in all its views—and nothing can be more illiberal, or opposed to the palpable interests of the public, its health—its affections—its natural and respected prejudices (for some prejudices are entitled to respect) than the arguments to which we allude—directed as they are against one of the worst abuses that ever cursed a metropolis (the crowding and unwholesome burial in graveyards), and also against one of the best and healthiest remedies for the correction of that abuse (interment in the suburbs of a town or city, and in cemeteries consecrated to that sacred end).

The present system of grave-digging in the churchyards of this metropolis is alone horrifying, and completely refutes the only tangible, but not tenable position, taken up by the Globe (that which appeals to the affections) in the following paragraph.

A Parliamentary enactment might prevent a few more interments in towns—it might refuse the prayer of one dying man to lie beneath the same sod that covers the remains of his departed wife—it might seem to preserve a public health by decreeing that the still weeping mother shall not be permitted the melancholy hope of being laid in the same grave with a beloved child—it might order at the bidding of Sir James Graham, that it shall not, in reference to England, be any more said of those who were lovely and pleasant in their lives, that in their deaths they were not divided—all these benefits legislation might confer, but nothing more is left for it to do.

This is intended for a sarcastic probing of the heart, but it will not do; the real outrage upon the affections of the community lies in the indiscriminate grave-digging in the town churchyards, where more reckless disinterment takes place than ever was perpetrated by the "argol"-monger who turned up the skull of poor Yorick to Hamlet's melancholy contemplation. Why, to take the examples of the Globe, the "dying man's" wife will have her bones scattered over the face of the grave-yard, before he (being departed) can descend into the same earth; and the mother who hopes to lie with her child will be mocked in death by the desecration which its remains may receive in the very preliminaries to her own funeral.

So the spade, the pickaxe, and the shovel will divide those who were "lovely and pleasant in their lives," as it does divide them daily—almost hourly we had said—in every burial-ground in London. The desecration of buried remains is both dreadful and disgusting, and will admit of no denial; while, on the other hand, in the vault or tomb of the consecrated cemetery, every feeling sacred to humanity is preserved, and families sleep together in the true and holy peacefulness of the grave.

But, even with that just consideration for the dead to which we humbly and reverentially bow, shall there be no stronger and wider impulse to befriend the living? Shall health be deemed of no import by the great community? And will any one contend that the present burial system in crowded churchyards is not noxious, unwholesome, pestilential, in the highest degree? Why, even as we write we catch the effluvia of consumption rising from the churchyard of St. Clement's Danes, and know that remains there are deposited almost as often as a grave is dug. We set our faces against the present system entirely, and on another occasion shall have more to say.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

DINNER TO SIR CHARLES METCALFE.—This dinner, which was given to the new Governor-General of the Canadas, took place at the rooms of the Colonial Society, in St. James's-square, and was attended by a numerous and influential body of gentlemen connected in various ways with the colonies. Sir Augustus d'Este was in the chair; and, amongst the other guests were W. E. Gladstone, M.P., the Right Hon. the Vice-President of the Board of Trade; G. W. Hope, M.P., the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies; Sir Francis Bond Head, Bart., K.C.H.; Mr. Browning, M.P., &c. &c.

On Wednesday a Court of Directors was held at the East India House, when General Sir Hugh Gough, Bart., G.C.B., was appointed Commander-in-Chief of the Company's forces in India, and also an Extraordinary Member of the Council of India. A vote of thanks similar to that adopted by Parliament, was then passed to the Governor-General and army and officers of India, for their recent military achievements in that country.

CHURCH OF SCOTLAND QUESTION.—On Wednesday evening last the Scotch Church, London Wall, was the scene of great uproar and confusion on the occasion of Dr. Candlish, one of the leaders of the non-intrusion party in Scotland, delivering a lecture on that subject. After the lecture Dr. Brown, one of the senior presbyters, rose to reply to the statements made by Dr. Candlish, but he was assailed with dreadful uproar, and cries of "Put him out," which did not cease until he relinquished the attempt to speak, when the meeting dispersed.

The French Ambassador, the Russian Minister, and the Prussian Minister transacted business on Monday at the Foreign Office. The Chancellor of the Exchequer and other ministers had interviews with Sir Robert Peel.

The Belgian Minister transacted business, on Wednesday, at the Foreign Office.

The Metropolitan Improvement Commissioners had a meeting, on Wednesday, at the office in Whitehall-place. The Lord Mayor, Lord Colborne, Sir Charles Lemon, Sir R. Ingle, the Right Hon. J. Herries, Sir R. Smirke, Mr. Barry, the Earl of Lincoln, the Hon. C. Gore, Mr. Milne, and other commissioners, attended.

ROYAL FREE HOSPITAL.—The annual general meeting of the governors of this great metropolitan charity took place on Tuesday night in the boardroom of the new premises, Gray's Inn-road, the Rev. Dr. Rice, head-master of Christ's Hospital, in the chair. The secretary, the Rev. R. C. Fackman, read the report, by which it appeared that the numbers relieved during the year amounted to 17,232. The report concluded by pressing the necessity of increased exertions to meet the augmented liabilities.

THE RUSSIA COMPANY.—The annual dinner of the Russia Company took place on Wednesday at the London Tavern, and was marked by the convivial hospitality which has ever distinguished the gatherings of that ancient and wealthy mercantile association. The chair was occupied by W. Astell, Esq., the governor of the company, the principal guest being his Excellency Baron Brunow, the Russian Ambassador.

FUNERAL OF RICHARD CARLILE.—SINGULAR PROCEEDINGS. On the occasion of the burial of this singular person, a most unusual and indecent scene took place at the Kensal green Cemetery. On the arrival of the funeral, the Rev. Mr. Twigger, officiating clergyman, took his place at the grave, when one of the late Mr. Carlile's three sons addressed the crowd, divine as follows:—"Sir, we protest against the performance of this ceremony. Our late father lived and died in opposition to prestcraft of every sort. We protest in his name against the service being read." The rev. gentleman replied, "I must perform my duty." Another son of the deceased said, "This is our ground—we have purchased it for our family—we do not require the service to be read, it is a mockery." The rev. gentleman then observed, "It was mockery, then, sir, to bring him here." Another son—"Then, sir, we will not listen to it." The clergyman—"As you please, gentlemen, as you please; but remember the consequences of any opposition to the performance of my sacred duty." A number of persons rallied round, and say let every friend of the late Mr. Carlile go away." The grave was almost immediately deserted, except by a few persons who were attracted by the usual curiosity of a funeral ceremony. The rev. gentleman then proceeded to read the service over the dead with much earnestness and without curtailment, at the end of which he retired.

DARING HIGHWAY ROBBERY IN THE NEW-ROAD. A daring outrage and robbery was perpetrated on Mr. John Rowland, an elderly gentleman, now and for many years parish-clerk of St. James's, Westminster, a few evenings ago, in the New-road, opposite St. Marylebone Church. Mr. Rowland was proceeding towards North Bank, St. John's Wood, and, on his arrival at York gate, leading to the Regent's Park, was struck violently on the head, which, together with the fall, partially stunned him, and while in that condition his great coat and gloves were unbuttoned, and his pockets rifled by two men, five sovereigns being extracted from one of his waistcoat pockets. Some lads coming up at the time, the thieves escaped, it is supposed, into the park.

POSTSCRIPT.

Friday Evening.

The Duchess of Kent visited the Queen, on Thursday, at Buckingham Palace. The Duchess remained to lunch with her Majesty and Prince Albert. At ten minutes before three her Majesty and Prince Albert, accompanied by the Princess Royal, left Buckingham Palace for Claremont. The Prince of Wales and the royal suite followed. The Queen is expected to return from Claremont on Tuesday next. Her Majesty is in the enjoyment of the best health, although the event that so warmly interests the nation is now so near at hand. It is expected to take place in the beginning of April.

Sir C. Metcalfe left town on Thursday, for Liverpool, to embark for Canada.

Baron Alderson, who is on the Midland Circuit, is indisposed.

SUDDEN DEATH OF THE REV. DR. SCHWABE.—An awful instance of the uncertainty of human life occurred on Thursday to the Rev. Dr. Schwabe, of Stamford-hill. In the morning a message had been sent to his house, requesting him to visit a dying neighbour, and, on reaching the house, he was scarcely knocked at the door, when he suddenly sank down on the pavement and died. When her present Majesty was Princess Victoria the deceased gentleman had the distinguished honour of having been selected to instruct her Majesty in the German language, in which he was considered a most accomplished scholar.

In consequence of the death of his son, the Rev. John Æmylius Shadwell, the Vice-Chancellor will not sit in court for some time.

PORTSMOUTH, March 3.—The Modeste, 18, Capt. R. B. Watson, came in harbour this morning, and immediately lashed alongside the dockyard jetty in order to land her freight, consisting of 1,000,000 of dollars, brought from China, the whole of which will be conveyed this afternoon by rail to the Mint, under the superintendence of Mr. Cooper. The Modeste will sail to-morrow for Sheerness to be paid off. The Blonde, Capt. Thomas Harrison, the C.B., the Herald, the Columbine, and the Brenheim, are shortly expected from China, with considerable freight on board.

THE LATE ASSIZE TRIALS.—The trial of O'Connor and others at Lancaster was proceeded with on Wednesday, Thursday, and yesterday, and at the rising of the court the case for the prosecution had not concluded. No one can form a conjecture when the case will terminate.

FOREIGN.

FRANCE.—The Paris journals of Wednesday contain nothing to enable us to judge of the real strength of the French Ministry in the present struggle between it and the Opposition. It seems, however, to be pretty generally admitted that the way in which the majority intend to vote will not be such as to render it absolutely necessary for the Ministry to retire, even in the event of their not consenting to annihilate themselves by a vote of want of confidence.

The Madrid Correspondat says Prince Napoleon, son of the ex-King of Westphalia, was presented, on Sunday last, to the Regent, who received him with great distinction. In the evening he accompanied his introducer, the Minister of Marine, to a party at the Duchess of Victoria's. All the Ministers, and a number of personages of distinction, were present.

MADRID, Feb. 25.—This evening, at seven o'clock, the marriage of her Highness the Princess Maria of Baden to the Marquis of Douglas was solemnized in the court chapel. His Highness the Grand Duke of Baden conducted the fair bride, and her Highness the Grand Duchess of Baden the bridegroom, to the altar. Besides the Grand Duke and Grand Duchess Sophia of Baden, and the Grand Duchess Stephania, there were present the Grand Duke of Hesse, the Hereditary Grand Duke and Duchess, Prince Charles and Emelius of Hesse, the Hereditary Prince of Hohenzollern and his consort, the sister of the bride, and many other persons of high distinction. After the ceremony a congratulatory manifestation of want of confidence.

Accounts from the Mauritius have been received to the 24th of November. Great commercial distress continued to exist. The address of the Governor, Sir Wm. Gomm, in the Legislative Council, had given great satisfaction. He alluded in warm terms to the administration of Sir Lionel Smith; and gave the strongest assurance of his own desire to promote, by every possible means, the welfare of the colony. An address to Colonel Staveley was proposed and unanimously carried. The services of Coolies is expected to lead to very satisfactory results, and to supply the demand now existing for labour.

PLYMOUTH, Thursday.—The schooner Rangers, from Monte Video, Dec. 20th, has arrived here; a decisive combat had taken place between the contending parties in the river Plate, in which the Monte Videans were completely discomfited. There have been so many conflicting accounts of these Argentine wars, that this news would be perhaps of little interest, but that the troops of Rosas were said to be making for Monte Video. Admiral Brown was also at Buenos Ayres. The Gomera, French war-steamer, had proceeded for Valparaiso, and her Majesty's steam frigate Salamander for the Falkland islands. The Oriental steamer, Capt. Soy, proceeds to-day with the Mediterranean and Alexandrian mails and passengers; and to-morrow the Clyde for the West Indies.

MASQUED BALL AT THE OPERA, PARIS.

THE CARNIVAL AT PARIS.

'Tis known, at least it should be, that throughout
All countries of the Catholic persuasion,
Some weeks before Shrove Tuesday comes about
The people take their fill of recreation,
And buy repentance, ere they grow devout,
However high their rank or low their station,
With fiddling, feasting, dancing, drinking, masquing,
And other things which may be had for asking.—Beppo.

IT is a gay time at present with our lively neighbours on the other side of the Straits of Dover. No sooner has Christmas with its attendant festivities come and gone—no sooner has the excitement passed away which accompanied the birth of the new year, with its étrennes and tasteful offerings of love and friendship, displayed in the glittering repertories of Susse and Aubert in the Place de la Bourse, or the costly shops on the adjacent boulevards, teeming with every article of fancy produce, from the inlaid and emblazoned portefeuilles or porcelaines montées to the no less tempting cases of bonbons—no sooner have all these pretty things drawn the five-franc pieces, and sometimes the napoleons, from the pockets of the usually provident Frenchman, than the first note of preparation for the approaching season of gaiety is sounded from the orchestras of the million and one salles de danse and bastringues of Paris. The costume-magazines rout up and revive their stores—the announcements of the bals masqués gradually appear—and all classes commence looking forward to the Carnival.

Although, correctly speaking, the fortnight immediately preceding Ash Wednesday is the proper time appropriated to this festival, yet it does not assume any striking or especial features until the three last days, commencing this year with Sunday, the 26th of February, Monday, the 27th, and Shrove Tuesday; or, as it is termed in the French calendar, Mardi Gras. The masked balls, however, take place on different fête evenings during the whole month, and even as early as the commencement of January; but the most reckless hurly-burly, the showiest dresses, and the chief expenditure, and consequent dissipation, are reserved for the close. After this every one is quiet and devout, or at least affects to be so, until Easter, except when the Thursday of Mid-lent, or Mi-carême, arrives; upon which one day all the revelry and uproarious pleasure of the carnival break out again wilder than ever—but for that day only.

In 1790 the Carnival was prohibited in France; and was not revived until the Revolution of the 18th Brumaire (9th Nov. 1799), which destroyed everything of the Republic, except the name, and placed Buonaparte at the head of the state. The Parisians celebrated its restoration with the most extravagant splendour, and for several years the masques and costumes displayed were rich and beautiful beyond conception. But at the present time it has lost many of its charms—the principal spirit of the festivities being kept up by the lower orders (in some cases, as at the Bal Chicard, by the very lowest), and the students attached to the schools of law and medicine in Paris, with their companions. Very little difference from the ordinary merriment of fêtes is observed at the first part of the twelve or fifteen days preceding Lent. About the middle, if the weather be fine and the streets tolerably clean—a rare occurrence in Paris—some masques will appear in public: these increase; the revelry becomes more general, and the abandonnement more reckless, until at last all the ceremonies wind up with one grand confusion of music, dancing, gallantry, masquerading, noise, and almost delirious merriment, until the advent of Ash Wednesday puts a stop, as we have stated, to the whole proceedings.

On these latter days many of the masques appear on foot in the streets; but many more hire carriages, which they fill with grotesque costumes, and parade the principal thoroughfares, exchanging showers of argot and repartee, frequently coarse, sometimes witty, and rarely complimentary; or pelting one another with comfits and bonbons—a practice, however, carried out much more fully in the Italian Carnival than the French one. The most favourite routes with the perambulating masques are the line of boulevards from the Place de la Bastille to the Madeleine, the Rue Vivienne and adjacent fashionable streets, and the quais on the north bank of the Seine; but the boulevards are the chief resorts. Upon the last days also of the Carnival the celebrated procession of the Bœuf-gras, or Government prize-ox, takes place, when the animal is led through the principal streets, preceded by music, and accompanied by a numerous train of fantastic costumes, the majority of whom are butchers, who chiefly assume the dresses of American Indians or savages, polichinels, and other quaint characters. The ox himself is dressed in splendid tapestry, and his head is usually decked out very gaily with laurel, feathers, and ribbons. Previously to 1822 it was customary for the animal to carry a child seated on his back, who was decorated with a blue scarf, holding in one hand a sword and in the other a gilt sceptre, and who was called the Roi des Bouchers. At the period just named the innovation upon the ancient custom first took place, and the child now follows the Bœuf-gras in an ornamented triumphal car, as delineated in the engraving, accompanied by other mummers. The spot chosen by the artist for the view is on the Quai de l'Ecole, at the foot of the Pont Neuf—the equestrian statue of Henri Quatre being seen on the bridge in the distance.

The masked balls, which supersede every other feature of the carnival in attraction, and form its principal festivities in Paris, were introduced under the regency of the Duke of Orleans. But a great inconvenience with which they were at first attended, was the want of any apartment sufficiently spacious to receive the hundreds who thronged to them. At length the Chevalier de Bouillon conceived the plan of converting the Opera-house into a ball-room; and a Carmelite friar, named Sebastian, invented the means of elevating the floor of the pit to a level with the stage, and lowering it, at pleasure. The project succeeded, and the first masked ball in Paris was held on the 2nd of January, 1716. They are now given, both before and during the carnival, at nearly all the theatres in Paris, as well as most of the large public ball-rooms, and the salles of the different concerts directed by Musard and Julhien, &c.; at which latter places the latest quadrilles and waltzes are played.

PROCESSION OF THE BŒUF GRAS.

The leading bal masqué of the carnival, which reunites the best society and the most gorgeous costumes, is decidedly that which takes place at the Académie Royale de la Musique, or French Opera. The name bal, applied to this assembly, is perhaps a misnomer, as there is no dancing; but the newest music of the year is always heard there, and the visitors promenade to exhibit their dresses, which are, in many instances, costly and unique beyond description—the picturesque costumes of the moyen age of French history being the favourite ones, and most in vogue. The greater portion of the company go in character, although gentlemen may go in plain clothes, if they choose, and unmasked. Beyond the gorgeous coup d'œil which the scene affords, there is not much to amuse at the balls of the Opera; the real fun and uproar of the carnival masquerades being reserved for the inferior theatres; where, from midnight, when the dancing commences, until six in the morning, one continued scene of noisy merriment and wild hilarity goes on, of which but a slight idea can be conveyed by verbal or pictorial description; being widely different in spirit and characteristics to the low, unmeaning riot and coarse vulgarity of a London masquerade, although sustained, probably, by persons moving in the same sphere of life.

It will not do, however, to investigate too closely the classes who form the greater part of a carnival masked assembly; it is sufficient to observe, that with all its license, outward decorum is observed (unless at the mo-t inferior resorts), and that there is little chance of receiving an insult. Dancing appears to be the whole and sole motive of the guests; and dance they do, with a vivacity and untiring spirit, that could only be found in a land so especially devoted to the worship of Terpsichore as France. Indeed the grand galopade—the galop monstre, as it is termed—is one of the most marvellous spectacles that the carnival can offer. Every feeling appears to be merged into one general whirlwind of excitement; and, heedless of contusions, jostlings, and injuries of costume or person, six or eight hundred masques may be seen flying wildly round and round the salle of the Théâtre de la Renaissance or Musard's concerts, in an universal entraînement, which, for the time, induces but one belief that they have all taken an entire leave of their senses.

The most prevalent dress at these balls is that of the débardeur—a name given to the men who unload the barges on the river. It is a piquant costume, closely resembling that worn by the late Miss Murray in the burletta of "Anthony and Cleopatra," and consisting of dark velvet pantaloons, with a satin stripe down the sides, ornamented with bright studs, a pink or white shirt, red sash, and a glazed hat with tricoloured streamers, or small bonnet. The wig is powdered like that of a French postilion, plaited at the sides, and collected into a club behind. Considerably more than half of the carnival masques take up this dress, the remainder attiring themselves as hussars, pierrots, and all sorts of eccentric and anomalous costumes, which we look for in vain at the fancy balls in England. But we find, throughout all the varieties, that the fair sex have generally a propensity to assume the habiliments of their rougher partners; a habit more especially pertaining to the lively incomprehensible grisettes who inhabit those partially unexplored regions on the other side of the Seine, known to the Parisians as the Quartier Latin.

In all the ball-rooms parties of the municipal guard are in attendance to preserve order; and should any of the guests transgress the ordinary rules of decorum, they are immediately consigned to the lock-up cell of the nearest corps-du-garde—the violon, as it is termed in the slang of Paris. The fierce looks and grave bearing of these functionaries form everywhere a singular contrast to the mirth and animation around.

The cafés in the immediate neighbourhood of the balls remain open all night, and are constantly filled with a motley collection of visitors. At the breaking up of the festivities, at six in the morning, the masques disperse in various directions. Some retire to rest, others to their ordinary pursuits, and the remainder, without changing their dresses, breakfast at the different restaurateurs, or, more frequently, at the leading fish houses—Chez Philippe, or at the Rocher de Cancale, amongst the oysters of the Rue Montorgueil, where they will sometimes remain until night once more comes round, and brings with it a return of the carnival amusements.

THE CARNIVAL AT ROME.

Every one knows something of the Carnival, or "flesh-farewell," and its grand characteristic—the masquerade in the streets. At Rome the sport is seen in perfection: the glories of her capitol have departed, but some relics of her Saturnalia remain, only that the usual process is reversed, and the masters succeed to the fashion of the servants. Power and greatness pass away, but fun and foolery are immortal.

Rome is possessed by the gay madness for eight days. On the Saturday which occurs ten days before Shrove Tuesday, at twenty-one o'clock, or three hours before sunset, the bell at the capitol sounds, and the Carnival begins. It is resumed at the same hour daily, except on the two Sundays and the Friday, until it closes on the evening of Shrove Tuesday, the last day. On the first day, on Giovedi Grasso (Shrove Thursday, or literally "Fat Thursday"), and on the last day, the governor of Rome (a prelate, who is never displaced from his civil post but to be made a Cardinal) goes in state all down the Corso. To that place the Carnival is mostly confined; the great concourse sometimes, however, extending to the streets which branch from it.

From twenty-one o'clock the scene in the Corso is one of the most remarkable in the world. An endless line of carriages passes in two rows going and returning, the intervals are filled by pedestrians, and chairs line the pavements the whole length of the street. Frolic is the general business of the masks and the unmasked in carriages and a-foot. The masks are of divers kinds; but some set characters are favourites. Of these is arlecchino (harlequin), not as we know him—lithe, elegant, with glittering dress and sword of magic power, but with a dull party-coloured cloth coat, dowdy leather cap, plain wooden sword, pot-bellied, clownish, like a child's soft ball turned to man; but then he is witty—if he can be so. Polcinello is another genius of the place; a drunkard, crowned and girded with rosy garlands, another; and all the great or peculiar personages, all the races of the earth, are licensed to appear for the occasion, if it so please them. Common black masks and mere concealment are the drug. Among the women there is the best black mask, looking like a rude cat's face, and startling you with a shrill rattling noise, like the rolling of an r turned to a clock alarum. Then there is the classic shepherdess, peasant girl, or other rustic abstraction, with waxen face of the most regular beauty, yellowish in its roses, and ghastly and repulsive in its moveless insipidity; being to a figure in a fashionable magazine what sculpture is to painting. Some lovely creatures choose, for variety's sake, to be ugly, and assume hideous or grotesque faces. But as it is tiresome merely to be something, however striking, everybody is bent also upon doing something. Strangers accost you, and tantalise your penetration; for you are expected to recognise the disguised form and altered voice, if you know the person. Jests also are generally due. And as a standing resource, there is the throwing of confetti, or mock sweetmeats. The throwing of real comfits is prohibited, because they are too hard; but the more gallant masks gently throw great quantities of the veritable dainties, with flowers, into the carriages and windows. The comfits to throw are soft, made of chalk; and they cost about a halfpenny or a penny a pound. They are thrown at you on all sides—out of the carriages, into the carriages—poured down out of the windows from baskets—until you are smothered in the shower, and your assailants suffocated with laughter. Some persons will throw away hundreds of pounds in a day!

CARNIVAL AT ROME.

At intervals there is a firing of mortars; and, on the third firing, half an hour before sunset, all the carriages disappear from the Corso, to make way for the corsa dei barberi, or race of horses without riders. They run, urged by spurs hung to their backs, and kept in course by people stationed at the outlets, and by the crowd itself, from the Porta del Popolo at one end of the Corso, to the spot called the Ripresa dei Barberi (retaking of the barbs), on the Piazza di Venezia, at the other end. Prizes are given by the city for the winners in these races, which take place every day of the Carnival. After the race the carriages return to the Corso for about half an hour until sunset, when the scene closes for the day, no masking being allowed after sunset. But five or six masked balls are given in the theatres during the festival. At Rome theatrical performances are not allowed at this season, nor at any other, except for charitable purposes.

The most beautiful scene in the eight days' drama is at the close. At sunset, on the last day, a myriad of lights appear, like so many urban fire-flies flitting about. They are moccoletti, or small wax tapers, with one of which almost everybody provides himself. The effect is magical; but the beauty has its fun. The more restless try each one to blow out his neighbour's light, with handkerchiefs or other fans for the nonce, and to defend his own; and the most ridiculous combats take place, all in good humour, though hardish blows are sometimes given and received in the attack and defence. The luminous conflict lasts an hour, the tapers are extinguished, and Carnival is over.

Something of the same kind is the scene in other parts of Italy but with differences. There is no corso at Florence, and the masks are scattered in all the principal streets; but they appear in the theatres at night. At Naples, the Carnival is much like that at Rome, but not so good. At Genoa it is indifferent; and the blowing of glass horns by the boys, with a dreary sound like a cowhorn, is far from pleasing. At Venice, Sunday is the principal day, though the festival lasts, with more or less vivacity, from Twelfth-day till Shrove Tuesday. The business of the time is mostly carried on in the cafés, and under the porticos of the Piazza di San Marco, the ladies making their appearance both in the arcades and the coffee-houses, to encounter as terrible volleys of wit as the masked gallants can muster. The austerities of Lent restore Italy to her sobriety.

PRINCE OF HANOVER'S MARRIAGE.

In our postscript of last week we were just in time to make brief mention of the marriage of the Crown Prince of Hanover, which was celebrated with considerable éclat on the 19th of February, and of which the following more extended details are all that have yet reached us, here:—Those who were gathered within the chapel in time to witness the ceremony formed a splendid assemblage. The procession was conducted precisely as arranged by the programme, only that the Grand Duke of Oldenburg was kept away by indisposition. The bride wore a white robe of drap d'argent, with a profusion of jewels, a diadem of diamonds, and a wreath of myrtle entwined round the crown. The exchange of rings was announced by a salute of artillery. During the benediction the young couple knelt at the altar, and when they rose the King embraced them, and all the princes and ladies present warmly expressed the interest they took on the happy occasion. Proceeding to the upper apartments of the royal palace the formal congratulations were received, after which the company went to supper; but there was no ball. At eleven o'clock the Crown Princess, accompanied by her mother, and the Crown Prince, by his father-in-law, went to the palace of the Crown Prince, where the august parents stopped with the young couple for some time. Their Royal Highnesses showed themselves to the people the following morning, driving to church in an open carriage, drawn by six cream-coloured horses.

"CUTTING A DASH!"

In Lombard-street, the great locality of Dives—the mart of wealth and money—one expects (save when walking through it on a wet day without an umbrella, and with a certainty that there is nothing in one's pocket to entitle one to the shelter of a bank) to be particularly easy in one's circumstances and mind. One is on the high road to cash—what else could take one to Lombard-street? This point, however, applies to a condition of leisure-people who are either walking or driving through Lombard-street—are always in a hurry. They feel, bitterly perhaps, that they have no business in it. They trudge the narrowbone stage or tool along the buggy with something like impetuosity of purpose—they think that as they can run upon no bank they ought to meet with no check to their progress. Occasionally they are doomed to disappointment, as our cut implies. It was only on Tuesday last that we saw the above pale-faced gentleman, who is at the same time so nearly below, smoking his way through the world, with his pipe and hair curled amicably in unison, his friend at his side, his whip in his hand, and perhaps cracking some joke as well as his whip, at the very moment when he attempted to dash—gig, dashing-board, and all—through a progressing omnibus and an approaching cab. Alas! room there was none; his thoughts were de omnibus rebus, but his gig was assaulted by the cab. He arrived at the same moment at a crisis of woe and of wheel, and it was curious that the woe came on just as the wheel came off. If the shafts of his wit were suspended, the shafts of his vehicle were broke, and, although a master accident, it produced a summer-set, or upset, which you will. Reader, you are a moralist, and perhaps too humane a one to laugh like that provoking cabman at two specimens of falling human nature!

THE MAGAZINES.

Magazine day, as usual, inundates us with its monthly flood of periodicals. Few things are more strange in their way than the unabated activity of this squadron of light combatants and skirmishers in the lists of literature. Long since, the uninitiated would suppose, their field must have been exhausted, and the labourers brought to a stand-still from pure want of materials to work up and fashion. But no—every year sees a swarm of fresh candidates for public favour start up: some to take a permanent place in popular estimation, and rejoice in their hosts of admiring subscribers; others, after a brief glimpse of prosperity, to dwindle and decline; and others destined to have an existence almost as ephemeral, if not as brilliant, as the insect of a summer's day. A magazine is the idle man's best friend. To a literary lounger it offers an invaluable resource. Where else should he turn to amuse his vacant hours, or fly from the horrors of ennui? What matters it to him that the article may be only a rechauffé of a ten times told tale, manufactured, perhaps, at the British Museum, from some magazine of the last generation. But let us cut short our reflections, and, in looking over the shoal of minnows, let us commence with the Tritons.

"Blackwood" fully maintains his character for established excellence this month. "Anmaléet Bek" is the opening of a tale translated from the Russian of Marlinsky, illustrative of the manners and customs of the Caucasian tribes. "Caleb Stukeley" continues with unabated spirit. "The Tale of a Tub" is a good quiz on the present dissensions north of the Tweed, which have sprung out of the non-Intrusion question. "Paul de Kockneyisms" is a tale from Paul de Kock, better than its title promises. "The World of London" is a paper equal to any that have appeared under this title, showing great knowledge of the world and of character, conveyed in a powerful and popular method of delineation. "The Lost Lamb" is embalmed in some pretty verses by Delta; and the article headed "Comte" is an examination of some ingenious views of philosophy lately propounded by that writer.

"Fraser" presents us with an amusing number, free from those faults of flippancy and bad taste which were rife under its former management. "The Recreations of Christopher North" are reviewed in a genial spirit in the first article. The article on the Ashburton Treaty is an able and cutting examination of the convention. In "The Reminiscences of Men and Things" we have an account of that Jupiter Scapin of politicians, M. Thiers, whose pranks have afforded as much speculation to the quidnuncs as those of any statesman of the day. "Jack Moriarty and his Contemporaries" is full of the fun of the academic life of Dublin in a former day. "Fitz-boodle" is comical and diverting according to his wont; and "The Pleasures, Objects, and Advantages of Literature Indicated" is written in a spirit which must be most acceptable to all lovers of reading. "The Crisis of the Scottish Church" is an article we do not like. It is silly and virulent, and the author is quite unable to do justice to the discussion of such a subject.

The contents of "The Dublin University Magazine" of this month are varied and interesting, mixing the grave with the gay, the lively with the severe, in moderate quantities of each, a plan that will meet the approbation of all who have a horror of long articles. "The North-west Boundary Question" is the title of an article which conveys much information relative to the territory of the Oregon, important at a moment when the public attention is being directed to this subject. "The Political Relations of the East and West of Europe" presents a view of that untrodden field of research at once novel and attractive. There is an able dissection of Mormonism, in which the villanies of that imposture are duly exposed. "Nuts and Nutcrackers," No. VIII., supplies fruit that will suit many palates. "The Loiterings of Arthur O'Leary" show that, later within Lever will, to the fons of Holland or the mountain ridges of the Peninsula, he is never bad company. These articles, with several spirited contributions in verse, and an Italian story, "Spalatro," told with much of vivid colouring, make up the staple of the magazine.

The lovers of jokes, whims, oddities will be gratified with the fare served up in "The New Monthly." The editor takes the quizzical view of things in general, and there are few of his readers, we should say, whom he will permit to "sit like their grandsires carved in alabaster." Mrs. Trollope runs riot in her description of the adventures of "The Barnabys in America." "Extracts from my Indian Diary" are a good travestie of our hunting in India, the far West, and so forth. "Ellistoniana" contains many anecdotes of that lamented performer, redolent of all his joyousness, mirthfulness, and irrepressible propensity to mischief.

"Tait" is more diversified and popular in contents than was sometimes his wont. It is always sensibly and cleverly written, and the present number contains a great quantity of valuable matter. Mrs Gore contributes the first part of a new tale, "Surfaceism," which promises to be rich in character and incident, and an able dissection of the follies and manœuvres of elevated society. There are several able reviews of recent works, doing full justice to the subjects treated of, and presenting a well-executed analysis of their contents. The poetical contributors appear in great force this month: the number and excellence of the verses, original or translated from the French and German, form an important feature of the magazine.

The "Church Magazine" is an excellent miscellany of religious matter, which we recommend to our readers. The "Church of England Magazine" is another periodical of the same class, and possesses the advantage of containing a selection of papers on general subjects, from which every topic of a character in the most remote degree objectionable is carefully excluded. We beg pardon for naming the "Chess-Player's Chronicle" in such close contiguity to periodicals of a graver cast; yet chess-playing is an innocent and contemplative amusement, and the valuable work will do well to turn to the pages of this "Chronicle," which throw light on many of the dark passages of the game.

We love to keep a corner of our heart, as well as of our paper, for the sporting periodicals, were it for no other reason than that they deal so much in our favourite illustrative engravings. The design that accompanies the "Sporting Magazine"—"Deerstalkers Returning," by Bateman—is well worth the price of the magazine. Men, ponies, dogs, and deer are equally true to nature, and drawn with great accuracy of outline and force of character. The "New Sporting Magazine" is embellished with a fine portrait of "Eclipse," by Garrard. The "Sportsman" presents its readers with two splendid engravings, "The Young Sportsman," by Laporte, and "Running into a Fox," by Davis. All those periodicals are well worthy the patronage of the followers and admirers of our noble field-sports, which form part of that characteristic of national pre-eminence of which every Englishman is proud. To every man who has betted at the Derby or Newmarket, who shoulders his gun on the 12th, or can throw a fly a casting-length over a running stream, they are oracles of wisdom and information. It would be hard to decide the palm between them, as we think they are all pretty equal in point of merit and utility; so we leave them to the goodwill of our readers.

"The Farmers' Magazine" ought to be in the hands of every practical agriculturist who is anxious in these hard days to learn the secret of making two blades grow where one did before. They whose talk is of bullocks could not have a better monitor.

The "New Monthly Belle Assemblée" has always been a favourite of ours, for it rejoices in the smiles of the fair, and basks in the light of their countenance. Among the contributors to this month's number, we see such distinguished names as those of W. L. Bowles, and Mrs. Cornwall Baron Wilson. It is adorned with a magnificent bust by Boxall, "The Shade of Sadness," which forms the subject of some very sweet verses by Bowles.

To end, as we began, with some of the leaders of the file. The "United Service Magazine" is a valuable quota of military lore. This periodical deservedly enjoys a large share of general favour, for all true Englishmen take pride in their glorious army and navy, and everything that concerns them interests the humblest citizen. The papers on the "Errors and Faults of our Military System," on the "Naval Improvements of the Nineteenth Century," and on the "Operations in Afghanistan," are well worthy of attention.

We must spare another paragraph for "Bentley's Miscellany" and "Ainsworth's Magazine." Each of these contains a great variety of amusing papers of the light class, which sometimes, however light writing to the author, prove heavy enough to the reader. Those who are fond of such mental provender will be amply gratified by either journal. The "Memoirs of Mundin," in Bentley, supply an agreeable biography of that celebrated comedian, which was much wanted; and being contributed by his son, their accuracy, we presume, may be depended upon.

"The Town-life of the Restoration," in Ainsworth, by Mr. R. Bell, gives a lively and entertaining view of the singular state of society which prevailed in the wild days of Charles II.

"Fisher's Colonial Magazine" has claims to public support from the nature of its contents, almost independent of its literary merit, although we are glad to say there is no deficiency in this respect. In the present number, the papers on the "Oregon Territory," "The Proposed British Settlement on Borneo," the "North American Fisheries," and others, are full of useful information and interesting details.

PERIODICALS.

All our readers are of course devouring "Martin Chuzzlewit," "Tom Burke," and "Hector O'Halloran." Chuzzlewit improves. Boz has caught new vigour from his repose, and writes almost as well in this number as he did in his best days. Mark Tapley promises to turn out a second Sam Weller; and two new characters, Chevy Slyme, Esquire, and his friend Tigg make their appearance, who promise infinite amusement. We extract the following little scene between Martin and Tom Pinch.

"Thank you," said Martin, shaking his hand. "You're a good fellow, upon my word, and speak very kindly. Of course, you know," he added, after a moment's pause, as he drew his chair towards the fire again, "I should not hesitate to avail myself of your services if you could help me at all; but you can't, you see!—Here he rumpled his hair impatiently with his hand, and looked at Tom as if he took it rather ill that he was not somebody else—"You might as well be a counting-house or a tying pin, Pinch, for any help you can render me." "Except in the inclination," said Tom, gently. "Oh! to be sure. I meant that, of course. If inclination went for anything, I shouldn't want help. I tell you what you can do, though, if you will—at the present moment too." "What is that?" demanded Tom. "Read to me." "I shall be delighted," cried Tom, catching up the candle, with enthusiasm. "Excuse my leaving you in the dark a moment, and I'll fetch a book directly. What will you like? Shakspeare?" "Ay!" replied his friend, yawning and stretching himself. "He'll do. I am tired with the bustle of to-day, and the novelty of everything about me; and in such a case there's no greater luxury in the world, I think, than being read to sleep. You won't mind my going to sleep, if I can?" "Not at all!" cried Tom. "Then begin as soon as you like. You needn't leave off when you see me getting drowsy (unless you feel tired), for it's pleasant to wake gradually to the sounds again. Did you ever try that?" "No, I never tried it," said Tom. "Well! you can, you know, one of these days when we're both in the right humour. Don't mind leaving me in the dark. Look sharp!"

Of "Tom Burke" we shall speak more at length at a future day

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

SHERIFF'S COURT, THURSDAY.

(Before Commissioners Wilde and Burchell, and a Special Jury.)

This court was occupied during the day in trying an issue directed out of the Court of Exchequer, to ascertain the amount in which Messrs. Dean and Co., of St. Paul's Churchyard were indebted to the Crown for duties on contraband foreign goods imported into this country, and which has been already before the public, under the head of Custom-house frauds. After hearing the evidence, a verdict was given for the Crown.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

The court resumed its sittings on Monday last. The Lord Mayor, the Recorder, Aldermen Sir C. Marshall, Sir J. Pirie, and Farncombe, the Sheriffs, and the other authorities of the City of London, took their seats upon the bench at ten o'clock. The Recorder addressed a few observations to the grand jury, and after stating that there were no cases in the calendar which would require any remarks upon the law affecting them from the court, he dismissed them to their duty.

James Johnson, 33, was indicted for stealing an order for the payment of £71 7s., the property of his master, James Ivyleafe. He pleaded guilty, and the Recorder sentenced him to be transported for seven years.

TUESDAY.

(Before the Recorder.)

Mark Benjamin Benham, George Edwin Champ, and John Munyar were indicted for misdemeanour. Two other persons, named George Usher and Thomas Russell, were included in the indictment; but the former did not surrender, and the latter has died in gaol since the last session. The character of the offence imputed to the defendants was that, by means of false affidavits, they had obtained a writ of execution against a person named Myers, the father-in-law of the defendant Benham, and a sum of £400 was claimed of him, it being positively sworn that no such debt existed, and that the whole proceedings under which the execution was obtained were based on perjury and fraud. The prosecutor, Myers, swore distinctly that he owed no money to his son-in-law, and that no writ or declaration was ever served upon him. Other witnesses were called to confirm his evidence, but there were some material discrepancies in their testimony, and in the course of the case the Recorder expressed his opinion that where such conflicting testimony appeared in support of the prosecution it was not likely that the jury would convict parties accused of perjury. Mr. Adolphus and Mr. Prendergast addressed the jury on behalf of the defendants. Mr. Prendergast did not conclude his address until 10 o'clock, and he then intimated his intention to call witnesses. The Recorder said that, before the case proceeded any further, he really must understand how long the defence was likely to last, for at present it seemed probable that it would go on until the next day. Mr. Ballantine said the case must occupy four hours more at least. The Recorder was here informed that two of the jurymen were very ill, and he observed, that the proceedings were of too much importance to worry out in any one, and the further investigation of the case must be adjourned. It was then arranged that the case should stand adjourned to the New Court, and the jury were allowed to depart, upon the understanding that they would hold no conversation with any person respecting the evidence or the proceedings that had taken place.

WEDNESDAY.

Her Majesty's Justices, Chief Justice Tindal and Mr. Justice Williams, took their seats on the bench at ten o'clock. William Connell, aged 21, described as a waiter, was capitally indicted for assaulting Elizabeth Sarah Magnus, on the 12th of December, at the parish of St. Bartholomew by the Exchange, and discharging at her a pistol loaded with gunpowder and a leaden bullet, thereby inflicting upon the right side of her person a wound of the breadth of one inch, and the depth of seven inches, with intent thereby to kill and murder her. In another count the prisoner's intent was laid to do grievous bodily harm, and maim the prosecutrix, or to do her some grievous bodily harm. There were other counts varying the form of the charge against the prisoner. Mr. Parkson and Mr. Ribton conducted the prosecution, Mr. Payne appeared for the prisoner. The facts of this case have been already so fully given in the paper, that it is unnecessary to recapitulate them here. Mrs. Magnus, the prosecutrix, and several other witnesses having been examined, the learned Chief Justice summed up, and the jury returned a verdict of guilty on the second count, but recommending the prisoner to mercy on account of his previous good character. The prisoner was then sentenced to be transported for 15 years.

THURSDAY.

The trial of Mr. Ashley for club house robberies was fixed for Saturday morning, upon the application of counsel on both sides.

CHARGE OF COINING.—William Browne, alias Marten, and Christopher Tucker, were placed at the bar on a charge of feloniously making counterfeit coin. The prisoners were found "Guilty," and sentenced, each to ten years' transportation.

A rather smart altercation took place between the Common Sergeant and Mr. Payne the barrister, with regard to the Prisoners' Counsel Bill, which was by no means calculated to add to either the dignity or solemnity of a court of justice. The Common Sergeant is becoming rather notorious for the possession of a quality, which is rather unfavourably known by the name of off handedness.

NEW COURT.

(Before Mr. Commissioner Bullock.)

David Pugh, a nautical man, 40 years of age, was indicted for obtaining on the 3rd of December, the sum of £2 from Anne Lord, with intent to cheat and defraud her thereof. The prisoner was also charged by two other indictments, with stealing ten sovereigns and a quantity of apparel, value £4, the property of W. H. Lord. Mr. Ballantine stated the case for the prosecution, which, he said, was one of a peculiar and cruel description. The prosecutrix's husband had lived at Woodstock, and being unfortunate in business, he came up to London, and visited some respectable relatives. Being destitute of employment, he, with the consent of his wife, enlisted in the service of the East India Company, and was sent to the depôt at Chatham. Mrs. Lord was living with a relative, to whose house the prisoner frequently came, and he represented that he would obtain the discharge of the recruit provided he was furnished with the money to purchase it. The sum now under consideration was first paid, and it would be proved that it was never applied to the intended purpose. Mary Anne Lord, a respectable young woman, stated that in October last she was residing with her uncle, the landlord of the Salmon and Ball, Bethnal green. About that time her husband enlisted in the East India Company's service, and the prisoner, who used her husband's house, intimated that he could procure her husband's liberation, and they went together on that business to the office of Captain Murray, in Soho-square. When they got there the prisoner went into the office, and said she had better not accompany him, as her husband had enlisted as a single man, and he might get into difficulty if it was found that he was married. The prisoner returned to the outer office in about ten minutes, and said that Captain Murray told him that her husband was entitled to go to India, but if £2 were then paid it would detain him fourteen days, and allow time to negotiate for his discharge from the corps. Not having the money, she went to the public and relations of her husband, and borrowed two sovereigns, which she afterwards gave to the prisoner. She then went on to state that after she had paid the £2 to obtain the detention of her husband at Chatham, the prisoner represented that £20 would be wanted as the purchase of his discharge. Not having the money, she wrote to a relative, who sent her up £13, and the prisoner received £10 of it, which he said he should take to Captain Murray, and pay as a deposit. She gave him the money at a public-house, and desired him to bring her a receipt for it. On his return he brought her the paper now produced, on which was written as follows:—"Received, Dec. 3, 1849, the sum of ten pounds, on account of the discharge of Wm. H. Lord. (Signed) J. H. MURRAY, Captain in the East India Company's service."—Captain Murray deposed that the writing was not his, nor had he authorised any person to write such a receipt; in fact, no such money had been paid. He never saw the prisoner before he met him at the police court.—James Jacobs stated that he had known the prisoner for some time, and had seen him write. The paper produced was doubtless written by him, as well as the signature "J. H. Murray."—The witnesses, excepting Captain Murray, were subjected to a rigid cross-examination, but the prisoner elicited nothing in favour of himself, as he was rather more deeply inculpated by their supplementary evidence.—The prisoner denied that he had received the money.—The jury decared him guilty.—Mr. Commissioner Murray told him that her husband was convicted, and the prisoner he had been convicted upon clear evidence of two offences, a misdemeanour and a felony of a very cruel nature, inasmuch as by fraud he had added to the misery of an already distressed female.—The judgment of the court was that he be transported beyond the seas for the term of seven years. The court adjourned at five o'clock.

George Darrow, described as a watchmaker, and George Thompson, a shoemaker, were indicted, according to the calendar, for "robbery upon Jane Griffin, and stealing eleven yards of silk, the property of Margaret Evans and others." The jury having been convicted, were sentenced to be each transported for the term of seven years.

WEDNESDAY.

(Before the Recorder.)

IN THE MATTER OF MARK BENJAMIN BENHAM, GEORGE EDWARD CHAMP, AND JOHN MATTHEW MUNYARD.

The learned Commissioners took their seats at 9 o'clock in the morning, and the jury, who had been engaged in the previous day, were called into the box. The defendants were charged with other persons, with conspiracy, by the means of perjury, to subvert the course of judgment by swearing to false affidavits, &c., by means of which judgment was obtained against Abraham Myers, and execution levied upon his goods and chattels. The jury retired with the different legal documents at noon, and after the absence of an hour returned, and delivered a verdict of guilty upon those counts which charged a conspiracy only. The Recorder told the Counsel for the prosecution, that unless cause was shown, the Court would deliver its judgment instanter. Mr. Ballantine said that owing to the relationship between Benham and Mrs. Myers, the prosecutor was desirous to recommend him to mercy. The Recorder: The party should have considered this point before he indicted the prisoner for perjury as well as conspiracy. After a conference between the court, Mr. Adolphus, and Mr. Prendergast, the prisoners were called up and sentenced to be imprisoned eighteen calendar months in the House of Correction.

ASSIZE INTELLIGENCE.

OXFORD CIRCUIT.

(Crown Court—Before Mr. Justice Erskine.)

James Hickman was placed at the bar, charged with having feloniously set fire to a rick of clover hay, the property of one James Latham, at Clifton Hampden, on the 17th of November last.—Mr. Keating prosecuted; Mr. Williams appeared for the prisoner. —It appeared that on the night in question the prisoner had applied at the station-house at Abingdon for admission. The policeman on duty declined acceding to the request, as one of the regulations under which he was compelled to act was that of not receiving a prisoner without a charge against him. Upon which the prisoner replied that he had just set fire to a rick of Mr. Latham's, wherefore he was taken in and conducted to a cell. Not long after he was heard crying out for water, on being supplied with which he exclaimed that he could not rest easy, as he had been guilty of a grave offence; when he again repeated that he had set fire to a stack; and on being asked what with, he said with some matches, which he had thrown into the canal.—Nothing of interest or of importance was elicited during the trial, which terminated in the conviction of the prisoner, who was sentenced to fifteen years' transportation.

The court was occupied during the greater part of the day in disposing of some minor offences of no public interest.

WESTERN CIRCUIT.

(Before Mr. Justice Erskine and a Special Jury.)

PADWICK V. COLE AND ANOTHER.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff, as the lessee of the Duke of Norfolk, to try the right to a ferry. The ferry, the right to which this action was brought to determine, was said to exist between Heyling Island and Cumberland Point, near Portsmouth. It was stated to have been a grant to the Norfolk family by Charles I., but no proof of this was given, evidence only being adduced to show a user, which if properly established would support the plaintiff's claim.—The learned judge summed up, telling the jury that the evidence offered was sufficient to prove a user, and, as a consequence, a legal right to the ferry, if it satisfied them that the plaintiff had enjoyed the general right of a ferry across the place in question, without any such a continued interruption as would negative the right claimed. He thought the occasional interruptions relied on for the defence did not materially affect the merits of the case; and that the leases put in, though worded somewhat ambiguously, did demise the toll of a ferry as well as the ferry right of way. But the strong point in favour of the plaintiff was the fact that although Government had built a fort at Cumberland Point, where convicts were kept, and which, therefore, they were bound well to preserve as close as possible, still the gates they had placed across the ferry way were always thrown open at the ferryman's command.—The jury, after a few minutes' consultation, found a verdict for the plaintiff.

(Crown Court.—Before Mr. Sergeant Atcherley.)

William Davis was indicted for the manslaughter of Stephen Clasby, by shooting him with a leaden bullet. The prisoner was a private in the 6th regiment of foot, and was stationed with his regiment at Portsmouth on the 6th September last. On this day he and four or five other soldiers were stationed as guards near the convicts, who were at work at Haslar Hospital. The deceased was a sergeant in one of the convict hulks, and a superintendent over the convicts whilst at their work. The convicts wear a peculiar livery, and have a chain round their legs, by which it was stated they could be easily distinguished from a person like the deceased, who was dressed in plain clothes. Having seen that the men were properly at work, the deceased was slowly leaving the place, and crossing the barrier it was the prisoner's duty to guard, when the prisoner was seen to present his piece and fire, without hailing the unfortunate deceased at all. The unhappy man fell, and upon examination was found to be dead; the ball having entered near to one of his ears, had passed through his head and gone out on the other side. Upon the prisoner being seized he said that he had not shot the deceased—he had shot himself; and when before the magistrate he took a very incorrect story of having seen the deceased and a convict in his rooms in the morning, after which he went on the parade, found his trousers full of blood, then went on guard at the place where the circumstance took place, and seeing the deceased about to leave the ground, aimed at him as if at a convict, and fired. It was attempted to be proved that he was a man of weak intellects and unsound mind; and for this purpose it was elicited from the corporal that although he (the prisoner) had been in the regiment about seventeen years, yet during a great portion of that time he had been employed as a pioneer, and that loutish stupid men were alone chosen for that post. He (Serjeant Atcherley) then gave a luminous address on the case of the prisoner, and contended that he must be acquitted because he was acting under military orders, which he was bound to obey. In this case the man had no choice—he must obey orders, but that, it was contended made no difference, supposing the jury were of opinion that it was a mistake, and that the prisoner believed that in what he did he was acting in obedience to these orders. The jury, after a very short consultation, found the prisoner "Guilty." The learned Sergeant sentenced the prisoner to ten years' transportation.

WINCHESTER.—TUESDAY.

William Barnes, aged 36, and Elizabeth Pollard, aged 22, were indicted for having, on the 1st of September, burglariously broken and entered the dwelling-house of Sarah Dysart, Dowager Baroness Lisle, and stolen therefrom a very large quantity of jewellery, bank notes, sovereigns, and guineas, her property.—The jury found Barnes "Guilty of stealing in a dwelling-house," and acquitted Pollard.—His lordship then sentenced Barnes to be transported for fifteen years.

MIDLAND CIRCUIT.

NORTHAMPTON (Before Mr. Baron Alderson.)

Marianne Coss, aged twenty-two, was charged with the wilful murder of Mrs. Peggy Ward, at Weekly. Mr. Sergeant Adams and Mr. Miller appeared for the prosecution, and Mr. Macaulay for the prisoner.—It appeared that the prisoner was a servant in the employ of the prosecutor (the husband of the deceased). That on the 25th of April, 1842, the deceased was taken ill after eating part of a basin of milk given to her by the prisoner, and died about four o'clock the same afternoon. The contents of her stomach and the remainder of the milk were analysed, and found to contain a considerable portion of arsenic, of which there was no doubt she had died. Fellow-servants of the prisoner were called to prove that she had obtained arsenic for the alleged purpose of destroying mice in the dairy, and had also asked how much it would take to destroy herself. After the death of the deceased, on being interrogated as to what had become of the arsenic, she stated that she had thrown it into the fire. It appeared that she had lived on very good terms with her mistress, and was a faithful and affectionate servant. No motive, therefore, presented itself for the commission of the crime: moreover, she had not taken any means (which she might have done) to conceal the remainder of the milk, and had not exhibited the least confusion or appearance of guilt; but, on the contrary, had assisted her mistress very assiduously when taken ill.—Mr. Macaulay having addressed the jury in her defence, the learned judge summed up, after which the jury acquitted the prisoner, to the evident satisfaction of the court.

In the course of the day two cases of petty theft were disposed of, and the court adjourned. One was the case of a poor half-starved-looking labourer, named Smith, who was charged with stealing two pennyworth of turnips. Prisoner pleaded "Guilty," but said he had little or nothing to eat.—The prosecutor observed he had two shillings a week from the parish and three loaves.—The prisoner: Yes, and there is my wife and child to eat them. There are three of us to be fed on two shillings a week and three loaves.—Sentence: Fourteen days' imprisonment.

In the Civil Court, the time of Mr. Baron Gurney and the jury was taken up the whole day in hearing a case of Meadows v. Hassmer, as to whether a certain tract of land, which formed part of the ancient forest of Rockingham, was extra parochial or not. The case was only part heard. Sir W. Follett is specially retained for the plaintiff

NORTHERN CIRCUIT.

LANCASTER ASSIZES.

"On Monday Mr. Baron Rolfe entered the Crown Court at ten o'clock; and, as soon as he had taken his seat upon the bench, Mr. Hopkins, the clerk of the crown, called over the roll of magistrates of the county, absent from the sessions in consequence of the convict hulks, and a superintendent over the convicts whilst at their work. The convicts wear a peculiar livery, and have a chain round their legs, by which it was stated they could be easily distinguished from a person like the deceased, who was dressed in plain clothes. NORTHERN CIRCUIT.

LANCASTER ASSIZES.

"On Monday Mr. Baron Rolfe entered the Crown Court at ten o'clock; and, as soon as he had taken his seat upon the bench, Mr. Hopkins, the clerk of the crown, called over the roll of magistrates of the county, absent from the sessions in consequence of the approaching assizes, he was somewhat apprehensive that some cases of that nature might have occurred, which would have led to observations from him; but he was happy to say, that, on looking through the depositions, it did not appear to him that there was any case, arising out of the disturbances of last summer; and though there were a good many cases, yet he believed there were not more than at former assizes.

James Ainsworth and William Thomson were indicted for a burglary in the dwelling-house of Thomas Lund, at Wilpshire, near Blackburn, in this county, on the night of the 30th of August last. The evidence being clear the jury found the prisoners guilty, and the judge sentenced them to be transported for life.

Joseph Abbott was indicted for the wilful murder of Thomas Isherwood, at Wilpshire, in this county, on the 29th of December, 1839. It appeared that the prisoner was one of a gang of poachers, who were surprised by the deceased and two other gamekeepers, when the fatal conflict took place. The deceased had frequently declared that it was another poacher named Crossley who shot him. Crossley was traced to America, and had since died. The jury acquitted the prisoner. The Chartist trials were fixed for Wednesday morning, when the Attorney-General was expected to conduct the prosecution in person.

THE CHARTIST TRIALS.

LANCASTER, WEDNESDAY EVENING.—THE QUEEN V. O'CONNOR AND OTHERS.—His lordship took his seat in the Nisi Prius Court this morning shortly after nine o'clock. The counsel engaged for the prosecution against the Chartists are the Attorney-General, Mr. Wortley (Q.C.), Sir G. Lewin, Mr. Hildyard, and Mr. Pollock; for the defendants—Mr. Dundas (Q.C.), Mr. Baines (Q.C.), Sergeant Murphy, Mr. Cobbett, Mr. M'Oubray, and Mr. Atherton: Mr. O'Connor defended himself.—The Attorney-General, before the case was opened, said he hoped the court would forgive him in stating that the jury might dismiss all further concern from their minds respecting William Schofield. He mentioned it, that no misunderstanding might occur, as a nolle prosequi had been entered.—Mr. Pollock briefly read over the indictment, setting forth that it was against certain individuals for unlawfully and tumultuously assembling, and making seditious speeches, with intent to bring about a change in the law of the land. To the indictment the several parties had pleaded Not Guilty, to which plea issue was joined. The Attorney-General then addressed the court and jury, and after detailing the various offences attributed to the accused as they occurred, came at length to the case of Feargus O'Connor, as to an occurrence which took place at the meeting of delegates, and in his participation in the publication of a seditious placard which appeared in the Northern Star. The hon. and learned gentleman proceeded to say that he thought it right to state that prior to the 20th of August many paragraphs appeared in the Northern Star, inducing the people from taking the course which they were attempting; and, whatever benefit Feargus O'Connor could derive from this admission, he certainly should not ask to withold this from him now. The Attorney-General then proceeded to read from the Northern Star, of the 26th August last, different passages in the leading article, advocating the "strike" and "turn-out" of the working people; and stating that, although in the Star the attempt had been previously opposed, it could not refrain from giving to the movement all the aid in its power. The learned counsel also produced a copy of the Northern Star of the 3rd Sept. to connect Mr. O'Connor still further with a knowledge of the publication of the placard, which we believe was greatly instrumental in causing the arrest of the leading Chartists. He also alluded to the elder Schofield, who had lent his chapel to the delegates, as evidence of his participation in their proceedings. He also spoke in high terms of the respect which had been shown to life and property amidst all this defiance of the law, which he considered as affording great proof of the intelligence of the mode in which the agitation had been carried on. We regret that our space will not allow us to follow the Attorney-General throughout the whole of his speech, which for mildness both of manner and language could have scarcely been surpassed, even in the halls of parliament.—Mr. O'Connor said as he had an application to make before a witness was called, the witnesses on both sides should be ordered to quit the court.—The application was granted, with the exception of witnesses as to character.—Mr. O'Connor then said, he understood two reporters were present, who would have to depose to material facts connected with the present case; and therefore he trusted his lordship would request them to retire.—The Court, after having been made acquainted with the fact that these reporters would only have to swear to notes of proceedings taken by them, refused the application. Joseph Haigh, a milkman, and Henry Brown were called and examined on behalf of the prosecution. Several other witnesses having been examined for the prosecution, the Court, at the request of Mr. O'Connor, adjourned at half-past five o'clock until next day.

POLICE.

MANSION-HOUSE.—A wretched-looking man, whose name appeared upon the list of prisoners as Thomas Watson, was brought before the Lord Mayor, charged with having stolen a half-pint pewter pot. The case was a very odd one. The landlord of a public-house in Bishopsgate-street stated that the prisoner walked into the house, asked for, and got, a half-pint of beer, and then, pocketing the measure, said, "Now, if any body wants to earn a guinea he may," and walked off with the booty. Witness followed, and placed the man in the custody of a policeman, to whom the prisoner at once gave up the half-pint pot.—The Lord Mayor: There was no disguise about it?—Landlord. Not the least. Quite the reverse. The Lord Mayor: I must send you to Bridewell for two months for this.—The Lord Mayor: Very well, my lord. As soon as I come out I shall seek the same means of getting something to eat.—The Lord Mayor: Then it will be my duty to commit you again.—The prisoner: Very so, my lord. I can't put up with it. I am a weaver. I have inclination and ability, but no employment and no tools. A mesl of victuals is what I don't now understand. I got threepence-halfpenny yesterday, for holding a gentleman's horse, and I got threepence-halfpenny yesterday, and a saveloy, but it all came off my stomach, for food and I are strangers. The Lord Mayor: Have you never applied to your parish for relief?—Prisoner: Does your lordship mean what it is for a poor man to apply to a parish officer for bread? Have you never heard how the starving man is torn to pieces, if he has any feelings left, by the scamps in office? No, no. I have undergone sufferings that I can't put up with. I am a weaver. I have inclination and ability, but no employment and no tools. A meal of victuals is what I don't now understand. I got threepence-halfpenny yesterday, for holding a gentleman's horse, and I got threepence-halfpenny yesterday, and a savelov, but it all came off my stomach, for food and I are strangers. The Lord Mayor: Have you never applied to your parish for relief?—Prisoner: Does your lordship mean what it is for a poor man to apply to a parish officer for bread? Have you never heard how the starving man is torn to pieces, if he has any feelings left, by the scamps in office? No, no. I have undergone sufferings that I can't put up with.—The Lord Mayor desired that the man should be taken back to the Compter, and that inquiry should be made into the truth of some communication which he refused to make publicly.

GUILDHALL.—David Solomons, a converted Jew, was brought before Sir Peter Laurie, charged with stealing a watch, a lady's work-box, and some other articles, from Mr. Tepper, a converted Jew, employed as a missionary by the Society for Promoting Christianity amongst the Jews. While the prosecutor having relented in the most Christian manner, the prisoner was discharged.

MARYLEBONE.—ATTEMPTED ASSASSINATION BY A BOY.—Edward Onslow, a boy 14 years of age, was charged with having attempted to stab George Bryer, a check-taker at the Queen's Theatre, Tottenham street, Fitzroy square. The evidence went to show that on the previous night, at half-past nine o'clock, the prisoner presented a check, and on his being told that he had not received it, but that it was given to a man who had gone out, he became abusive, and in consequence thereof he was pushed down stairs; he then drew from his pocket a bayonet knife, with which he threatened Mr. Bryer, and he would, no doubt, have carried his diabolical threat into execution, but for the opportune arrival of Beech, the officer, by whom he was secured and conveyed to the station-house. The prisoner, in reply to the charge, said that the check which he presented had been given to him by Bryer, and he denied having drawn the knife at all. He was ordered to find bail for his appearance to answer at the session, in case of an indictment being preferred against him; and not being prepared with the sureties, he was committed to prison.

THAMES OFFICE.—Captain James Hibbert, commander of the Larkins, East Indiaman, from China, appeared before Mr. Broderip to answer a charge of assault, preferred against him by Lieutenant Henry Reynolds, of the 2nd Regiment of Foot. It appeared that the servant of Lieut. Reynolds that he was a passenger on board the Larkins on the homeward voyage, and that some difference had occurred between him and the commander of the ship, who, he alleged, had frequently insulted and ill-used him towards him, and on two separate occasions had committed an assault on him. It appeared, however, that the complainant was a most disagreeable personage, and during the voyage kept continually saying and doing something to annoy Mr. Clarkson, in defence, said that Lieut. Reynolds was a "pest" in the ship, and characterised the prosecution as a trumpery one. He cross-examined Lieut. Reynolds at great length, and elicited from him that he had gone up and down the cuddy with his cap and cloak on while the captain and surgeon were at dinner. It was a thing he ought not to have done, but he should not have done so if he had not been urged by insulting remarks made use of towards him. Mr. Broderip said, he was of opinion the prosecution had been properly designated a trumpery one. He should leave the prosecutor to indict the defendant at the session if he should be so advised. Alderman Copeland, who was seated on the bench, spoke in high terms of Captain Hibbert as a gentleman and a commander, and said he had saved a ship and cargo worth £180,000, after the vessel was stranded on the coast of Margate.

CORONERS' INQUEST.

On Monday last a most important investigation, which has occupied nearly four days, was resumed and concluded before Mr. T. Wakley, M.P., and a jury, at the House of Correction, Coldbath-fields, touching the death of James Doyle, aged 38, late a prisoner in that gaol. The inquiry was opened on the 15th inst., and certain charges, imputing neglect and ill-treatment on the part of the officers of the prison, having been made, the coroner and jury felt it their duty to go into the general treatment of prisoners, who were either sick or in a delicate state of health, with a view that any defects existing in a system applying to so many hundred persons as were continually inmates of the above prison, might be ferreted out and remedied. Colonel Chesterton, the governor; Mr. Wakefield, the surgeon; and all the officers of the prison, were in attendance to hear the proceedings, except when prisoners were under examination. They were then directed by the coroner to withdraw, in order that their presence should not be permitted to influence parties under their control. A great number of witnesses having been examined, for whose evidence we regret we cannot find space, the coroner summed up, and the jury retired. After about half an hour's consultation they returned, and delivered the following special verdict:—"We find from the evidence adduced, that the deceased, James Doyle, was admitted on the 1st of September, 1843, and placed to work on the tread-mill until the 6th of November, when he was relieved on account of illness—that he continually complained of illness up to Feb. 11, 1843, on which day, for the first time, he was treated by the medical officer, and that he died on the day following of granular disease of the kidneys."—The jury begged to add to their verdict, "that they could not separate without expressing their opinion that the deceased had not that proper treatment from the warders and medical officer that the nature of his case required." The jury wished it also to be understood that they exonerated the governor of the prison from any blame. Mr. Wakefield wished to be informed if the verdict was an imputation on his character, and ultimately declared his intention of taking the case into the Court of Queen's Bench, to set it aside. The protracted inquiry then terminated.

An inquiry has been proceeding, during the last few days, before special Poor-law Commissioners, into certain alleged neglect of the pauper children in the parish of Marylebone. The allegations were mainly, that a high rate of mortality amongst these poor children had taken place in consequence of the unhealthy atmosphere of the school-room, and neglect of management on the part of the mistress of the infant-school. The inquiry is still going on slowly.

A very numerous meeting of the Incorporated Law Society of the United Kingdom was held on Monday, in the hall of the institution, Chancery-lane, to receive a report of the proceedings relative to the removal of the courts of law and equity from Westminster, and to consider what further steps should be taken in the matter. A number of resolutions were adopted expressive of the inconvenience experienced by the profession in attending the Westminster Courts, and declaring that Lincoln's Inn was much more conveniently situated. A committee having been appointed to give effect to the resolutions, the meeting separated.

RUGBY SUBSCRIPTION BALL.—This ball took place at the Assembly-Rooms, at the Eagle Hotel, Rugby, on the evening of the 19th ult., and was attended by about 150 persons, consisting of members of nearly all the principal families in the neighbourhood.

ROCHESTER.—On Monday last the justices in petty sessions were occupied some time hearing a complaint against Ensign Robert Dawson Chapman, and Ensign James Le Marchant Carey, officers of the 44th Foot, for killing and stealing a fowl, the property of Mr. Walker, residing in a cottage on the London-road, near Rainham. From the statement of the complainant, it appeared that on Wednesday week, between twelve and one, in consequence of hearing three distinct reports of a gun, she went to her door, and saw two gentlemen, with guns in their hands, picking up her fowls. She immediately asked why they had shot her fowls? The gentlemen carried away her birds, and took them to the Star Inn, to which she followed them. She saw one of the officers, and asked him to pay her for her property he had destroyed, when he laughed, and gave her two cards, bearing the names of Sir Rowland Hill and John Dawson. Her birds were a favourite breed, and worth twelve shillings. Adams, the constable of Luton, said he had ascertained the officers had had two of the fowls cooked at the inn for their dinner, which they ate; the third fowl they carried away with them. The court granted warrants for the immediate apprehension of the parties. Adams, the constable, with a witness, left Rochester by the mail for Deal, where the officers are now with their depôt.

PRINTS.

ANCIENT ITALY. Painted by J. M. W. Turner, R.A.; engraved by J. T. Willmore.

MODERN ITALY. Painted by J. M. W. Turner, R.A.; engraved by William Miller.

The above-named magnificent engravings are to be delivered to subscribers to the Art-Union for the year 1843. They may rank with the most splendid productions of the landscape school of any country. In the former print the artist has given us a view of the ancient glory of the Eternal City: the Capitol lifts its lofty dome above the Tiber winding beneath, through rows of palaces and triumphal arches, which are disposed by the painter in architectural masses of astonishing breadth and grandeur. On the right hand is the Forum, with the prætors sitting in judgment, near the naval column of Duilius; the tomb of Nero, with a group of captives and trophies, in the foreground; in the distance a triumphal procession. On the other side are the stupendous arches of the Coliseum, aqueducts, and columns. The other engraving transports us to modern times: a fair city on a hill-side, with a turreted citadel, embosomed amidst luxuriant foliage; a fat-cheeked priest confessing a buxom damsel in one corner, with processions of monks and devotees kneeling before the crucifix; groups of bathers in a running stream, wooded mountains, and a far-stretching campagna in the distance. The contrasted effect of the two designs is precisely that produced on us by the realities of history: in one the sense of grandeur and power, in the other that of luscious repose and indolence, like the evening of a brilliant day. The engravers have achieved, in the richness, delicacy, and clearness of the effects, a triumph of art. Distant objects melt into the air, as in real nature; and the dazzling shiny haze of an Italian sky sheds a dreamy lustre over all.

The Solution in our next.

Mr. J. W. Powell, on behalf of the Bursledm Pottery Club, begs to accept the challenge given in our last week's paper by the Enfield Club.

We have received the following answers to the challenge in our last:—

Putney House, Putney.

Sir,—Having seen in your paper of the 25th Feb. a friendly challenge from some gentlemen at Enfield to play a game at chess, we shall be happy to accept the same.—JOHN BROWN, Secretary to the club.

Southampton, Feb. 27, 1843.

Sir,—Seeing in your last number a challenge from a gentleman in the name of a chess club to any one or more players, from the friendly way in which the same is given, I am induced to accept it, not from any thought of superior play, but from a pure love of the game, to induce others to do likewise.—Your's, &c., A NOVICE.

This gentleman has sent us his address, which we shall be glad to forward by letter to the Enfield club if wished, and if a match should be made we shall be glad to hear of it.

NATIONAL SOCIETY'S TRAINING COLLEGE.

TRAINING-COLLEGE FOR SCHOOLMASTERS.

The gratifying debate which has this week taken place upon the all-important subject of National Education induces us to lay before our readers engravings and an account of one of those institutions which have been already established for the purposes of public instruction—or rather for the normal instruction of those upon whom the education of children will afterwards devolve. The college in question was founded by the National Society, which, however, did not extend its exertions to the general scheme which Government has announced its intention to propose, but confined its influence exclusively within the pale of the Protestant Established Church.

This society has for some time considered that the unfitness of schoolmasters for their work of teaching has long operated to the prejudice of those to be taught. This duty is commonly performed "for less than labourers' wages, without present estimation or hope of preferment, by the first rustic, broken-down tradesman, or artisan out of employment, whom necessity, or perhaps indolence, brings to the employment." The majority of those who seek to be schoolmasters are all but uneducated men from the working classes. "Almost uninstructed, and utterly untrained, with little general fitness for their calling, and no special apprenticeship, they may teach a little, and this not well, but they cannot educate at all." They may be taught a system, but they want the first condition of teachers—the application of the particular method. The best preparation which such a man can receive—short of a complete course of training—is superficial and formal. He must himself be educated before he can educate others.

The National Society, feeling the necessity of this "normal education," and the consequent providing of a superior description of schoolmasters, in order to meet this want, have established training-colleges, one of which is shown in the engraving. It is situated at Stanley Grove, at the western extremity of the parish of Chelsea, being divided from the parish of Fulham by the Kensington Canal. It lies between the King's-road and the Fulham-road, by either of which it may be approached; by the former it is about three miles from Westminster Abbey, and by the latter about two miles and a half from Hyde Park Corner. It contains about eleven acres of ground, principally freehold, already beautifully and usefully laid out by the late proprietor. The excellent mansion-house with its adjoining offices have been found of easy adaptation to the purposes of a training-college, and to these has been added an extensive range of dormitories. The college, as now complete, consists externally of a centre and a handsome wing, added by the late proprietor, and a quadrangle erected by the society from the designs of Mr. Blore, in one of the Italian styles. The front entrance is by a vestibule, communicating directly both with the apartments of the Principal and with every part of the public establishment. The principal apartments are a committee-room, spacious and lofty lecture-room, and class-room, and dining-hall. There are forty-four small sleeping-rooms disposed along three sides of a corridor, connected at each end with the main house. At the two outer angles are towers or pavilions, each containing a sitting-room, master's bed-room, and three smaller chambers for boys, thus affording accommodation for fifty students and two masters, with a separate apartment for each. The offices need not be described. Part of a separate building has been fitted up as an infirmary, and a small farm-yard with outbuildings has been put in order for the institution. The several college buildings, with the chapel to be presently described, occupy about one third of the ground; there are two kitchen-gardens and three small meadows, and the whole is surrounded by a wall. "It is perfectly healthy, being on gravel, with an abundant supply of good water, while the fine trees, to which the place owes its name (Stanley Grove), give it an aspect not inappropriate to its present destination. To have secured such advantages in the immediate neighbourhood of London may, indeed, be regarded as most fortunate."

The chapel, shown in the annexed engraving, faces the Fulham-road, as the college itself does the King's-road. The former is cruciform in plan, with a semicircular eastern end. The principal entrance is at the western end, which, with the transept-like wings, have lofty gables. In the former is a large circular or rose window. The entire building is well lit by circular-headed windows, partaking of the Anglo-Norman style. From the west side of each transept, at its junction with the choir, rises a campanile, or bell-tower; the material is fine light brick, and the effect of the whole composition is pleasing and picturesque. It serves as a place of worship for the adjoining district, as well as for the inmates of the college. The society is glad to combine in this way a considerable local benefit with its own objects; but no sacrifice has been made, nor any extra expense incurred, for this purpose. A small domestic chapel might have served; but the students would not then have been habituated to the solemnities of public worship, and it is desirable that there should be a general congregation.

NEW CHAPEL AND TRAINING GROUND ATTACHED TO THE NORMAL COLLEGE, CHELSEA.

At a short distance westward of the chapel is a practising-school for 130 scholars from the neighbourhood, who are taught by six pupils and a master from the college. The school fee is 4d. per week, but there are free scholars. The building is of octagonal form, and its arrangements are very novel.

The college is intended to consist of 60 students, superintended by a Principal and Vice-Principal, who will divide with him the duties of the chapel, and two resident teachers. The Principal is the Rev. Derwent Coleridge, who has drawn up an excellent account of the college. All the students are to be apprenticed to the National Society until each shall be twenty-one years of age. One of the teachers directs the labours of the apprentices out of doors, is steward, and manages the farm and garden. A master has been appointed for the practising-school. Vocal music and drawing are taught by masters, and a drill-sergeant gives lessons in gymnastics. Boys are admitted at from 14 to 17 years of age. Hence the college is not a preparatory-school, but approaches more nearly to an university, from which, however, it differs in all the students being destined for one particular calling. Three months' probation is allowed for each candidate, and his fitness is determined before the indentures are signed. A premium to cover personal expenses (£25 per annum) is expected, but this may hereafter be dispensed with. At the opening of the college, ten free apprenticeships were offered by the committee for public competition, and quickly and satisfactorily filled up. We have not space to describe the youth to be selected for the college further than that he should possess a certain seriousness of character, which appears at a very early age, and insures earnestness, reflection, and good sense. He must read with intelligence, and write correctly from dictation. A very simple education, with a ground-work of religious knowledge, will suffice. Good health is indispensable. A strong, well-grown boy is preferred; and simple manners, and pleasing address, however rustic, are desirable. Faulty pronunciation, and coarse accent, are objectionable; for every schoolmaster should speak his own language with perfect propriety. Latin is taught, though only as far as a sound acquaintance with the accidence, syntax, and etymology of the language, for the sake of the English language, although English grammar is distinctly studied. The intelligent reading of the Scriptures is carefully enjoined. Geography, the principles of numbers, algebra, and trigonometry are taught. Of physical science, botany is preferred. Geometrical perspective is not neglected. Mr. Hullah gives lessons in vocal music, in connexion with the daily service of the chapel. The cost of maintaining each student is but 2d. per week. The clothing comprises a Sunday and working suit: the former is made of black or dark cloth, with shoes and gaiters, and consists of a frock-coat, or a round jacket, waistcoat, and trousers, a black silk hat, and white cravat: the latter is a round velveteen jacket and waistcoat, with fustian trousers and heavy shoes, a brown holland blouse and a straw hat for summer. The whole outfit, with linen, and a cotton umbrella, and a pair of strong leather slippers (to be worn in the house), costs seven guineas. The industrial system has been devised as well for balancing the intellectual pursuits of the students by manual labour as for economy: they perform the business of male servants in the house; milk the cows and manage the produce of the farm, and work in the gardens, lawns, and shrubberies; these duties being assigned to different parties weekly. It should, however, be observed that the service of the chapel is, as it were, the keystone of the entire system of the college.

The National Society have already raised the sum of £30,000, of which £20,000 has been appropriated to the foundation of this training-college; the purchase-money of the mansion and grounds being upwards of £9000. The entire expenditure, when the college is full, will be about £3000, of which two thirds will fall upon the income of the society. The entire cost of educating each schoolmaster is estimated at from £150 to £200—a small sum in comparison with the permanent benefits which this system must insure to society.

LITERATURE.

NARRATIVE OF A VOYAGE ROUND THE WORLD, DURING THE YEARS 1836-1842, INCLUDING DETAILS OF THE NAVAL OPERATIONS IN CHINA, FROM DECEMBER, 1840, TO NOVEMBER, 1841. By Captain Sir EDWARD BELCHER, R.N. 2 vols. 8vo. Colburn.

The voyage of the Sulphur, described in the present work, has been one of the most protracted of modern times. No less than six years elapsed ere its term was completed. The seas traversed, and the regions visited, were those respecting which our information is least plentiful, and curiosity in the present age most active. The vicissitudes of every climate, from the Arctic Circle to the Equator, were encountered; every corner of the vast Pacific, from the Island of Juan Fernandez to the coast of China, was to be explored; the adventurous vessel was to thread, as an unexplored and dangerous navigation, over oceans rarely visited, and among lands tenanted only by the dusky savage.

Sir E. Belcher was appointed in 1836 to the command of the expedition employed in surveying the west coast of America, from Chili to the Russian settlements at the extreme north. The scheme of his instructions (which are prefixed to the work) embraces a great variety of subsidiary points of interest: he is directed to ascertain the correct position of numerous ports and islands laid down in the charts as doubtful, because imperfectly ascertained by previous navigators. The difficulties of the surveying service are so many and formidable, the operations required for determining the true longitude and latitude of a given point so nice, and depending on contingencies so various, that due accuracy is only to be attained after repeated verifications: hence not even the skill of a Cook or a Vancouver can be relied upon, unless corroborated in its discoveries by the increased resources and more minute investigations of modern science. In the course of his labours, Sir E. Belcher explored and surveyed the eastern coast of Central America, Mexico, the shores of California, the Columbia River, Nootka and Norfolk Sounds, and the possessions of Russia; he twice visited the Sandwich Islands, touched at the Marquesas, Society, and Fiji Islands, and the archipelago of the New Hebrides, and at length, by order of the Admiralty, joined the expedition in the Chinese Seas, whose operations have been crowned with so glorious a result. Perhaps he has not made the best of the opportunities presented to him in so wide a field of observation: his accounts are often deficient in fulness and clearness, and he seems more familiar with the sword and the sextant than with the pen. Much hydrographical information has been withheld which might have been communicated with advantage; but the work, in the whole, forms no slight contribution to the sum of our knowledge, and many particulars, which are now ascertained for the first time, are of great value both to navigators and merchants, as throwing light on the geography and political state of some of the least known portions of the globe.

The Spanish American ports of the east are described as still suffering from the effects of the revolution, and offering to the speculator few inducements to traffic. Commerce is at a low ebb, and the population has fallen off. At some of them great difficulty was experienced in obtaining the requisite supplies of provisions. Panama, in which half the commerce of a continent once centered, has long been falling into decay, and is seldom visited by vessels of any size. Steam navigation, should the projects now on foot be carried to completion, will no doubt work its miracles here as elsewhere, and may more than restore its former greatness. Acapulco, with its splendid harbour, to which the galleons freighted with the rich products of the Philippines once resorted, has been ruined by repeated earthquakes, and by the heavy duties which the absurd impolicy of the Mexican Government has imposed on imports and exports. "The very great mistake," says the author, "committed in 1827, by the expulsion of the old Spaniards, has ruined every port on this side of Mexico, and the vexatious system of carrying into effect the custom-house regulations will utterly ruin its commerce, if this has not been already achieved. Only two European residents remain." With reference to the scheme of a canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, through the Isthmus of Panama, so often proposed, and which, it is to be hoped, may soon be realized, Sir E. Belcher points out that the true line of communication would be by the stream of the Estero Real, in the Gulf of Fonseca, which he found navigable by vessels drawing 10 feet for more than 30 miles, and which is fed from the Lake of Momagua. Sir E. Belcher did not proceed to the head of the river, but a few miles of canal would serve to connect it with the chain of lakes in the interior of the states of San Salvador, Honduras, and Nicaragua, and extend the line of navigation to the Atlantic. It is surprising, he remarks, that so much money should have been expended in the search after other communications, when nature points out this as the first that should be attempted. We trust that capitalists who have money to invest will be slow to lend their countenance to the scheme of a railroad, to which the nature of the country seems to present the most formidable if not insurmountable difficulties. The only obstruction which was found in ascending the stream of the Estero was that offered by the musquitoes; but this is of trifling importance to residents.

Monterey, in California, which the piratical audacity of an American officer the other day attempted, without warrant from his government, to appropriate, was visited by Sir E. Belcher, and is described by him as a miserable town, with no defences but a mud-brick battery, mounting seven guns, in a state infinitely more dangerous to those using them than to those against whom they might have been used. California possesses immense natural resources, which offer a boundless field for the employment of labour and capital, but the country is in a state of anarchy, which, so long as it exists, will effectually prevent them from being made available. The noble river of San Francisco offers an invaluable outlet for its produce, and will one day be a position of immense importance for the command of the Pacific, in the hands of any country which may obtain possession of it.

The author's account of the Russian forts of Sotka, or New Archangel, and Bodegas, and of the British settlements on the Columbia, to which we alluded in our last, is full of interest. The information he affords on the present state of the Sandwich islands, and the proceedings of the missionaries, is vague and contradictory. A full account of this interesting group, of the progress which has been made by the natives, and the changes wrought by the missionaries, is much wanted. It is certain that their population has fallen off greatly since the days of Cook. Sir E. Belcher declares that it is a great error to attribute it to the intercourse of Europeans, but he does not attempt to account for it on any other rational ground. A weekly contemporary, in reviewing his book, states, that he has "yet met with no sufficient explanation of this remarkable phenomenon." We fear the explanation is sufficiently evident in the introduction of contagious diseases of the variolous sort, or in others which have a yet darker source in the vices of the European seamen, the ravages of which are not counteracted by any adequate supply of medical aid.

HAND OF A BARBER-SURGEON.—CHINA.

We have left ourselves little space to allude to many other interesting subjects of reflection which these volumes suggest. We could have wished for fuller details on the interesting regions of New Guinea, New Britain, and the various archipelagoes in their vicinity. The author's stay did not permit him thoroughly to explore the coasts, or to visit the interior of these islands, and the book does not add much to our knowledge respecting them. The immense area comprehended under the above designations forms one of the most interesting and important divisions of Polynesia, and as the tide of traffic and enterprise sets on, becomes daily of increased importance. The late Admiral Dumont d'Urville, who commanded the expedition of the Astrolabe and Zélée, sent out by the French government, explored but a small part of the islands, and left much more to be done. The Dutch, ever alive to the interests of their commerce, have lately formed a settlement in New Guinea, and are actively prosecuting their researches. These things show that the attention of foreign nations is being gradually directed to this quarter, and it is more than time than the British government bestirred themselves in the matter. The exploration of this part of the Indian seas ought immediately to be undertaken. Without meaning to depreciate the importance of other expeditions, it is impossible to doubt that costly and expensive enterprises have lately been undertaken, with far less prospect of a useful and profitable result. The discovery of new markets for our commerce is an object of paramount importance in the present state of distress.

WOMAN WITH MOUTH-PIECE.

We have only to add that the volumes are adorned by very fine and spirited designs, illustrative of scenery and costume, some of which we are enabled to present to our readers, scattered through the letter-press of this notice. We have selected such as serve to illustrate the manners of the Indian tribes on the north-west coast of America. Our readers have here a female head of one of the tribes near Port Mulgrave, with the wooden mouth-ornament, worn by them in an aperture under the lower lip; a castanet; a tomb; Indian cradles; and a strange appearance of ice at Cape Suckling. Another series of the engravings has reference to China, comprising the hand of a barber-surgeon, taken on board the Sulphur from the life; a trading-junk, a fast-boat, and a tea-boat.

Heu ' quantum minus est reliquis versari quam illæ meminisse ! SHENSTONE.

Mute, senseless wand, that erst a sibyl wav'd
With bright enchantment o'er beyond earth's sphere,—
Thy pow'r is with thy mistress now in-grav'd,
Hers in cold death—but thine in silence here!
Hast thou no legacy of magic spell
The which to work it was thy task to do;
Or art thou like some fount whose sacred well
Dried up and fled when fled Egeria too?
Is there no charm to find if from thy lips
Some honeyed eloquence was nigh to flow,
When the bright star that rul'd thee met eclipse,
And shed oblivion o'er thee here below?

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

INVESTITURE OF SIR HUGH GOUGH WITH THE ORDER OF GRAND CROSS OF THE BATH.—The following description of this interesting ceremony is from the letter of survey-witness:—

While at Nanking, I went on board the admiral's ship Cornwallis, 72 guns, and witnessed the ceremony of investing Sir Hugh Gough with the insignia of the Order of Grand Cross of the Bath. This highly interesting and imposing ceremony was performed by Vice Admiral Sir W. Parker, K.C.B., by the Queen's special command, and there is but one instance of its having been done in a similar manner before. The Queen's letter, which was read, was the most flattering and complimentary to Sir Hugh Gough that the English language would allow of. It regretted the gallant officer's absence from England, which deprived her Majesty of the pleasure of conferring it personally; but strictly charged the Admiral to do it in the most public manner possible, and to convince the General of the desire of the Crown to make suitable acknowledgment of his services in China. Royal salutes were fired, the ship full of people in full dress. Prayers were read, and after the ceremony the good old English fashion of eating and drinking took place. The Chinese Tartar General with his staff came on board, but too late.*

LORD SEATON'S STAFF.—Lieut.-General Lord Seaton, G.C.B., Lord High Commissioner of the Ionian Isles, has appointed Captain the Hon. James Colborne, of the 16th Foot, and Captain George Murray, of the 82nd Light Infantry, to be his Aides-de Camp, and Lieut. the Hon. Fo. Colborne, of the 15th Foot, to be his military secretary

SIR CHARLES METCALFE'S STAFF.—The personal staff of the Right Hon. Sir Charles Theophilus Metcalfe, Bart., G.C.B., Governor General of the Canadas, will be composed of the following officers, viz., Captain Sackville Berkwurgy, of the Grenadier Guards; Capt. J. A. Lewis Baillie, of the 72nd Highlanders, and Lieut. Archibald K. Campbell, Royal Canadian Rifles. His excellency will embark, with his staff, at Liverpool, for his government, on the 4th of March in the North American mail steamer

DEATH OF MAJOR-GENERAL THOMAS ARBUTHNOT, Esq., K.C.H.—This brave and gallant officer died at Cheltenham on Sunday last. Sir John Jones served in the Royal Engineers in the campaign in Calabria, &c., and was present at the battle of Maida, and attack of Scylla Castle, in the Peninsular campaign and siege of Seringapatam, in 1808 and 1809, accompanied the expedition to Walcheren, and was present at the reduction of Flushing. He also served in the campaigns of 1810, 1811, and 1812, in the Peninsula, and received a medal for Badajos. Sir John was shot through the ancle joint at the siege of Burgos, in October, 1812.

LORD DOWNES, K.C.B., has arrived at Limerick, to assume the duties of the military command of that district, to which he was recently appointed by the Duke of Wellington

The following alterations and interchanges of Cavalry Quarters have been decided on, and are to commence in April:—1st Dragoons (Royals) from Dublin to his Aides-de Camp, and Lieut. the Hon. Fo. Colborne, of the 15th Foot, to be his military secretary

SIR CHARLES METCALFE'S STAFF.—The personal staff of the Right Hon. VIEW OF GENEVA.

The town of Geneva is built on two hills, divided by the Rhône, where it issues out of Lake Leman; the higher of which, on the south bank of the river, is about 100 feet above the lake. The larger part of the town lies on that side. The river forms an island within the town, which is also built upon, and is a separate district, joined to the two banks by bridges. The district on the north bank is called St. Gervais. A smaller island, at the very point where the Rhône issues from the lake, is planted with trees, and forms a public promenade, which is adorned with the statue of Rousseau. A handsome suspension-bridge has been lately thrown across the river, to connect both banks and the island. A handsome quay, with fine buildings, has also been constructed along the south bank of the river. The streets in the old part of the town, or Cité, as it is called, are narrow and steep, the houses high, and the appearance of the streets rather gloomy. It is regularly fortified with ramparts, ditches, and bastions, but is commanded by the hills of La Bretie and St. Jean, which makes it unfit to stand a regular siege. There are three gates — two on the Savoy or south side, and one on the French or Swiss side. The municipal expenditure of the town amounts to about half a million of florins annually, the revenue being derived chiefly from the octroi or duty on provisions levied at the gate. Geneva abounds with means of instruction. There is the academy, or university, with four faculties, theology, law, science, and belles lettres, with forty professors. The schools of drawing and architecture, mechanic schools (ecoles industrielles), where they teach mathematics, physics, and chemistry applied to the arts; a school for music, a school for gymnastics, a school for watch-maker's apprentices; besides elementary schools, infant schools, and other schools, both public and private. There are also societies of arts, of medicine, of physics, and natural history. A mechanics' society, a military society, and a reading society, which has a library of 30,000 volumes, receives foreign journals and papers, and has about 300 subscribers; a museum of natural history, which is very rich; a cabinet of medals; a botanical garden, under the direction of Professor DeCandolle, and other scientific institutions.

The recent disturbances at Geneva, of which some account is given below, present an appropriate opportunity for the introduction of an engraving of that romantic ville.

An insurrectionary movement manifested itself at Geneva at six o'clock on the evening of the 13th ult. The tocsin was immediately sounded, and the insurgents, who mostly belonged to the suburb of St. Gervais, the centre of the partisans of the movement, gained possession of two of the city gates (those of Cornavin and Hives). A collision took place between them and the troops, in which 11 persons were said to have been either killed or wounded. Among the dead were Messrs. Fournier, Major of the place, and Fech, a Councillor of State. The insurgents marched against the Hôtel de Ville, the seat of the Government, but failed in their attempt to carry it. An attack was equally made against the powder-mill, which was vigorously defended, and remained in the hands of the Government. The movement was believed to have been occasioned by a law voted on the 13th by the Council of State, authorizing the police to institute domiciliary visits, in order to discover the hiding-place of a foreigner expelled from the canton.

SCENE FROM "MUCH ADO ABOUT NOTHING"—DOGBERRY, VERGES, SEXTON, AND PRISONERS.

Dogberry. "Why this is flat perjury to call a prince's brother villain."

We here present to our readers a scene from "Much ado about Nothing," with a separate portrait of Mr. Macready in the character of Benedick, from that finely organised and well continued comedy. Mr. Macready selected the occasion of his benefit as a fitting one to invest with the attraction of a novel appearance; and it would seem, indeed, to have been happily chosen, for it collected into every part of the house an audience that "filled the bumper fair." Mr. Macready, however, can hardly fail—no matter what the peculiar attraction of the character to be sustained by him—to have a host of friends surrounding him on an occasion when the estimation of the man, more than the value of the performance, is taken into account by the world. He has his enemies, and many cavillers at his stage mannerisms, who, nevertheless, cannot often deny his genius: but the great public will always pour forth from its bosom hundreds upon hundreds of warm admirers to assert with him the dignity of the national stage, and to acknowledge and applaud with generous and just encomium his great ability and untiring energy, in fostering and preserving not only the Shaksperian drama, but whatever is pure, lofty, and classical in histrionic art. We were of those, therefore, who rejoiced heartily in the sight of the overflowing audience, who came less to the performance of "Much Ado about Nothing," than to pay to the Benedick of the evening their tribute of cordial encouragement and respect. It must be confessed, moreover, that Mr. Macready made a hit in the peculiar character:—he played, notwithstanding all predictions to the contrary,—arch comedy,—and drew down loud uproarious shouts of laughing jollity, by the purely original features which he conceived he might pourtray. A contemporary critic denies the truth of such a conception, but admits its forcible efficacy; in Macready's hands it was acted up to most cleverly, and told thoroughly with the audience. The first great effect was produced immediately after Benedick had overheard that Beatrice was in love with him. He marched from the arbour, and he took a chair, and there he sat for some minutes with the oddest expression of countenance in the world. Benedick did not know what to make of the new dawnings of love in his bosom, so he fidgeted, and he crossed his legs in some new fashion at the end of every three words; and he looked at one moment so lugubrious, and at the next, when he chuckled over the beauty of Beatrice, so self-satisfied, that he was perfectly irresistible. The droll misery in his countenance when reviled by the Prince and Claudio, his horror at the discovery of his brushed hat and civet perfume, were admirable. "He is all mirth," quoth Don Pedro, ironically, and the contradiction given to the assertion by that melancholy visage, was humourous in the extreme. But let us not be understood to signify, that all the dignity of Benedick was given up in this reading. When he had undertaken to fight Claudio, and make Hero's cause his own, and he was still pursued by the bantering of his former friends, he nicely distinguished the impatience shown by a man with a serious purpose on his mind, who shakes off frivolous jests, from that of the mere butt who is fidgetty at being teazed. His acknowledgment to the Prince of past obligations was dignified and respectful, and would have been commendable in any reading of the character. The outbreak of spirits with which he defied jests against the "married man" at the conclusion of the piece produced a most exhilirating effect; and at the fall of the curtain the applause of the audience was shot forth in one great burst. We shall not dwell at any length on the rest of the characters, merely observing that the mirth of Mrs. Nisbett, as Beatrice, is charming, but that she makes little of the sentiment; that Compton's Dogberry is clever but hard, and that Keeley's Verges is a little picture, perfectly finished, such as that actor can execute when he pleases.

MACREADY AS BENEDICK, ADVANCING FROM THE ARBOUR—"LOVE ME!"

THE MAYORALTY "SILVER CRADLE."—The recent accouchement of the Lady Mayoress has caused the revival of the old City tradition of a "silver cradle" being customarily presented on so interesting an occasion. The whole, however, appears to be an idle gossip's tale, or is, perhaps, a phrase akin to a child's being born with a silver spoon in its mouth. The last occasion on which the Lady Mayoress (for the time being) was confined was in the mayoralty of Alderman Copeland, when, on December 1, 1835, the Court of Common Council referred it to a committee "to devise some method of testifying the gratification of the court, at the birth of a son to the Lord Mayor." At a Court of Common Council, on December 14, the committee presented their report, recommending an address of congratulation to the Lord Mayor, to be ornamentally written and emblazoned. To this an amendment was moved, "That a piece of plate be presented to the Lady Mayoress, with a suitable inscription." The court adjourned without coming to any decision. At a court, on December 16, the debate was resumed, and a motion was made to agree with the committee in their report; to which, however, an amendment was moved, "That this court doth most sincerely congratulate the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor on the recent accession to his family by the birth of a son, and trusts that the addition will be a permanent increase of happiness to his domestic circle." This amendment was carried unanimously; and so vanished the tale of the silver cradle.

In the votes and proceedings of the House of Lords last week was this entry:—"Lord Brougham and Vaux—to submit a motion relative to the Municipal Corporation of London, Thursday, thirtieth of February!" DISPOSAL OF STOLEN BANK OF ENGLAND NOTES IN PARIS.—It will be recollected that in the beginning of last October Mr. W. F. Grant, clerk to Messrs. Grant and Hodgson, of Fenchurch-street, merchants, was robbed of his pocket-book, containing £700, in Bank of England notes, on his way from Barnard, Dimsdale, and Co.'s banking-house, on Cornhill, to the Custom-house, where he was going to pay duties. The property lost consisted of two notes for £300 each, one for £50, one for £20, and one for £20; and a reward of £100 was immediately offered, and John and Daniel Forester, the officers, were employed by Mr. Bush, the solicitor to the committee of bankers for protection against forgeries and frauds. John Forester remained in London, while Daniel accompanied Mr. W. F. Grant to Paris, to which place they had reason to suppose the notes had been taken to be exchanged. The loss of the property had, of course, been advertised on the Continent, and our officer received all the necessary assistance from the police at Paris. The two notes for £300 each were soon traced to two men, named Samuel Hudson and Bernard Lapoman, in Paris, who were detained, at the instance of Messrs Chauviteau and Co., the well-known bankers there, on behalf of Messrs. Grant and Hodgson, charged with the unlawful possession of these notes, which the police kept possession of. The case came on before the tribunals in France, and the following is an extract of a letter received by Messrs. Grant and Hodgson, from their agent in Paris, a few days ago:—"The verdict has been in your favour. 1st. The court declared competent about Messrs. Chauviteau, Loyer, and Stephen, and maintained they have only done their duty as honourable merchants in stopping the circulation of £600 bank notes stolen in England, and put them out of cause without any damages, &c. 2nd. The court declared itself incompetent between Messrs. Grant and Hodgson and Samuel Hudson, to judge to whom of the parties the £600 bank notes were the property. 3rd. The court declared all the expenses of the lawsuit against Hudson.

THE TRIAL FOR ASSASSINATION.

We are of those who believe that a very general dissatisfaction exists throughout the empire at the result of the trial of M'Naughten, the assassin of Mr. Drummond, in a verdict of acquittal upon the ground of insanity. We do not speak of a dissatisfaction which has its origin in any feeling of cruelty or vengeance, which merely laments that the wretched man should not have fulfilled the lot of the murderer in the penalty of death, but a dissatisfaction that the fact of insanity should have been admitted so readily, and with so little qualification at the trial; and that a verdict to that effect should invest the criminal with a protection which the community at large regard as being fraught with danger to its own personal security. The public mind is now actively alive to the important question of assassination and its punishment. The crime was formerly unknown amongst Englishmen; its frequency and, we are bound to add, its impunity, is now filling the heart of the country with horror and alarm. The cry, upon the recent acquittal of M'Naughten, is, almost everywhere, "Who after this is safe?" A majority of reasoners upon his case refuse to recognise the principle of madness as having so pervaded his nature as to have, either morally or legally, made him irresponsible for the act which he committed. We do not carry our own argument so far as to base it on these premises. We are content to admit him mad upon the evidence of the medical opinions—and that is all—adding, moreover, that opinions in this instance seem to have stood in the stead of law. But those who deny the madness of M'Naughten in regard to the act which he committed, have on their side a colourable pretext which impartiality induces us to set up. They contend that his monomania—that is, his delusion upon a single point—did not urge him to the act of assassination which he literally committed that in life affairs he was shrewd, careful, parsimonious, and a miser, and that his monomania was confined to an imaginative deception that he was being persecuted without knowing by whom. This persecution haunted his spirit in England—in France—in his native country—but he had focussed its origin in his native country alone. His enemies were now Tories, now Catholics; but they were always people of Glasgow—and it was from Glasgow that he fled to avoid them. There was no personal monomania—pointing out a special object of abhorrence—according to the evidence, in his disease. But it was contended that his disease assumed a personality by accident—that "he met a man at Charing-cross, in whom he fancied he recognised one of his persecutors; his imagined enemy seemed to scowl at him as he passed; immediately, as he said, the injuries of years rose up before his mind; he thought that there lay a way out of his unbearable anguish in the taking the life of his unrelenting foe; and, thoughtless of morality or personal safety, he did the wild act which he believed would give him relief." But this was only the evidence of surmise on the part of the medical practitioners, and not of fact—and part of it perhaps originated in the craft of simulated insanity. He did not meet a man by accident, and concentrate all his imagined injuries into a single act of vengeance upon a scowl. He had been for days and days—whether mad or not—frequenting the scene of the assassination for some settled purpose of recognition or identity; remarking Downing-street, remarking the residence of Sir Robert Peel, and watching the frequent travels of one individual between these places, until the conviction had settled him that that individual was the man he wanted. This, say the reasoners whose arguments we are adducing, evidenced system—"method in madness," if there was madness at all—and certainly no impromptu act of monomaniac delusion or despair. The careful preparation of the pistols, too, is another spoke in their wheel of argument. Now, while we think all these propositions deserve much reflection and great deliberative thought, we will own our own impressions made by the trial are to the effect that the unhappy wretch whose crime has so distracted society is really in an irresponsible mental condition—worked out of guilt, however, more than out of affliction—taking rise in depravity, and made more and more morbid by the passive indulgence in and abandonment to the miserable doctrines of Socialism and Infidelity. It is a question whether men who thus brood their dark journey into madness—through the brighter and better elements of society which are free in their action upon all—have a right to put upon it any fearful and atrocious climax, to which they may excite themselves, by a bad process of mental intoxication—and then to be exonerated by the doctrine of irresponsibility from the consequences of crime. The man who is fit to go at large among his kind should be subject to the punishments which restrain bad natures from sins against our common brotherhood; and the delusion which prompts a man to a murder with the features of premeditation about it, should hardly be allowed to procure him not only a positive acquittal from his guilt, but a positive, and not unpleasant, provision for his after existence. It is sadly holding out to the morbid—particularly if they be miserly to boot—a decided premium to commit a crime, for the sake of feigning a madness that shall insure them a life asylum after they are tried.

Upon this subject the papers of the past week have been ringing with florid descriptions of the comfortable condition of Oxford. He is well dieted—is remarkably neat in his person—a gentleman, in fact—and is fast educating himself with books. He is quite an artist, and something of a musician; and, if we should shortly have at one of our theatres a three-act opera by the "self-taught Bedlam regicide"—who, by the way, holds levees of visitors—the public need not be surprised: the "pistol overture" would introduce it with éclat. Meanwhile, others follow his example of assassination. Mr. M'Naughten does his murder with effect, and is acquitted with effect also; and, two or three days after his acquittal, a Captain Dillon threatens to put a bullet into the heart of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as if he too had arrived at the conviction that a madhouse, with plenty, was better than pauperism in a gaol! The evil spreads, and is growing horrible, and it is quite clear that the Legislature must interfere. We must not be for ever nursing madmen as criminals, or criminals as madmen, to the endangering of the personal security of the community, and as a sort of premium upon bad passions, and against the cultivation of either intellect or virtue.

One suggestion occurs to us which we throw out for the consideration of those who are occupied in legislative projects upon this important theme. It has reference to those whom unquestionable madness may have exonerated from the punishment of any atrocious act. It is the erection of a lunatic asylum upon Norfolk Island, whither such persons should be sent. Treat them there as well as in our own Bedlam; have consideration for their mental affliction if you will; give them none of the physical punishment of transportation, but remove them from the presence of the community they have offended and outraged; give the country the satisfaction of knowing that the worker (responsible or irresponsible) of any dreadful amount of wickedness is no longer a peaceful and luxurious dweller in comfort in the very scene of the crime that he has committed, and the affliction he has wrought. Should the wretched being be brought back to consciousness, and learn what he had done in his disease, he would hardly seek to return to the home which he had blackened with infamy and stained with blood; and should he, on the other hand, continue impervious to light and reason, the remainder of his existence would not be in one respect embittered by his transportation from the country he had unconsciously disgraced. The alternative, too, might act as an example to check the progress of feigned insanity, for Bedlam and Norfolk Island are "wide as the poles asunder," and no similarity of treatment in both, would induce a similarity of desire on the part of acting-monomaniacs to seek the "paradise beyond the seas" with the same morbid avidity with which they have been content to earn their blood-qualification for the Eden of St. George's Fields.

THE SEA-PARACHUTE, OR LIFE-UMBRELLA.

To the Editor of the Illustrated London News.

Sir,—The admirably written comments (in your Number of Feb. 25) on the "British contrivances for saving shipwrecked and drowning persons" have earned for you every good and thinking man's most cordial thanks, and I am proud to proffer you the poor tribute of my acknowledgment. If, sir, there were more men in the field of humanity with your Samaritan-like sentiments, we should have fewer occasions for exercising our sympathy and succour; and believing it to be a duty we owe to each other to interchange our thoughts upon points of public utility, I take upon myself to submit what I conceive to be a new and available aid on occasions of shipwreck. In nine cases out of ten a lee-shore is the scene of death and destruction; this I lay down as my postulate. Now we are all old enough to recollect the buoyant properties of a parachute, since they were publicly demonstrated only a few years since by a safe descent from a balloon. Upon this parachute principle, I propose to construct ship-umbrellas; and setting out, as I have done, with the hypothesis that the vessel in distress is on a lee-shore, I question not for a moment but that a ready-made, or even hastily rigged article of the description in question would safely convey a man and line from the ship to the shore, and thus afford the facile opportunity of rescuing the crew, by cradle or otherwise.

I am not, it may be charitably supposed, insane enough to attach any value to this sea-parachute in cases where the wind is not, or nearly so, dead on shore; but I confidently repeat, that nine-tenths of the shipwrecks that annually befall us are deducible to a lee-shore, and for my melancholy data I instance the recent casualties on the seaboard of England and France.

Every man who knows the sea from the land is perfectly aware that the first feeling on board of a vessel that has taken the ground is how to open a communication with the shore, and more especially so on finding that assistance from it is either impracticable or inexident.

In brief, then, a tough stick, with a duck, or light canvass top (if slightly tarred so much the better), and with braces radiating to a grummet, from the end of which (stick) about half a fathom of rope should depend with a short strong piece of wood to sit on, might be made (where no "vessel of mercy" is at hand) the simple instrument of preservation.

The subjoined sketch exhibits the construction of the proposed machine, and the circumstances under which it would be used.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.—On Friday se'nnight, at the unusual hour of eight o'clock, the Chamber was divided upon Admiral Lacrosse's amendment, proposing a reduction of 50,000f. in the secret service money. Before the Chamber proceeded to vote the Minister of the Interior, in order to put an end to all quibbling and equivocation, declared emphatically—"The only question at issue (at this moment is, then, the question of confidence and of the Cabinet (Cries of "Yes, yes.") I understand the impatience of our adversaries to see it settled. M. Billault has declared that we have not the confidence of the country To ascertain whether we have or have not can only be settled by ascertaining if we have the majority of the Chamber representing the country: if it be ascertained that the majority will desert us, our honour, we shall at least be free from those attacks so unceasingly directed against the Cabinet."

Marshal Soult was still more emphatic:—"The want of confidence must apply to all the Cabinet, between the members of which there is the most perfect union;" and he added, "It belongs to me, old soldier as I am, to defend all the members of the Cabinet, and I will support the Minister of Foreign Affairs, against whom those attacks are more directly levelled, with the same earnestness that I would any other member of the Cabinet."

After these "no mistake" declarations the Chamber proceeded to the vote, when there appeared—For Ministers, 242; against them, 197; majority, 45; and that in a Chamber of 440.

The warmest friends of M. Guizot did not expect a majority so large, and so complete, especially after the defection of Dufaure and Passy. M. de Lamartine's oration is extravagantly praised by the Opposition press, but even that gentleman's great admirer and apologist, the Constitutionnel, has to confess that the address of M. Guizot greatly surpassed it in all the elements of legitimate eloquence. The Journal des Débats, indeed, pronounces M. Guizot's speech on this occasion his chef d'œuvre; and even the friends of the war faction do not deny it the merit of extraordinary oratorical eloquence.

The Paris journals of Tuesday, which we have received, continue to devote entire columns to remarks on the late struggle. The tone of the Opposition organs is still a subdued one, but rather less so than immediately after the ballot on the Address. Hope is the last thing they will admit that the Opposition do not intend to try their strength again during the present session, unless some unexpected event favourable to their views should arise. They are very much with M. Guizot for his reparate and pos tive declarations that he will persevere in the peace policy of the government, and continue to make it a crime that he should be praised and supported by the English press.

A private letter informs us, that in consequence of the majority recently obtained by the Cabinet, it has seriously and earnestly resumed the commercial negotiations with England, Prussia, and Belgium, and that there is a chance of some communication being made on this subject during the present session.

SPAIN.—We have received Madrid papers of the 27th ult., by which it appears that in the capital the organisation of the barracan had, contrary to many a prediction, proved almost wholly favourable to the Ministerial party eleven out of twelve colleges having appointed the said committees favourably to the wishes of the Arachu can faction. The accounts from the provinces, however, are much less favourable. The Regent's party has been defeated in Biscay, the Opposition, or rather Exaltados, having returned members for Bilbao, Portugalete, Durango, Valmaseda, Palacaros, Rigoitia, Sondica, and Galvacano. The Opposition were expected to prevail also in Guipuscoa, and had already triumphed in the province of Burgos, their candidates having been returned at Burgos, Briviesca, Villacayo, and Pamplega.

From Barcelona we learn that the municipal elections were to take place on the 5th of this month, the Government having approved of the annulling of the late ones.

The Diario Malaga of the 18th ult. says that an English vessel, called the Waterloo, has been seized in that port for smuggling; her destination was Oran.

PORTUGAL.—The Royal Tar steamer arrived on Monday from Gibraltar, having been detained there by hard weather, which had prevailed to such an extent as to prevent communication between Gibraltar and the adjacent towns; the wind was accompanied with tremendous showers of rain, which caused the water to rise at Lisbon and Oporto full sixteen feet higher than the general mark. Much property had consequently been destroyed both at Cadiz and at Lisbon. The Portuguese Government has by this steamer sent a further proposition as an amendment to the British Court, on their tariff. Their terms were yet far from approved of by the British merchants. It was reported that two members of the Ministry were likely to retire. Passengers by the Royal Tar—Lieutenant Crawford, of the Rifles; Lieutenant Stewart, of the 88th; Lieutenant Hamilton, of the 85th; and Mr. Cockburn, a merchant. Feb. 25, passed the Tory transport, in the Straits, bound to Gibraltar, with a detachment of troops.

LISBON, Feb. 27.—At length the tariff convention may be considered as brought to a favourable conclusion. The Portuguese negociators have acceded to the reasonable demands of England to an extent which their a little doubt will be deemed satisfactory by the British government. On Saturday the Duke of Palmella, after a Ministerial council, in which the subject was maturely discussed and the duke fully empowered, presented to Lord Howard the ready final proposition on the part of Portugal, which is forwarded to Lord Aberdeen by this packet. In this proposal Portugal offers to reduce the import duty on Newfoundland cured fish from 16 to 8 reaisons the quintal, and upon woollen goods generally to duties which will average about 35 per cent. ad valorem. In both respects Lord Aberdeen's wishes are so satisfactorily met that the result must be an immediate and gratifying conclusion of this long-pending negociation. A drawback will be conceded in favour of Portuguese enterprise, if any really valuable fishing speculations should be conducted here, and the duty retained upon our woolen manufactures will, with the various charges of agency and transport, be an abundant protection to the bona fide productions of Portugal. The interests of both countries will thus be reconciled. The reduced tariff will in all human probability be in active operation, early in April.

The Deputies on Friday carried by a majority of 80 the Finance Minister's project for raising 900 contos on the proceeds of the Tobacco Contract for the next three years. On Saturday they voted the "speciality" of the same project. On the same day the Ministerial Bill of Indemnity was carried in the chamber of Peers by a large majority.

The inundations in Riba-Tejo have been of the most disastrous description. They have extended to every part of the kingdom.

Advices from Oporto, received on Tuesday morning, announce great ravages in the vineyards bordering the river.

AMERICA.—By the arrival of the packet-ship George Washington at Liverpool, on Tuesday, we have papers and letters from New York of the 27th ult. The Senate of the United States had passed the bill brought forward by Mr. Linn, for the occupation of the Oregon territory, a result which was not at all anticipated, and which produced a corresponding degree of surprise. The arrogance displayed in the discussion of the measure, and the narrow division in the Senate, where something like cool and dispassionate conduct was expected, has excited a very strong feeling of indignation; and, were it not the belief that the veto of the President will be interposed, should it become necessary, such presumption bids fair to set the whole kingdom in a flame. The bill was carried by a majority of twenty-four to twenty two, after much discussion. Mr. Calhoun energetically opposed the measure

The Court of Inquiry had made their report on the Somers mutiny case, and express their approval of the conduct of Commander McKenzie, who, however, is undergoing the ordeal of a trial by court-martial, which was proceeding when the last accounts left. The trial was to last three days each day being, whether charges and specifications were presented against and to the prisoner before the execution. The judges had refused any counsel to be present on behalf of Spencer's relatives.

CANADA. From Canada there is no news of interest. Sir Charles Bagot had again experienced a relapse, and no hopes were entertained of his recovery.

MEXICO AND TEXAS.—By the arrival of the schooner Doria at New Orleans, from Metamoras, advices had been received confirming the intelligence brought by the steamer Neptune of the division of the Texian army under Colonels Fisher and Green had been captured at Meier. The Mexicans report their loss during the engagement at 420 killed and 130 wounded. Gen. Ampudia returned to Metamoras, the 21st, with his army, having with him 213 texian prisoners, including Colonels Fisher and Green.

THE WEST INDIES. DREADFUL EARTHQUAKE.—By the arrival of the Royal Mail Steam Navigation Company's packet Forth, at Falmouth, on Saturday afternoon, we received the mails from the West India colonies and the Gulf of Mexico. The following are the dates in consecutive order:—Port-au-Prince the 11th, St. Kitts's the 20th, Vera Cruz the 26th, Dominica the 28th, Trinidad and Barbadoes the 31st January. Copy of the 1st, St. Lucia and St. Vincent's the 2nd, Demerara the 3rd, Jamaica the 4th, St. Jago de Cuba the 5th, Cape Haytien and Havannah the 6th, Nassau the 9th, and Bermuda the 16th February.

The Forth brings the fearful tidings of an earthquake which occurred at St. Thomas's on the 8th ult.; and although no very serious damage to property, and no loss of life, are reported from the West India colonies at this there, it is much feared that at Montserrat and other islands serious accounts will be received by the next steamer. Subjoined will be found the most detailed particulars of this alarming event—Copy of the 1st, from Lieutenant R. J. Fayrer, R. N., to his Excellency the Governor of Bermuda.

"Royal Mail Steam Ship Forth, 14th Feb., 1843, off Bermuda.—Sir,—I think it expedient you should be in possession of circumstances that have recently occurred, and the intelligence conveyed to you as correctly as possible, as no doubt there will be vague reports on foot which may tend to alarm (and perhaps with much reason too) those who have friends in the West India Islands. An earthquake, I fear of great violence, has visited the 8th of February, at 10h. 30m. A.M., I was sitting at table with Mr. Cosmic, of the Colonial Bank, at St. Thomas's, his private house being on a declivity half way up the highest part of the town. We were suddenly surprised by a confused sound, very much resembling the action of a strong draught of one of the large steamer's flues with the door shut, attended by a hissing sound. Our first impulse was to fly to the balcony, from whence there would have been no escape, nor indeed from any part of the premises, had the house fallen. Everything was on the move, glass windows in our house and those in the one above us rattling, and plaster falling off. The streets immediately under us presented an extraordinary scene, people rushing out of their houses, many out of the lower windows, to escape, wringing their hands and crying in all directions, many fainting. This lasted full three minutes; the shock (rather vibration) came, not perpendicular, but horizontal; then a perfect calm. All business suspended, and frightened inhabitants hastened to the open ground, the Parade Ground, at their respective places of worship, for their escape from destruction. I cannot say, that personally, I felt any great alarm, though much startled at the effect, and from the motion did not conceive that anything very serious would occur nor has there, beyond much fright. A ball was to have been given that evening, but was suspended. The ships at anchor in the harbour felt the shock very plainly, and those in the offing were below at the time of the fall of the sea was the cause. A French brig coming to St. Thomas's, off Tortola, felt the shock so severely he thought that the vessel had struck on a rock. The Spanish man-of-war corvette Cubana came in from the westward, and though close in to the west end of St. Thomas's, did not feel any shock. I regret it is much to be feared serious calamities may have occurred amongst the islands to windward. A vessel arrived from St. Kitt's this forenoon, and Custom House were fallen, but no mention of any loss of life. On the following day, at eight A.M., arrived the royal mail steam-packet Thames, Captain Philip Hanks, from whom the following particulars were gathered:—

"Captain Haste says the Thames was brought up as if on a reef of rocks, to his own dismay, and the dismay of all on board, and continued for a short period to jump and kick, as if mounting the rocks. His attention was called by a passenger exclaiming 'Heavens! look at the land!'—all was enveloped in a cloud of dust—the shock had passed. Many declare the moment before they saw large houses standing (supposed the barracks on the ridge), but after the shock no houses were to be seen, but many soldiers running about the vicinity. Mountserrat continued, as the Thames passed, covered in a cloud of dust. God only knows the fate of the islands to the eastward. I sadly fear we are to hear of something dreadful. The Actæon, royal mail steam-packet, was to have sailed for England on the day the Forth left St. Thomas's, and it has been thought proper to send her up, and St. Kitt's and Nevis to Antigua, to know the result, and by so doing, carry home from thence the real state of things. The admiral was to sail on the 8th instant for Antigua and Barbadoes, but Captain Thomas has no doubt he was at sea.—I have the honour to be, your Excellency's obedient servant, R. J. FAYRER, commanding the Forth."

In a subsequent letter received from the commander of the Forth, he states that Tortola had not suffered; but that a vessel, arrived from St. Kitt's, reported that the Custom and Court Houses were both destroyed.

The Royal Mail Steam-packet Company's ship Actæon, homeward bound, on the arrival of the news at St. Thomas's, was forthwith despatched to gather particulars of this awful visitation, and to proceed from Antigua to England direct with the same in order to afford full information on the subject, and to relieve as far as possible the public anxiety.

FURTHER PARTICULARS.

The West India Company's steamer Actæon arrived at Falmouth on Tuesday, and landed the mail and, after taking coals, she proceeded immediately to the eastward.

The Actæon left St. Thomas's on the 11th of February, St. Kitt's and Nevis on the 12th, and Antigua on the 13th. Passenger, Lieut. Mullman, of the 33rd regiment. She was despatched from St. Thomas's to Antigua to ascertain in her way, and also at that island, the amount of damage sustained by the late awful visitation of earthquake. It is a matter of congratulation and thankfulness to almighty God, that although much property has been destroyed the loss of life has not been comparatively great.

FROM ST. KITT'S.—The island very sadly injured; many of the largest houses in stones, and the streets choked with ruins. The church must be pulled down. The sugar works destroyed. A part of the Brunsinne Mountain torn away. The old volcano emitted smoke. Two lives lost.

FROM NEVIS.—The destruction terrible. The Court-house, the Custom-house, and other large establishments in ruins; others must be taken down. Happily no lives lost, but all the mills much damaged or shattered to pieces.

FROM MONTSERRAT.—The shock lasted three minutes and a half, and the like destruction of the sugar works on the estates, and of several of the large houses in the town, was evidenced here as the further effect of the terrible and tremendous awful visitation. Six lives were lost. All business suspended at the islands, and a day of thanksgiving had been ordered by the respective governors.

We have received the following from a correspondent at Antigua, relative to the earthquake at that island, which will be read with deep interest:—"There was nothing remarkable in the atmosphere on the morning of the 8th of February; the sun was shining hot and bright, and the sky nearly without a cloud. The wind was moderate from the east rather exceeding the usual quarter, N.E. The only thing that could be noticed was a deep purple haze, which is certainly rather unusual at this time of the year, hanging over the distant mountains in the interior of the island. Little man had fallen at Antigua for some time past, and the earth in consequence was parched up. About 23 minutes before 11, A.M., I was on the quarter-deck of her Majesty's ship Rose, which lay at anchor in the finest bay in English Harbour, taking in coals. The men, women, and children of the Royal Arsenal were on shore in the dockyard, enjoying themselves cooking, playing, and singing, when suddenly I felt a rumbling in the bowels of the earth, and the coal-yard vibrate to and fro, and the smooth surface of the dockyard undulate like a carpet under which the wind has crept; the huge steam-ship quivered from stem to stern, and I rather reeled on deck, for the great difficulty I could keep on my legs. On turning my eyes up the harbour, I saw Monk's-hill toppling from its summit, and enveloped in a cloud of dust. The water at the same moment rushed from the shore in a white mass of white substance rose as if thrown up from the bottom. How shall I describe the terror and consternation that in a moment seized upon those persons who were on the wharf; some ran on board the Dee from all directions, endeavouring to scramble up her sides; others in their distraction threw themselves into the sea, even some of the sailors jumped into the sea; but, providentially, no accident occurred to any one. The cries of the wharf and the vessel, I can never forget while I shall never forget the horror that was depicted on the countenances of all—each gazing at the other in blank and terrible dismay. I can remember one thought that darted through my mind—the earthquake in Chili flashed across my mind—should the sea rise! Horrid was the idea; but that in a moment gave way to the fear that the men climbing the sides of the ships would get jammed between the sides of the wharf and the vessel, as she was rolling with violence. The only sound that can convey the slightest idea of the noise which accompanied the shock is that of a heavy steam-carriage passing swiftly by in a hollow way; and the sensation like a grinding on a coral rock. As I was in the act of going on shore I looked again at a timepiece in the captain's cabin, and found the hour to be twenty minutes to eleven. Allowing for the time it was on board the ship the shock and after, I should say its duration was not more than one minute and thirty seconds at the most. Had it continued longer not one stone would have been left upon another in the whole island. The direction of the vibratory motion was perceptible from the N.E. to S.W., and, as far as my senses, highly wrought as they were for the time, can allow me to judge, there were six vibrations between the gates of the wharf and the vessel, a distance of about 200 yards. Nothing that I afterwards saw of the effects of the earthquake gave me so great an idea of its power as this. The barracks on the ridge of the hill appeared entire in every respect, as did Shirley Heights, the partition walls had fallen in, burying everything in the ruins. The hospital, built of iron, has suffered very trifling damage; but all the small buildings, such as stables, &c., are a complete mass of ruins. The powder magazine at the Block-house is split from top to bottom. The batteries at Shirley Heights have suffered very much, the soil and rock having given way below. Some of the guns were skewed right round, and the piles of shot thrown down. One thing I must not forget to mention. There was a soldier in solitary confinement in the cells, who could not escape. What must have been the thoughts during the shock! Those few moments must have seemed to him a century. At about half past six at night there was another shock, but very slight. The soldiers, however, were so much alarmed that they could scarcely be persuaded by their officers to return to their barracks, not having a sufficient number of tents to encamp the whole of the detachment. The day after I rode into St. John's. Here and there huge masses of rock, of many tons weight, had tumbled from the hills through the cane-pens, forming a clear way of the road. The sea and it is feared that a sufficient number of mills, even of a temporary nature, cannot be got ready to make the sugar before the canes rot. An enormous quantity of wine and other goods was washed away. The loss of life is not been proportionate to the damage done. Seven persons are known to have perished; but many accidents of a serious nature have taken place. Had not the awful visitation happened in the night many lives undoubtedly would have been lost."

Accounts have been received from Barbadoes, where the shock was slight. From St. Thomas's the same report is received. At St. Kitt's the shock had been very severe, though not so bad as at Antigua. Nevis, Montserrat, Saba, and Eustatius have all suffered in a greater or less degree. It is greatly feared that the chain of islands of St. Lucia, Martinique, Dominica, and Guadaloupe have also been visited, as at the latter island a volcano was distinctly visible emitting dense volumes of smoke; and, from the direction of the shock, and its having been felt so severely at Antigua, and slightly both at St. Thomas's and Barbadoes, it appears that its centre must have been Guadaloupe.

There is no truth whatever in the report that the entrance of the English Harbour is blocked up, Lieut. Jenkins, commanding her Majesty's brigantine Griffon, having carefully sounded the whole of the harbour, and found no change in the bed, except one spot near the wharf. Her Majesty's steamer Dee, and the company's steamer Actæon, have both passed out since.

The Forth was prevented touching at Fayal, in consequence of the violence of the weather. She brings twenty-two passengers, and on freight 307,597 dollars, 1867 ounces of gold, and 227 serons of cochineal. She also brings 20,000 dollars on account of the Mexican dividends.

The following are the names of the passengers by the Forth:—Colonel Arabin; E. Jackson, Esq., Attorney-General, Trinidad; Captain Charlewood, R.N.; Captain Wright, R.N.; Lieutenants Pretyman and Futnell, 52nd Light Infantry; Major and Mrs. Gossett, Mr. and Mrs. Colquhoun, Mr. Macfarlane, Monsieur Quetier, Lieutenant Stephens, 28th Regiment; Mr. Grant, Mr. Charles Hadwen, Mr. Cabot, Mr. Blake, Baron de Huxell, Mr. Buscan, Mr. Donnall, Mr. Turnbull, Mr. Green.

Captain Charlewood and Captain Wright, of the British navy, mentioned above, held commissions in the Mexican service, and have returned by the Forth, in compliance with orders from this country. Her Majesty's ships Warspite and Pique were at Jamaica. Her Majesty's ship Illustrious (flag of Sir Charles Adam), Orestes, Pilot, and Tweed, were at Barbadoes, with the Firebrand troop-ship. The troops at Jamaica were very healthy, and in the mountain cantonments.

The royal mail-steamer Medway had brought the Mexican mails to Bermuda on the 14th of February, and afterwards sailed for St. Thomas's.

The iron steamer Montezuma, belonging to the Mexican Government, left Vera Cruz with about 1500 troops for Yucatan on the 20th of January, accompanied by a schooner and some transports, and it was confidently expected that Campeachy would speedily surrender. The eruption of the party of Texians into Mexico, and the subsequent capture of 270 of them, after passing the river Bravo del Norte, all of whom were immediately put to death, is confirmed by this arrival. Santa Anna was at his country-seat at Manzo de Clavo, and was expected to be speedily proclaimed dictator. His wife became insane in consequence of the illness. Mr. Pakenham, the British minister, would quit his post by the next steamer, leaving Mr. Ward as chargé d'affaires. The new tariff was being rigidly enforced, and causing great dissatisfaction to the public.

The Earl of Elgin and family were in good health; and since the adjournment of the Assembly he had been sedulously occupied in devising arrangements for improving the discipline of the militia.

The rece pt of the conditional consent of Lord Stanley to the immigration from Africa created a great sensation in Demerara. The Court of Policy was immediately assembled, and the message from the Colonial Secretary read, after which the guarantee of indemnity required by the home Government was voted with unanimous cordiality. This resolution is transmitted by the return mail.

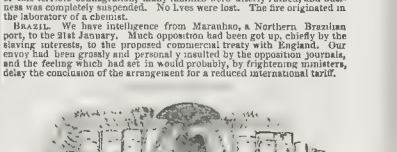
The accounts from Trinidad are very favourable, that crown colony contrasting with those under the government of local legislatures to great and manifest advantage. Emigrants continue to pour in from many of the other colonies, and the labourers appear universally well satisfied with their treatment.

The complaint is general and uniform respecting the irregularity of the arrival of the outward mails, but in this respect Demerara is still in the van.

In Jamaica, the principal topic of interest was the expected reduction of the duty on the import of foreign sugars to the mother country. From a source not named, they had learned by the last outward mail that the executive Government intended in the treaty with Brazil to propose a discriminating duty of 14s. per cwt. in favour of our own colonies, a rate which it is assumed will not be an adequate protection, except for a small portion of the most fertile districts, unless greater encouragement be given to the influx of labour from the coast of Africa. The prospect of the present year's sugar crop in Jamaica was very good, and strong efforts were making by the agricultural and scientific associations recently formed to stimulate production by introducing the most approved modes of culture, and machinery for expediting the manufacture of the staple article.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE AT PORT-AU-PRINCE.—The schooner Balius arrived at Falmouth on Saturday last from Port au Prince, and brings intelligence that a most destructive fire broke out in the richest part of that city, on the 8th of January. About 400 houses, chiefly consisting of shops and warehouses, containing a great quantity of valuable property, were destroyed. The damage is estimated at eight or ten millions of dollars. In consequence of this terrible conflagration, many families were utterly ruined, and business was completely suspended. No lives were lost. The fire originated in the laboratory of a chemist.

BRAZIL.—We have intelligence from Maranhao, a Northern Brazilian port, to the 31st January. Much opposition had been got up, chiefly by the slaving interests, to the proposed commercial treaty with England. Our envoy had been grossly and personally insulted by the opposition journals, and the feeling which had set in would probably, by frightening ministers, delay the conclusion of the arrangement for a reduced international tariff.



HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

Lord BROUGHAM gave notice that, unless the Lord Chancellor or the Lord Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench should bring forward a measure upon the subject of criminal committed on the parties were labouring under insanity, he would feel it to be his duty to bring forward the matter for their consideration.—The LORD CHANCELLOR said his attention had been directed to this subject, and he had already taken steps to acquire the requisite information, which he should communicate to the house as soon as it was obtained. He quite agreed with his noble and learned friend that the subject was one which called for consideration, and he would feel great pleasure in co-operating with him in framing some measure for legislative consideration.—Lord DENMAN felt the necessity of the matter being considered, but thought it far better that it should be taken under the care of the Government, than that it should be confined to anybody else. He could assure their lordships, that any assistance that could be given by the judges would be cheerfully afforded, and in his place, in their lordships' house, he would render all the aid in his power After various observations from Lord Campbell and Lord Brougham the matter dropped.—The Earl of SHAFTESBURY presented the report of the select committee on the Townshend peerage, which stated that no relief could be given to the petitioners except by a bill in Parliament, and recommending that a private bill for that purpose should be introduced.—Their lordships then adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

On the motion for the house resolving itself into a committee of supply, Mr. WALTER moved for an account of the sums expended in outport service for the poor during 1841 and 1842, and of work performed for such expenditure. The hon. member, he only regretted, had not moved for a committee on the Townshend peerage, which stated that no relief could be given to the petitioners except by a bill in Parliament, and recommending that a private bill for that purpose should be introduced.—Their lordships then adjourned.

pied the remainder of the evening.—The SPEAKER read the reply of Sir Gordon Bremer to the vote of thanks presented to him by the house for his services in China, which reply was ordered to be inserted on the journals.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

Lord TEYNHAM brought under consideration the question of the Poor-law, with the view of obtaining an abrogation of that portion of it which separates man and wife in our workhouses. He contrasted the principle acted upon by our ecclesiastical and civil courts of not allowing a divorce, even a separation a mensa, except on the ground of adultery or cruelty; and yet, in the face of such a law, the constant practice of the union workhouses was to divorce them practically for no other cause than poverty. Both parties were in fact imprisoned, and for an indefinite period—it may be for days and weeks, but it may also be for years, or even for life. It was to be observed, too, that the same treatment was in the workhouse applied to all; the drunkard or even the thief was treated precisely as the unfortunate woman for whom poverty had overtaken. He was not calling upon their lordships to express any opinion upon the general policy of the Poor-law; his only object was to prevent the separation of man and wife, and if their lordships were desirous of maintaining the Poor-law they ought to vote for the resolution he proposed, for by removing such a violation of all common sense and propriety from the law, its durability would be greatly increased.—The Duke of WELLINGTON in the exercise of his public duty felt himself called upon to oppose the motion. The noble lord had never said one word in the way of suggestion as to the way in which the proposition could be carried out. There was no such thing as divorce in the workhouses; there was only a separation of the sexes, for in the day time the members of a family might see each other as often as they wished. Officers in the army and navy were compelled to submit to separations of greater duration from their wives and families. A new measure had for some time been under consideration with a view to ameliorate some of the hardships of the existing law, and would be certainly brought forward this session probably before Easter. Under these circumstances he hoped their lordships would not agree to resolutions which bound them to nothing definite, and might fetter their better judgment when they came to consider the measure under the consideration of the Government. The noble duke concluded by moving, as an amendment, that the house do adjourn.—After some observations from Lords Lyttelton and Colchester on the analogy between the cases of officers of the army and navy when separated from their families, and those of persons entering a workhouse, for the officers might refuse to serve if they disliked to be separated from their wives and families.—The Duke of WELLINGTON said he might take the case of the seamen, which was quite in point.—Earl STANHOPE then proceeded to condemn the existing poor-law, and quoted the opinion of Mr. Pitt, who had made it the boast that he had steered the vessel of the state through the most fearful storm that ever had assailed it, by attending to the feeding and to the comforts of the people.—After some observations from Lords Lyttelton and Colchester the amendment of the Duke of Wellington was carried without a division.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

Mr. Boyd took his seat for Coleraine. Several private bills were advanced.—Lord PALMERSTON postponed his motion for papers respecting the Texas and United States' Treaty to Tuesday week.—Mr. FERRAND gave notice to move, on Thursday, for returns connected with the Halifax Union.—Dr. NICHOLL having stated that he could not postpone the second reading of the Ecclesiastical Courts' Bill, which stands for Friday, Mr. C. BULLER declared his intention of offering to its progress every interruption the forms of the house would allow.—Mr. GLADSTONE, in reply to Dr. Bowring, said the Government had no intention of altering the import duties on British manufactured goods in the Isle of Man.—Sir R. PEEL, in answer to a question from Mr. Mackinnon, on the subject of the plea of insanity, stated that at this particular juncture the utmost caution and deliberation were requisite before any measure, altering the law as it at present stands, would be introduced.—The Lord Steward delivered the following message from her Majesty in answer to the address on education:—"I have received your loyal and dutiful address. The attention of my Government had been previously directed to the moral and religious education of the working classes of my people. The assurance of your cordial co-operation confirms me in the hope that this blessing may be secured by legislative enactment."—Mr. F. MAULE moved for a committee to take into consideration the petition presented to the house by the commission of the General Assembly. The petition complained of two distinct grievances. First, that an infringement had been made on the constitution of the ecclesiastical Courts of Scotland, of which the General Assembly was the head, by the invasion of their rights and privileges by the Civil Courts. The second was the grievance of patronage, which was not new, but which had been constantly, from time to time, agitated. The hon. gentleman having entered at great length upon the subject, and detailed the numerous circumstances relating to it, concluded by asking for the committee to be appointed.—Sir J. GRAHAM would be ready to propose definite measures for the purpose of settling the question.—Sir J. GRAHAM thought the dominant party of the Church of Scotland were deeply responsible for the course they took on the question, at some length on the evils resulting from the conflict between the Church of Scotland and the civil power, and supported the motion. He called upon the house to interfere and avert the consequences which might ensue from the breaking up of so valuable and popular an institution as the Church of Scotland. Mr. COLQUHOUN stated an instance in which a pious, learned, and popular minister had been set aside by the Veto Act, by seven out of 1,200 communicants. He appealed to the clergy of the Church of Scotland to rest satisfied with the immense influence which resulted to them from having in their hands the education of the people, and not to raise a question which was uncertain in its results to themselves, which was productive of the worst consequences to the people, and the principles of which the House of Commons would never sanction.—Mr. J. M. STEWART charged Mr. Colquhoun with apostacy from opinions formerly delivered in a speech addressed to the electors of Kilmarnock, which speech the hon. member (Mr. Stewart) quoted, to the great amusement of the house. He contended that there was a marked distinction between the Church of England and that of Scotland. There was a distinction in the mode in which the Reformation in each country was effected, and that distinction led to one which prevailed to this hour. In England the Reformation was effected by the Monarch, against the wish of the people, while in Scotland the Reformation was effected by the people, in opposition to the Monarch. The consequence has been that the Church of England is monarchical, while the Church of Scotland is republican. The honourable gentleman then supported at great length the independent jurisdiction of the Church of Scotland.—Mr. G. Bruce moved the adjournment of the debate, which was immediately agreed to.—Sir J. GRAHAM then brought in a bill for regulating the employment of children and young persons in factories, and for the better education of children in factory districts.—Lord ASHLEY expressed his concurrence to the greater part of the bill, but hoped some further restrictions on the hours of labour would be adopted by the Government; if not he should certainly, when the proper time came, move an amendment to that effect.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—WEDNESDAY.

On Wednesday, the House of Lords did not sit.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

A new writ was issued for Tavistock.—In reply to Mr. Blackstone, Mr. GLADSTONE stated that 150 quarters of wheat had been imported last week from Holland, on a duty of 20s. a quarter, the remainder of the cargo, 1,000 quarters, still remaining in warehouse.—Mr. Hutt moved the second reading of the Foreigners Naturalisation Bill.—Sir J. GRAHAM thought that Mr. Hutt had failed in demonstrating that any practical inconvenience had arisen from the present state of the law, and he believed that the law afforded every reasonable facility to foreigners to obtain every privilege to which they could fairly lay claim. The only privileges from which foreigners were excluded were those of sitting in Parliament and at the Council. It was only reasonable that our Legislature should be composed of British subjects, he should, therefore, oppose the motion. The right hon. gentleman moved that the bill be read that day three months.—This amendment was carried without a division.—The Dogs' Cart Bill was read a second time.—The adjourned debate on Mr. Fox Maule's motion for a committee to consider the petition of the commission of the General Assembly of Scotland was resumed.—Mr. C. BRUCE opposed the motion, because, if the claims of the Church of Scotland were granted, the evils at present existing would be aggravated, the ancient purity of the church would be injured, and the interests of true religion would suffer.—Sir G. GREY was prepared to give his vote for going into the committee, and to follow that up by legislative measures, though he did not agree entirely in the propositions of Mr. F. Maule. To any resolution sanctioning the principle of non-intrusion, as established by the Veto Act, he would give his hearty concurrence. He would also concur in a motion for an address to the crown to grant its consent to the introduction of a bill. He felt, however, great difficulty as to the exclusive jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts, and therefore but, in the event of things which had arisen, he thought the house ought not to refuse to entertain the question.—Mr. S. WORTLEY dissented entirely from the motion. He never would consent to the house going into committee to consider a petition praying for the alteration, if not the total abolition, of patronage in the Church of Scotland.—Sir A. L. HAY assured the house, as the advocate of neither party, that if they refused this committee, and checked for ever legislation on this important subject, they would be doing a lasting injustice and a fatal injury to the people of Scotland.—Mr. A. COCHRANE thought it a sad spectacle to see the child of the law set itself up against the law—to see that body which was the creature of the state place itself in hostility to it. He hoped that the Government would adopt some measure which would have the effect of gaining the approbation of both parties. Nothing could be worse than the present uncertainty, but if the concessions asked were made, a most serious injury would be inflicted on the church itself.—Lord J. RUSSELL contemplated with the utmost anxiety so great a calamity as the secession of the clergy of the Church of Scotland hanging over a large portion of the people of this empire. The clergy had given the strongest proofs of their sincerity and steadfastness in the conscientious feelings they entertained. With every desire, however, to effect a settlement of the disputes unhappily existing, he could not vote for going into this committee, because he could see no advantage that could result from the adoption of any mere abstract resolution. Neither could he assent to the claims which had been put forth by the Church of Scotland. He believed that, while disposed of this motion, no declaration would be made by the Government which would preclude them from attempting hereafter some amicable arrangement by legislative means, should a favourable opportunity for so doing offer itself.—Mr. A. CAMPBELL had heard it asserted that the pretensions of the Church of Scotland should be extinguished; but he would tell the house that the principles of civil and religious liberty would never be extinguished in Scotland. He supported the motion.—The SOLICITOR-GENERAL entered into an able exposition of the statutes on which the Church of Scotland was established and regulated, and maintained that the principle of patronage was clearly acknowledged and recognised by them. It was undeniable that the church was attempting to act in defiance of the statutes on which it was founded, and were the house to acquiesce in the claims now made by them, they would be overruling the supremacy of the law. The General Assembly ought to have paid obedience to the law, as pronounced by the highest tribunal in the kingdom. The effect of the resolution proposed would be to put on record the opinion of the house as being that the statute of Anne was not binding, and that patronage in Scotland should be abolished. To these principles he could not assent, and therefore he should be obliged to vote against the motion.—Sir R. PEEL felt the full importance of this subject, and was well aware of the magnitude of the evil which threatened Scotland from the secession of the ministers of the established Church. A state of things never contemplated by law had arisen, a Church established by statutes at variance with the courts by which those statutes were interpreted. Two proposals had been made—one that patronage should be abolished, and the other that a definition should be attempted, by legislation, of ecclesiastical and spiritual power. He had the greatest doubt of the policy of abolishing patronage, and he could not anticipate the propriety of attempting to define the boundaries of civil and ecclesiastical authority. He refused to go into committee, because he did not think there was any probability of his agreeing in the views which would be there propounded by Mr. Maule, and not because, if he saw any prospect of a satisfactory solution of the difficulties that surrounded the question, he was not willing to legislate. A settlement might certainly be effected consistently with the privileges and rights of the Church of Scotland, but that could hardly be done if the present demands of that church were insisted on.—Mr. F. MAULE replied, and the house divided, when the numbers were—For the motion, 76; against it, 211; majority, 135. The Punishment of Death Bill was read a third time and passed.—Sir R. Peel laid on the table papers relating to the treaty with the United States of America.—Adjourned at two o'clock

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

Their lordships met at five o'clock.—Lord CAMPBELL, in answer to a question from the Earl of Clarendon, said that the treaty of commerce, properly so called, between this country and Portugal, was signed so long ago as the month of July last. By one article of that treaty the two Governments agreed to revise their tariffs, with the object of making them mutually beneficial. That negotiation had terminated, as the noble lord stated, as there did not appear to be any prospect of coming to any satisfactory understanding with the Portuguese Government. Fresh proposals had now been made by the Portuguese Government, certainly going considerably in advance of the views of her Majesty's Government, but in some quarters not unable at this moment to decide; the proposal had only arrived yesterday, and, till he had had an opportunity of consulting with his noble friend the President of the Board of Trade, and the matter had been maturely considered, he should not feel justified in giving a decided answer.—The Marquis of Cannicarde presented a petition from the London Missionary Society, praying the house to take measures to prevent the recurrence of the atrocities has those of the present Governor-General of India, in ostentatiously restoring a pagan temple.—The petition having been read by the clerk at the table, the Marquis of CLANRICARDE moved a resolution condemning the conduct of the Governor-General's proclamation on the subject of the gates of the Temple of Somnauth. The noble marquis said the Governor-General had no right to tell the people of India that professions of idolatry were unwisely and imperiously towards them. With regard to the gates of Somnauth, the conduct of the Governor-General was calculated to excite the jealousy of the Mahometan people in the minds of the East India Company, inasmuch as it encouraged the Hindoo worship, one of the most horrible and abominable idolatries of India.—The Duke of WELLINGTON defended the policy of Lord Ellenborough, and in the course he took an opportunity of condemning that of the late Government. He contended that the gates of Somnauth were a mere military trophy, and were altogether divested of anything like religious attributes. The noble duke concluded by moving the previous question.—Lord COLCHESTER opposed the motion, as did also the Bishops of LLANDAFF and CHICHESTER.—The Bishop of NORWICH said he should vote for the motion.—The Earl of CARNARVON acquitted Lord Ellenborough of any premeditated intention to encourage idolatry or superstition, but his conduct would have the effect of encouraging those evils.—Lord FITZGERALD (President of the Board of Control) opposed the motion, as did also Lord BROUGHAM, who vindicated the religious character of Lord Ellenborough, and defended him from the charges so industriously circulated against him.—The Marquis of Londonderry supported the motion, after which the house divided, when there appeared For the motion, 25; against it, 83; majority, 58.—Their lordships then adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

The Speaker took the chair at the usual hour.—Several private bills were introduced, and read a first time.—The Northern and Eastern Railway Bill was brought in and read a first time; also the Dean Forests Railway Bill.—Sir R. PEEL presented Mr. Hume's presented petitions from different places and societies complaining of the proclamation issued by Lord Ellenborough.—Mr. Vernon Smith, after presenting four petitions of a similar nature, proceeded, pursuant to notice, to move a resolution to the house with respect to the proclamation of Lord Ellenborough, and which was similar to that moved in the House of Lords by the Earl of Clarendon. The hon. gentleman considered that Lord Ellenborough's proclamation was in the highest degree impolitic, and tended to encourage idolatry in British India.—Mr. MACAULAY addressed the House at considerable length in condemnation of Lord Ellenborough, who, he said, had disobeyed the instructions sent out with him to preserve a strict neutrality.—Mr. HOGG opposed the motion, as did also Mr. ESCOTT.—Mr. HUME thought that Lord Ellenborough ought to be immediately recalled, not on account of a single error, but because of his whole proceedings.—Mr. C. WYNN opposed the motion.—Mr. PLUMPTRE condemned the conduct of Lord Ellenborough as indiscreet, and would oppose any censure.—Mr. HENRY GREY supported the motion, which was opposed in a spirited speech by Lord STANLEY, who said that the motion was brought forward for party purposes. Lord PALMERSTON regarded the conduct of Lord Ellenborough's proclamation was in the highest degree impolitic, and tended to encourage idolatry in British India.—Mr. R. Peel opposed the motion, and Lord John Russell would up the debate in an energetic appeal in its favour.—The house then divided, when there appeared—

The house then adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY.

Their lordships met at five o'clock.—Lord Beauchamp presented a petition praying for additional church accommodation.—The Bishop of Chichester presented petitions against the union of the Sees of St. Asaph and Bangor.—On the motion of the Earl of Rosebery a copy of her Majesty's warrant, appointing the Poor-law Commission in Scotland, was ordered.—Lord Brougham presented a petition from an individual named Rutt, complaining of the oppressive and illegal conduct of a justice of the peace, which petition bore testimony to the defective state of the naturalisation laws.—The Marquis of Lansdowne presented a petition complaining of the late proclamation of Lord Ellenborough, which petition was ordered to lie on the table.—Lord Chancellor laid on the table a report from the committee which had been appointed to inquire into the progress of the new houses of Parliament. The noble lord obtained leave to report from time to time.—On the motion of Lord Montegle, a return of certain imports of the precious metals was ordered to be laid before the house.—The Earl of Radnor presented a petition praying that the municipal charities of Ireland may not be placed under the Poor-law Commissioners.—Adjourned at half-past five.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY.

The Speaker entered the House at the usual time, but there being only 34 members present at four o'clock, the right hon. gentleman adjourned the house.

THREATENED ASSASSINATION OF THE QUEEN AND THE PRIME MINISTER.—On Thursday evening last one of the passengers who arrived in London by the steamboat Gazelle, from Hull, was taken into custody by the police on the charge of Captain Hyrst, in consequence of certain threats which he had indulged in during the voyage against the Queen and Sir R. Peel. He was ordered to be brought up before the Lord Mayor on Friday morning.

BRITISH GUIANA.

The following intelligence, having reference to British Guiana, arrived by the Demerara papers which came to hand on Tuesday last. It may appropriately precede our engravings and account of that colony.—

The Demerara papers, in noticing the return of the Chevalier Schomburgk from his expedition to define the boundary between the British and Brazilian territories, afford some particulars of the researches made by that gentleman and his companions. They had been absent about 13 months, having left Georgetown for the interior in December, 1841. The party proceeded direct to Pirara, whence they directed their course to the river Takutu, which they traced to its source. It appears M. Schomburgk regards this stream as the true line of boundary of the two countries, inasmuch as it forms a natural separation between them. He describes it as running through an extensive savannah, sluggish in its course, and so shallow that they were obliged to abandon the corials, and prosecute their course along the banks. Its course he states to be nearly parallel with the Rupununi, till it reaches the parallel of Pirara, where it branches off to join the Rio Branca, while the Rupununi tends to the Essequibo. In this river M. Schomburgk discovered some sniffing quantities of gold-dust. Three months were occupied in making this survey, when the party returned to Pirara, where they remained for about the same period, waiting the arrival of provisions and the setting in of the dry season. In September last the party again set out to explore the south-western boundary, and ascended the Cotinga river to its source at Roraima, a spot which M. Schomburgk had before visited in 1830, having then reached it by a different route. Here he discovered the sandstone hills, extending for about 10 miles in a westerly direction, and which rise abruptly, and in some instances quite perpendicularly, to the height of about 7000 feet above the level of the sea. The temperature at the base of this natural wall a little before sunrise was not above 51 or 51½ degrees. Another agreeable evidence was furnished of the temperature of the climate here by the abundance of blackberries and other wild fruits. The inhabitants of this region are Arecuna Indians, a collateral tribe of the Macousi, the language of the two bearing the same similarity to each other as Spanish does to the Portuguese. M. Schomburgk represents them as a strong and well-made race of beings, and of a warlike disposition. At this point the party separated. M. Schomburgk's brother and Messrs. Goodall and Frere returned to Pirara, while the chevalier, attended by three canoe-men and some Indians, struck across the country, traversing the savannahs and forests, to reach the Cayuni. In this journey our traveller informs us he fell in with several new botanical specimens. He also saw some hundreds of acres of plantains growing wild, and so luxuriantly that he represents some of the trees as being as thick as a man's body, and growing to the height of 40 and 50 feet. Suckers from these plantains Mr. Schomburgk had brought to Georgetown with him, expressing a wish that they should be cultivated, he being confident that the disease which so affects a large portion of the plantain on almost every estate where it is grown has never yet tainted these wild fields.

Guiana, or Guyana, formerly comprehended the north-eastern portion of South America, extending from the banks of the river Orinoco southward to those of the Amazon river. More than five sixths of this country are, however, now appropriated by Venezuela and Brazil, and form Spanish and Portuguese Guiana; whilst the remaining sixth comprehends the English, Dutch, and French settlements, and may, probably, cover a surface of about 100,000 square miles, or double that of England and Wales.

British Guiana, the most westerly and extensive of these settlements, participates largely in the character of a West India colony. It comprehends the countries extending from the Corantin river westward to the Orinoco, and from the sea-coast to the sources of the rivers Essequibo and Courantin; an area of, probably, 50,000 square miles. The English settled here in 1634, but in 1667 gave their possessions up to the Dutch, who retained them to the British by the treaty of 1814. Previous to 1831, the country was divided into three colonies, Essequibo, Demerara, and Berbice, upon rivers of those names; but in that year they were united under one government, and call d British Guiana.

There are six tribes of natives, besides several Carib tribes, some of whom are said to be cannibals. The Europeans are mostly descendants of Dutch settlers, but some are descended from English-men and Frenchmen. Three natives were brought to England in 1839 by Mr. Schomburgk, and were exhibited in Regent-street for several months. They were a Warrow, a Macusi, and a Paravi-hano, and formed part of Mr. Schomburgk's boat's crew during the last of his three expeditions into the interior of Guiana. The natives generally are much more civilised than the aboriginal tribes who inhabit the adjacent countries. They cultivate Indian corn, cassava, and some other roots, but are still attached to a wandering life. The Arawaaks visit the British settlements, where they cut wood for daily wages, and are preferred to the negroes as steady labourers. Some of the Indians are almost as fair as Creoles or Italians, while those who live near the sea-coast are of a very dark brown, sometimes resembling the yellow-skinned negroes. But the straight, strong, black hair, small features, and well-proportioned limbs, always distinguish the Indian from the African.

British Guiana is popularly known as the "Walter Raleigh's "El Dorado." The territory is, however, low, flat, alluvial, and in many parts swampy; and the greater portion, when it came into the possession of Britain, was covered with dense and almost impenetrable forests. Since that time, a prodigious improvement has taken place. British industry has cut down the woods, and, availing itself of the natural fertility of the soil, has rendered this one of the most productive regions of the New World. Demerara ranks, as to West India produce, second only to Jamaica; its rum is inferior only to hers; and the coffee of Berbice ranks above that of any of the islands. As the first crop fully pays the original cost of embanking and cultivating the soil, the tilled land in Guiana is rapidly increasing. Extensive savannahs afford good pasture, but the surface is mostly covered with trees and shrubs, and vast ferns, and fit for the growth of every kind of grain, and tropical product. The mountains rise from 1000 to 4000 feet, forming the land into great terraces. Of the Guiana rivers, the largest, the Essequibo, traverses nearly the middle of British Guiana: it is varied with cataracts and rapids, and its banks richly wooded, and fringed with luxuriant vegetation. The seasons are two dry, and two rainy. The heat is not so great as might be supposed, from the position of the country near the equator, and the lowness of the coast: the thermometer, even in summer, seldom rises above 90 deg., and the climate is more healthy than that of most places in the West Indies, whilst hurricanes, so destructive in the latter country, are unknown here. Few countries can be compared with British Guiana for vigour and luxuriance of vegetation: its stupendious trees produce cedar, mahogany, dye-wood, or fruits: three crops of Indian corn and two of rice are sometimes obtained in one year: the cho-cho, yams, sweet potatoes, and arrow-root; and the fruits, pine-apples, and the cocoa-nut: the latter grows wild, as well as the arnotto and castor-oil tree. The sugar plantations are scarcely inferior in extent to those in Barbadoes or Jamaica; coffee and cotton are much cultivated, and some spices have been introduced. Of the flora may be mentioned, the magnificent water-lily, Victoria Regia, the largest flower in the world, discovered by Schomburgk, in 1837, and named after our beloved Queen. The domestic animals are the same as in England. Among the ferocious animals are the jaguar and cougar; the armadille, agouti, ant-bear, sloth, and various monkeys and lizards are found here. The alligator and sea-cow are met with in the large rivers; the bats are twice the size of those in England; the snakes, including the boa constrictor, are numerous; the birds are of brilliant plumage, as parrots, macaws, humming-birds, flamingoes, &c.; some of the fresh-water fish are 15 feet long; and there are swarms of scorpions, centipedes, termites, &c.

Colonization has already advanced considerably in British Guiana. The residence of the governor is in Georgetown, formerly called Stabrook (pronounced brook), on the Demerara river. The streets are of wood, seldom above two stories high, and shaded by colonnaded porticoes and balconies, and roofs of red wood, resembling mahogany; and Venetian blinds, or jalousies, are used instead of glass windows. The wide streets are traversed by canals, and the roads are like wharfs, strewed with casks and bales. A well-appointed shop is shown in the engraving. The town contains about 10,000 inhabitants, of whom more than half are negroes, and some of considerable wealth. New Amsterdam, the capital of Berbice, extends about a mile and a half along the river Berbice, and each house has an allotment of a quarter of an acre, insulated by trenches; and the government-house, of brick in the European style, is one of the finest buildings in British Guiana. There are also a small church and a free-school. A newspaper is printed here: thus, in the Berbice Gazette, received last month, we read of an execution, on July 18, of a native bravo for murder, at which 4000 persons were present. A beautiful parapeted road, 60 feet broad, runs along the shore to Demerara.

but the lieutenant-governor is the executive. Besides a legislative council, chief justices, and judges, there are six "protectors of Indians" and sixteen special justices to watch over the execution of the slave emancipation law of 1834 on behalf of the apprenticed population; and the "compensation" paid was nearly a quarter of the twenty millions awarded by Parliament. The coins current in the colony are British half-crowns, shillings, and sixpenny pieces, besides colonial moneys of guilders, dollars, &c.; but there are no gold or copper coins in circulation. Accounts are kept in Dutch currency of guilders and stivers.

HIGHLAND DRESS.

Having in a former number given our readers a general description of the Highland dress and arms, we proceed to give them a more particular account of their fashions and peculiarities.

Almost one hundred years have elapsed since the Highlanders have had opportunity for such an imposing display in their native habiliments as on the late auspicious visit of her Majesty to her Scottish dominions; an occasion which formed a delightful contrast to the hostile gatherings of the '45. Assuredly, while so harsh a law against the dress remained in force, the manufacture of tartan being prohibited, and its use visited with the pains of felony, as a bond of rebellious confederation, it could not have been dreamt that it would ever become so popular, and that it should be considered worthy of adoption by the illustrious of this and other lands, and that the manners of a people should add to the royal pleasures, and their distinctive raiment meet the taste of a family whose right to the sovereignty was so strenuously opposed by the immediate ancestors of that people. This is the age of change, but all changes are not improvements, although, in matters immaterial to public or private advantage, innovations may take place without affording any substantial reason for objection.

National associations lead natives of Scotland not residing in the country to wear the time-honoured garb of their fathers. At home it is in keeping with their loved Caledonia, and abroad it serves as a passport for a Scot, and cherishes the warmth of attachment to the land of his birth. The celebrity which it has acquired from the military renown of the Highland troops, from the writings of the historian and fascinating productions of the novelist, with its own picturesque effect on the heath and in the hall, has induced others to honour the country by assuming it as an occasional fancy costume; and in this way deviations from correctness in dress, and rectitude of equipment, have arisen, whilst little positive authority was to be found for guidance in this long-dishonoured costume. It is very desirable, however, that it should be preserved from inappropriate and unbecoming variation inconsistent with its fitness and utility, its best and characteristic effect arising from its primitive simplicity. Attention to cut and colour, material, and mode of arrangement, being the very ground of that respect in which the Eididh Gaelach is held, as the original attire of "a peculiar people;" it is an eye-sore to those who are au fait in the mystery of its formation to witness the frequent incongruities which are exhibited, rendering a manly and graceful garb ridiculous, and sometimes even offensive to delicacy; and this is the more to be regretted as the recent progress of her Majesty in the Highlands may serve to perpetuate these inconsistencies. A change in manners would, in some points, render a departure from the strictness of antique observance of little importance, but an abandonment of old use and wont is intolerable to a Celt of the genuine breed. "Cheapside Highlanders" may figure as fancy may lead them, in a bal-costume, or masquerade, but innovations will not be quietly permitted by those whose virtue it is to abide by the practice of their venerated ancestry. The Highland costume has, moreover, borne the test of age, as being found admirably suited to the people, their country, and their occupations; in fact, it may be considered insusceptible of further improvement than the substitution of velvet or fine broad cloth instead of the native cath dath (ea da), and the enrichment of ornament. It is not meant to make objection to the taste evinced in the beautiful patterns from the northern looms; quite the contrary. It is of no consequence whether manufacturers call a successful pattern the Prince Albert, Victoria, or Peel; but our opinion respecting sundry novelties in "tartan heraldry," recently propounded in patterns of clan tartans, such as were never before seen or heard of, is very different. It is a manifest absurdity to wear the sword-belt over the plaid, but a dandy Highlander would never, of course, permit the richly chased buckles, pointings, and nondescript ornaments to be hid by the breacan, neither would he exchange his waving ostrich plumes for the strait unbending ones of the eagle. Beautiful as these foreign feathers are in the military it is a strange impropriety to place them in the bonnet of a Highland soldier. Mounting, or "cocking," a bonnet is a practice of very modern adoption; and that which has very unaccountably obtained the name of a Glengarry, being in no way peculiar to that district, is a recent fashion of trimming it, and is a specimen, in our opinion, of bad taste. The oldest form of it is that worn on Donside, and the Highlands of Banffshire, No. 1. and in that shape it is not an unpleasing variety; but the other, when stuck on the top of a stalwart Highlander's cranium, is a most ridiculous "pendicle," and our taste must be wrong, if artist can reckon it in any way characteristic or becoming. At Preston pans and Culloden the Highlanders pulled their bonnets down on their brows before rushing to the attack. There were no Glengarries there; these scrugs look as if a slight breeze would blow them from the apex on which they are stuck so awkwardly; and an old Highlander would have spurned a shape which offered no protection to the face from sun and rain. The modern Turkish head-piece is superior to it. The flat bonnet, moderately broad, was the only sort worn by the Gaël of former days.

The Earl of Aberdeen arrived on Saturday on a visit to the Marquis and Marchioness of Abercorn, at Stanmore Priory, accompanied by Lord C. Hamilton, who reached Argyll House on Thursday se'nnight from Vienna.

THE LATE EARL OF ATHLONE.—The mortal remains of the Earl of Athlone passed through the metropolis on Monday last for Holland, from Bath. The interment is to take place in the family mausoleum in the neighbourhood of Amerongen Castle, Utrecht. The Hon. Captain Frederick Villiers, and Colonel H. Bentinck have left for the Continent to attend the funeral obsequies.

FINE ARTS.

THE BLIND BOY AT ONE OF HIS PRANKS.

THE EXHIBITION OF THE BRITISH INSTITUTION.

The authority of precedents has exercised a most injurious sway over the minds of artists. The ancients have been followed to the neglect of nature, and the individual excellences of modern academicians have been servilely copied and repeated, to the manifest detriment of original observation, and that special manual dexterity by which its conceptions are pourtrayed. We are opposed to this "finality" system of art. Great works, whether of the ancient or modern schools, are to be studied for the purpose of discovering the principles on which their authors proceeded, and not, as is so generally the case, with a view of acquiring the style of practice which, in accordance with their own particular constitution of mind, they were led to adopt. Nature is the guide, her imitators are but models. Like the stars of heaven, luminous in themselves, but giving no light to the mariner who shapes his course by their respective altitudes, they should be attentively observed, but not followed. The artist's course should be his own. The Greeks had no precedents for their first-born divinities,—

> Those dead, but sceptred sovereigns, who still rule
> Our spirits from their urns.

The Venetians had no works of mortal harmony from whence they mingled colours for all time; the Gothic architects of the middle ages had no scholastic formulæ for the tight confinement of their genius in the erection of those glorious temples which it is the labour of this day to restore rather than to emulate. They were men untrammelled by authority, who busied themselves with the fitness of things, and, like Hogarth, Reynolds, and Wilkie, stamped the impress of their own minds, the aspect of their own age, upon their works. But what do we see in the present day? a host of imitators. The present curse of art, that which blights and paralyses native genius, is imitation. Wilkie invents a style,—a host follow him; he changes it,—the fashion of the multitude alters; he changes it again, he becomes dashing, spirited, historical—and his echoes are straightway the same. Does Turner pour out the sun-light of Italy upon his canvass, immediately the landscapes of England become effulgent with his selling atmospheres. Has Lawrence become "sweet" in faces, careless in hands, negligent in apparel, every needy portrait-painter in the land becomes Lawrence-like. An Ionian elegance is made to sit upon the clumsiest shoulders, and pervade the grossest features. Are particular subjects in vogue, scenes from "Twelfth Night," "Devil upon Two Sticks," "Don Quixote," why no one thinks of painting anything else. The sources of history seem to be dried up, and a wretched mannerism both of choice and style universally prevails. Now this is the very destruction of art; and it is one only which common sense can be expected to correct. Meantime, our exhibitions continue to give lamentable proof of the extent and virulence of the plague; repetition upon repetition succeed each other like the shadowy kings in Macbeth, each one resembling his predecessor, till, as Sir R. Westmacott has recently observed, "art returns as it were upon itself, and losing all its life and energy, becomes vapid and imbecile."

But "there is hope in Britain concerning this thing;" the sin is one of fashion, not of nature. Our history is rich in incident, picturesque in costume, noble in sentiment; our native land presents a surface of glorious variety, rocks and hills, vales and pasture. Our domestic life, our court pageants, our legislative exhibitions, abound with material for the employment of the very highest genius. The national mind is powerful, observant, imaginative, and capable of grasping the mightiest conceptions, or of executing the nicest details. All that is needed, is, that our young men should go forth in the broad world and think and act, as Chaucer and Shakspere and Barry did, for themselves. Nothing, it is said, can come of nothing; and as every mind has an individuality of its own, and can by no means become identical in its feelings with another, it follows that he who merely imitates or copies the style of a master draws, as it were, upon mere vacuity. In Scripture language, he sows to the wind and reaps confusion. Let the example of the shepherd-boy, afterwards the celebrated mechanical philosopher Ferguson, who always drew from nature in preference to copies, because she was so "powerful," so "distinct," so "easy to copy;" let his example be followed, and with even Raffaelle, Claude, or Ostade before us, we should have no fear of the result being otherwise than honourable for British art.

We have been led to make these remarks by the impressions we have received from a general survey of the works presented to the public in the exhibition of modern paintings at the British Institution. There are four hundred and thirty-one pictures; and the enormous number of upwards of four hundred and sixty are said to have been returned by the directors from want of room. Of this multitude of pictures it becomes us to speak with respect; for we are not disposed, with many critics, and the majority of visitors, to "trip it lightly," and despatch so interesting a sight as that which some three hundred men have done their best to furnish, with the flippant condemnation—"nothing worth looking at"—"shocking bad exhibition"—"nothing new," or worse. The pictures this year present, as a whole, no improvement and little variation on the established "sorts" of previous years. The older artists have repeated their ancient themes and recapitulated themselves, with their accustomed skill and epic peculiarities; but as these are well known to the public we shall not, at the present moment, as illustrators of London "News," indulge in any commentaries on their share of the catalogue. The younger men, however, claim an extended notice, and in some cases our hearty praise. Invention, founded upon original observation, and expressed in new and suitable methods of execution, are apparent in many of their works. The first of these performances in point of merit is No. 114, J. Goodall's "Rustic Music, Brittany." It represents the exterior of one of the picturesque cottages of the province, with its usual many-coloured accompaniments of lace-makers, knitters, grandams, and rejoicing children. Before these busy gossannes a couple of itinerant musicians are performing a pantomimic dance to the merry thumps of a tambourine and the whiz-whiz of a hurdy-gurdy. This is the simple subject: it could hardly be less simple, yet is it the most striking, beautiful, and, in every respect, perfect work of the exhibition. The figures are conceived with characteristic truth, their actions natural, and their drawing free and powerful: the boy who beats the tambourine is a poetical representation of rustic merriment; and the expression of the half Norman woman, who, as she knits, eyes askance his jolly pantomime, is so felicitously rendered as to demand our unqualified admiration.

NORMAN WOMAN'S HEAD.

The treatment of the picture is in a style of corresponding excellence. The colouring is rich, but chaste and nicely discriminated; and the touch throughout is broad, firm, and in everything indicative of a hand familiar with all the mechanical resources of its art, and capable, therefore, of generalizing the details of its subject and harmonizing its component masses. Mr. Goodall is, we are told, only three-and-twenty years of years of age. We give him joy of the future, for in this, his first great work, he has exhibited strong apprehension of human character, with much of the depth, the clearness, and refinement of Wilkie.

ARABIAN GIPSY-WOMAN'S TOILET.

Another work of great power, but placed most ungenerously in the second tier, is No. 246, Mr. Gilbert's "Education of Gil Blas." This artist is remarkable for the dramatic force of his compositions, the emphatic vigour of his chiaroscuro, the massive richness of his colouring, and an easy prodigal style of drawing which seems to play with the ordinary severities of the pencil. This picture is remarkably suggestive of these elements of a great painter; and we should be glad to see them devoted to some nobler subject than the self-willed boy of Oviedo.

A third picture of present excellence and glorious promise is No. 128, "The Blind Boy at One of his Pranks," J. P. Phillip.

> When Love came first to earth, the Spring
> Spread rose-beds to receive him.

But according to our painter it was a love-lorn swain who sent him on his first voyage. In this picture, which by permission we have engraved, "the gallant boy, who loves all times and seasons," is seen floating in his bed of roses down the gladsome current of a stream, till, like a second Moses, he is by "an undesigned coincidence" stopped in his career by a fair maiden, who, coming to the water-side, plucks the charmed flowers from the river's bosom, and planting them in her own, becomes an easy victim of the insidious foe. The drawing is graceful and the sentiment elevated. The figure of the urchin boy is nearly equal in conception to Sir Joshua's "Puck."

A fourth great work by a young man, and one with which we shall conclude our present illustrations, is No. 12, "The Toilet," by W. Fisher. In this picture we are presented with the portraiture of an Arabian gipsy-woman:—

> For dance, and love, and gipsy wile,
> Pride of the dusky band!

She is in the act of dressing her profuse ringlets during a fit of abstraction. The artist is a person of great classic attainments, and apparently disposed to adopt the strength rather than the elegancies of poetic fancy for the special occupation of his genius. This picture is moulded in the spirit of Guido's principal works, of which we should guess him to be a great admirer; and its execution has all the broad and plastic freedom of Horace Vernet, without his hard "batchetty" tone and inharmonious colours.

We have thus discharged a duty which we feel we owe to the British Arts, and shall return to the subject in a future number.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MARCH 11, 1843.

Lord Teynham, a young nobleman who has but lately inherited the peerage, and who made his first speech on Tuesday evening in the House of Lords, deserves some congratulation upon his entry into public life, less even for the modesty and grace of his deportment, although these were conspicuous, than for the Christian spirit and high principle with which he advanced the arguments of humanity, and directed them against one of the chief cruelties of the worst legislative enactment that England has had for many a long year to deplore. We need hardly say that we allude to the New Poor-law.

The evil of this law against which his lordship levelled a just and spirited censure, attacking it with resolutions admitting its infamy and proposing its subversion, was that which legalizes the separation of parents from children—of husband from wife—that shameful and unholy human defiance of the strong injunction from Heaven, "Whom God hath joined together let no man put asunder."

This separation clause, the great and paramount cruelty of modern legislation, has been the theme of the rebuke and abhorrence of all just and virtuous minds. It elicited the warmest opposition of some of our most distinguished living Christians when it was being piloted through the Senate by the stern, uncompromising heartlessness of political economy; and when it received the powerful but wicked sanction of law, and was forced into tyrannical practice, its inhumanity and brutality became more and more apparent, and confirmed the disgust and apprehension of the deploring community. Virtuous prelates, indignant noblemen, warm, free-hearted country gentlemen, well-disposed politicians, the trembling poor, and the un-trembling press, all raised their voices against it—some with eloquence, all with sincerity—and no single opponent, without a certainty of having truth, justice, and sympathy used against him as weapons of assault. Still, however, the hard mischief worked on; and although Lord Teynham has failed to overthrow it by his excellent resolutions of Tuesday night, yet the field is still open, and we trust will never be abandoned by society until the victory of humanity is achieved. When the Poor-law question is discussed in the Commons, a good opportunity will present itself for advocating the genial cause of kindred and brotherhood in that free arena of debate. In the meanwhile public opinion cannot be too strongly recorded upon the question.

The fact is, that the separation of husbands from wives, and parents from children, under the mockery of a pretended system of shelter and relief, cannot be defended by any man who admits the claims of the domestic affections, and the value of the human heart. Its doctrine can have no tenure within the sphere of morality, and religion opposes it with most holy and emphatic voice. Such divorces of kindred must be all unnatural; and poverty is not the crime for which, even as punishments, the world can assume a right to their infliction. It is not because necessity bows man to earth that you are therefore to rob him of the partner of his love, and toil, and woe—it is not because woman is crushed in hopeless penury and destitution that you are therefore to rob them of the love and clinging offspring from her caress. Because you build up a workhouse, you are not to exclude from it the feelings which God implants in us for cultivation, which virtue honours, nature nourishes, and love endears, as if those feelings were weeds of poison in the human bosom, and were to be extirpated with impunity from their true and tender soil.

Lord Teynham did not propose a bad alternative when, in his denunciation of the foul cruelty of the working system, he said—"If your doctrine of separation is to be set up in all despite—if you cry out that your object is morality, and that a separation of the sexes is requisite to that end—then limit your severity to the legitimate demands of that morality, receive no paupers into your workhouses but the unmarried, the widowed, the orphaned, and the lone; do not break up the ties of kindred with remorseless hardship, but pour your stream of charity into the desponding bosoms of families with a natural and humane modicum of out-door relief." This is the true and generous panacea—the balming cordial for which nature cries aloud.

In another part of Lord Teynham's speech a charge of inconsistency against the sanctioners of the present law was put in the form of an appeal to those very feelings and charities for which they were individually distinguished:—"He addressed their lordships as men who had a necessary care of the character of the law, and of its exercising a uniform, wise, and righteous influence on the people at large—that kind of influence which would create no insubordination or clamour. Doubtless many of their lordships sought to make the cottages of their tenants comfortable, and gave them suitable gardens and allotments of land, and presented them with prizes at horticultural societies, and, in a word, aimed at their domestic happiness in every way. How then, when they came to this house, could they maintain the operation of this law, which ran counter to all the other acts of their daily life? How could they, as men, take their position in this house, and assent to the operation of this portion of the Poor-law? Not one of them could, as an individual, go into a poor man's cottage and put before him and his wife the alternative of starvation or going into the workhouse." This was a point from which we can find no reasonable escape. How can we sanction the operation upon a great and wholesale scale of a principle at which we should revolt and shudder were we called upon to put it into individual practice? But, still more, if we have kindred, wives, children, shall we sanction the application of a cruelty in the families of others, which, if enforced (even without the accompanying horrors of privation and destitution) in our own would rend its branches with inconceivable anguish, and sting our bosoms with poignant and agonizing grief?

It seems, indeed, impossible to find in any corner of the human heart a fair excuse for this cruel clause of a generally bad enactment; and it is with a most earnest conviction that we are only recommending to the public a stern and bounden duty incumbent not only upon every husband and parent, but upon every man who can think and feel—that we urge all classes to bestir themselves by petition, remonstrance, and the expression of indignant opinion, to impress the Legislature with the necessity for abolishing at least this one blot upon the scutcheon of national humanity, and the purity and sympathy of the English heart.

MONDAY.—The Queen and Prince Albert enjoyed their accustomed walk in the forenoon in Claremont Park. The Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal were taken an airing in the grounds, accompanied by Lady Lyttelton. In the afternoon her Majesty and Prince Albert took a carriage drive in a pony phaeton. Sir Robert, Lady, and the Misses Gardiner had the honour of joining the royal circle at dinner on Sunday.

TUESDAY.—The Queen and Prince Albert walked in Claremont Park yesterday morning. His Royal Highness Prince Albert afterwards rode out on horseback for an hour, attended by Sir Edward Bowater. In the afternoon her Majesty and Prince Albert left Claremont for a drive in an open pony carriage.

The Queen and Prince Albert, accompanied by the Princess Royal, arrived in town at a quarter past four o'clock on Wednesday afternoon, in a carriage and four, escorted by a party of Hussars, from Claremont. His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, accompanied by the Dowager Lady Lyttelton, followed in another carriage; and the Earl of Warwick, Lord in Waiting; Colonel Buckley, Groom in Waiting; and Major-General Sir Edward Bowater, Equerry in Waiting on Prince Albert, occupied another royal carriage. Her Majesty and the Prince were received at Buckingham Palace by the Hon. Miss Lister, Maid of Honour in Waiting; the Lord Steward, the Master of the Horse, the Vice Chamberlain, the Master of the Household, and Captain Hood, Groom in Waiting. The royal standard was displayed from the marble arch immediately on her Majesty's arrival.—Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, Lady Fanny Howard, and the Earl of Liverpool joined the royal dinner party at Buckingham Palace in the evening.

The venerable Elizabeth Whitbread, sister to Earl Grey, and her family, have been placed in mourning by the demise of the Hon. Mrs. Witham Waldegrave, wife of the Hon. Captain Waldegrave, R.N., uncle and heir presumptive to Earl Waldegrave. The deceased lady was sister to the lady of the Speaker of the House of Commons (Mrs. Shaw Lefevre), and was married to the Hon. Captain Waldegrave in 1812.

The Hon. Francis Charteris, M.P. for East Gloucestershire, has been suffering from a long and severe attack of ague and fever at Naples, which has been the sole reason of his absence hitherto from his parliamentary duties.

Her Majesty the Queen Dowager received visits on Saturday at her residence, Marlborough-house, from their Royal Highnesses the Duchess of Kent, the Duchess of Gloucester, the Duchess of Cambridge, and the Princess Augusta.

CATCH CLUB.—The noblemen and gentlemen, members of this club, commenced their convivial meetings at the Thatched House, St. James's-street, on Tuesday last.

The health of the Hon. E. Stanley has improved during the last few days. We understand her Majesty has sent daily to Lord Stanley's mansion, in St. James's-square, to learn the state of his lordship's only son.

FIRES IN THE METROPOLIS.—A fire broke out on Monday evening at seven o'clock in the Caxton letter foundry, the property of Messrs. Wilson and Co., Duke Humphrey's court, Old Bailey. Two engines got into operation, and in a short time allayed all fears of the extension of the flames. The fire broke out near the counting-house. The building was injured, and some of the stock damaged.

EAST INDIA HOUSE.—On Wednesday a special general court of proprietors was held, for the purpose of receiving documents relative to the recent operations in Afghanistan, and also the resolution of thanks adopted in consequence by the Court of Directors. Sir J. L. Lushington, the chairman, opened the question on the resolution of thanks, by entering into a long explanation of the state of affairs during the period of Lord Ellenborough's arrival there, and detailed at great length the misfortunes that attended the disastrous retreat of the British troops from Cabul. The resolutions, which were seconded by Mr. Colton, were carried with one dissentient, and the court adjourned.

IRELAND.

SPIRITS IN IRELAND.—A parliamentary return published this week shows that there were taken out for home consumption in the various collections of Ireland, in the respective years ending 5th January, 1841, 7,401,396 gallons; 1842, 6,483,443 gallons; 1843, 5,290,850 gallons; showing a decrease in the consumption of the year ending Jan. 5, 1843, compared with 1841, of 2,110,491 gallons; and as compared with 1842, of 1,194,793 gallons. A return of the detections and number of persons prosecuted during the same period, for offences connected with illicit distillation, exhibits the detections in 1841 to have been 1004; in 1842, as 881; and in 1843, as 1895. The persons prosecuted were—in 1841, 379; in 1842, 308; in 1843, 664. The numbers convicted were, in 1841, 302; in 1842, 228; in 1843, 478. The number of persons confined in the respective gaols of Ireland for the before-named offences, on the 5th day of January, in 1841, were 46; in 1842, 53; and in 1843, 225.——The seizures made by the revenue police in Ireland from the 11th Oct. 1842, to the 5th of January, 1843, were—8961 heads of malt, 290 stills, 3664 still-heads, 183 worms, 3514 vessels, 528 gallons of illicit spirits, 644 gallons of plain spirits, 46,587 gallons of potale, 1400 gallons of singlings, 35 horses, 20 carts, and 452 lbs. of tobacco.

There are at present sixty persons confined in Donegal gaol charged with illicit distillation. A country paper observes—"Might it not be advisable to employ the constabulary, who appear to have nothing to do, in checking the progress of this illicit traffic, which is daily increasing? They could be employed in aid of the revenue police to scour the country occasionally, instead of allowing them to foster and encourage it."

POSTSCRIPT.

Friday Evening.

THREATENING TO SHOOT THE QUEEN AND SIR R. PEEL.

MANSION-HOUSE.—FRIDAY.

James Stevenson, a native of Scotland, was brought before the Lord Mayor, charged with using threatening language respecting her Majesty and Sir Robert Peel. It will be seen by a paragraph elsewhere that the prisoner was given into custody on Thursday night by Capt. Hurst, of the Gazelle steam-packet, in consequence of his having often stated, during the voyage from Scotland, that he was going to London to have an interview with Sir Robert Peel, to whom he had written several times, but had not received any answer; and that he considered the Queen, in consequence of her sex, was an improper person to rule a nation, and he would put a stop to it. Information of the prisoner being apprehended was immediately forwarded to the Government, and instructions were given that the prisoner should be examined before the Lord Mayor at the Mansion House at two o'clock.

The following is a copy of the charge, as entered in the police-sheet:—"James Stevenson, aged 29, a native of Belfries, in the parish of Lockerbie, threatening to shoot the Queen and Sir Robert Peel."

A few minutes past two o'clock Mr. Maule, Solicitor to the Treasury, entered the justice-room, when the Lord Mayor ordered the prisoner to be placed at the bar.

The Lord Mayor: What is your name?—Prisoner: James Stevenson. I am 29 years of age. I am a native of Renfrewshire. I am a weaver; but done little in that business for three years past.

The Lord Mayor: What have you been doing the last three years?—I have been studying the Bible and the Greek Testament, and other works.

The Lord Mayor: Did you belong to any society?—Prisoner: No. I left the Church of Scotland in consequence of the differences which existed.

The Lord Mayor: What brought you to London?—Prisoner: To see Sir Robert Peel, in hopes that some union in the church might be accomplished.

The Lord Mayor then asked several questions as to the route the prisoner came to London, which he answered in a manner an incoherent manner.

The Lord Mayor: Did you intend to shoot the Queen, in consequence of her sex, was that what he was at Manchester, but he could not say where he stopped at. He walked from Manchester to Hull, but did not know how many days he was doing it. When he left Scotland he had only one guinea in his pocket; and never been in London before.

The Lord Mayor: What did you come for?—Prisoner: To see Sir Robert Peel.

The Lord Mayor: What did you mean to say to Sir Robert Peel?—Prisoner: That it was time to look to me; but I should certainly ask him to dissolve the Union, and protect the true religion which, as a servant of Christ, he is bound to do. And, said the prisoner, holding up his hands, "As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord."

The Lord Mayor: How do you think of supporting yourself in London?—Prisoner: By living sparingly. I intended to go to Sir Robert Peel's as soon as I found out where he lived. If I had not been able to see him I should have gone back again. I have travelled to many places to find out true men.

The Lord Mayor: Do you wish to see the Queen?—Prisoner: Yes; I should like to see her very well, and to see what height she is. I must think no woman ought to sit on the throne, as the Scripture says—"Woman, obey your husband in all things;" and therefore there ought to be a king on the throne.—The prisoner then proceeded, in a most incoherent manner, to quote passages of Scripture.

The Lord Mayor: Are you a married man?—Prisoner: Yes. Mother knew that I was coming to London. I had never been away before.

John Hewitt said he lived at Hull. When the prisoner booked his place to come to London, he said no woman ought to take the reins of government, that the Queen must be destroyed, and a man must be placed on the throne.

The Lord Mayor: Do you hear what the witness says, prisoner?—Prisoner: Yes; I said if she would not resign her office she must be destroyed, by so doing he was only doing God's will.

Witness continued: Prisoner on the passage said, if Sir R. Peel would not dissolve the Union, he must be destroyed, and he was determined to do it.

The Lord Mayor: Is that true, Stevenson?—Prisoner: Yes, and it is not by my intention destroy Sir Robert Peel, but it is also the duty of every Englishman to assist me.

The Lord Mayor: Who have you been hearing preach of late?—Prisoner: Oh, no one. There is no one in Scotland able to expound the Scriptures now. When I go back to Scotland I intend to expound the Scriptures, and expose the malignity of the human race.

Captain Hurst stated that he was captain of the Gazelle. The prisoner came on board at Hull; he said he was going a long passage to see Sir R. Peel and the Queen—he was determined to see them. I asked him how he thought of seeing them? He replied, "There is plenty of people who will point them out to me, and I am determined not to leave London without finishing them."

Prisoner: Yes, that is true; I want to lay the axe to the root of the tree.

The Lord Mayor: What papers do you generally read?—Prisoner: I think it is the Herald. Inspector Shaw produced a number of papers found on the prisoner.

The Lord Mayor: Have you any money?—Officer: He has 9s. 3d., my lord.

The Lord Mayor: Well, Stevenson, you cannot live long in London on that sum; neither can you get back to Scotland with the money you have, and therefore to take care of you, I shall send you to the Compter for a week; and some gentleman shall call and see you. Would you wish your friends to be written to?

Prisoner: No, my lord; my father holds me bad beyond correction.

After some further questions his lordship remanded the prisoner until next Friday. His lordship directed that he should be placed in the infirmary of the Compter, and not to mix with the other prisoners. As the prisoner was leaving the bar he wished to have a Bible restored, which was taken from him yesterday.—The Lord Mayor: Certainly, and you shall be taken proper care of.—The prisoner was then conveyed to the Compter. A more decided case of aberration of mind has never been presented to public notice. There cannot be a doubt that the unfortunate man is a lunatic.

His Royal Highness Prince Albert visited her Majesty the Queen Dowager on Thursday, at Marlborough House. The Prince was attended by Sir Edward Bowater.

The Royal dinner party at Buckingham Palace included her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, Lady Fanny Howard, Lord Charles Wellesley, and Sir George Couper. Her Majesty's private band was in attendance at the palace during the evening.

The Lord Mayor has appointed the Hon. Miss Devereux, as one of the Maids of Honour in waiting on the Queen.

On Thursday morning a dreadful accident occurred at the foundry of Sir John Reynolds and Co., in Holland-street, Blackfriars-road, to a man named James M'Cay, 45 years of age. He was employed, with several others, in removing a large iron plate weighing upwards of 25 cwt., when the chain which supported it snapped, and it fell upon the unfortunate man. Upon being extricated it was found that his left thigh was fractured, besides being otherwise severely injured. He was conveyed to Guy's Hospital in a state of great suffering.

DEATH OF SIR JAMES WEMYSS MACKENZIE, BART.—We regret to state that accounts have reached town from Scotland of the demise of the above venerable baronet.

BOULOGNE AND CALAIS.—The number of passengers who embarked or disembarked at these two ports during the week ending the 2nd of March was according to the following proportion:—By way of Boulogne, 569; by way of Calais, 179.

The Portuguese Minister transacted business on Thursday at the Foreign Office. Mr. W. E. Gladstone had an interview with Sir Robert Peel on Wednesday.

The Prince de Chimay, the elder, died on the 1st inst. at Toulouse, where he had gone to direct a suit commenced by the Canal du Midi, of which he was one of the largest proprietors, against the government.

RESISTANCE TO POOR-RATES.—Four or five thousand persons attended a suit of cattle distrained for non-payment of poor-rates in the country of Tipperary, a few days since, but not a single bidder could be found. The cattle were returned to their owner, who drove them home in triumph.

The Sultan has refused, it is said, to consent to the revocation of his acts, as solicited by the Czar.

Dr. Langston was on Thursday elected a physician of Westminster Hospital, in place of Dr. Burne, resigned.

BRIGHTON.—On Wednesday afternoon, as one of the Brighton "hog" boats was engaged trawling in the Channel, she was run down by an East Indiaman, and completely cut in two. The crew, consisting of two men, succeeded in catching hold of part of the wreck, but not the slightest assistance was rendered by the men on board the Indiaman. One of the men was nearly exhausted, and told his companion he must soon let go his hold, when they were fortunately descried by a Dover pilot boat, who rescued them from their perilous situation and brought them into Brighton.

SPAIN.—The assignees of Arcamans and Co. intend to resume operations at the works in St. Philip's and Bathurst's basin, for the benefit of the estate. It is probable that nearly two hundred hands will be set to work next week.

POLICE.—GUILDHALL. On Thursday G. Blackburn, a middle-aged man who gives for hire as a porter on Dowgate hill, was charged with uttering a forged check for £200 at Messrs. Hoares, bankers, Fleet-street. The prisoner, it appeared, was a poor but honest man; and his story ran that a gentleman in appearance had employed him for two successive days in carrying letters; and, after paying his hire, directed him to go to Stonecutter-street, and wait for him. Prisoner did so, and shortly before five o'clock the gentleman came up, and gave him to understand that with the cheque, directing him what notes he was to ask for, and to bring the money to him at the Mitre.—Alderman Farncomb asked him to describe the person.—The prisoner said his manner was that of a gentleman, and he wore a black coat and waistcoat; rather under the middle size; rather dark complexion; and about 48 years of age.—Alderman Farncomb, after consulting with Mr. Palmer (a cashier at Hoares's, who stopped the cheque), discharged the prisoner, that he may assist the police in their inquiries.

CHARTIST TRIALS.—LANCASTER, Thursday.—On the Learned Judge taking his seat, and the names of the jury having been called over, his Lordship commenced his summing up, by observing that they had at length arrived at the last stage in their important investigation. The jury had received from both sides expressions of their opinion of the extreme length they had had to the case. He (the Learned Judge) must bespeak the same attention, first, as to what was the nature of the charge against the defendants. They had been told over and over again what it was the defendants were charged with; it was the crime of conspiracy, inked up, it was true, with other charges, but as they had been withdrawn, the attention of the jury would be directed to the charge of conspiracy alone. It had been said there was extreme difficulty and confusion in the present case to discover what was the precise crime of conspiracy. He (the learned judge) did not see the difficulties which had been suggested by others. Undoubtedly there might be cases of conspiracy in which it might be difficult to define what was a conspiracy. Once he apprehended a conspiracy was made out where two or more persons to do an illegal act, or bring about a legal act by illegal means. The indictment contained a variety of counts, which, in truth, were nothing more than different charges, which, as they had been given up, it was not then necessary to discuss. There remained now, therefore, only seven counts of the indictment, all of which related to conspiracy. His lordship then explained the nature of the different counts of the indictment to the jury. The fifth count merely charged them with persuading others to refrain from work against the Charter became the law of the land. Now, as there was some difference of opinion as to whether that was really a count, the jury would have to say whether, after hearing the evidence, they were of opinion, supposing them to be guilty at all, they found them guilty on the former or the latter counts. His lordship then read over the whole of the counts, and then pointed out that portion of it which applied to twenty-four of the defendants who took part in the conference which was held, on the 17th of August, in the chapel of the Rev. James Scholefield, and he was the jury to consider whether they were of opinion that the defendants were guilty on the 5th count of the indictment or on the others. When they had considered the case, he would then explain to them the nature of the evidence applicable to another class of defendants, who had attended public meetings in various parts of the county and against whom a different species of evidence had been given. The jury then stood at twenty minutes past four to consider the point; and, on their return into Court, delivered a verdict of "Guilty" against all the prisoners, with the exception of seven acquitted by consent of the Crown, as already stated.

FOREIGN.

FRANCE.—The Paris papers of Wednesday are chiefly occupied with M. Jaubert's proposition in the Chamber of Deputies, for a grant of 13,500,000 francs to defray the expense of completing the Louvre, and prolonging the Rue de Rivoli to the Rue l'Oratoire. This proposition was negatived by the standing committee, because it interfered with the administration of the civil list: the decision is, therefore, left with the King.

A private letter from Sierra Leone, of the 19th of January, mentions the arrival at that settlement of the Belle Poule, with his Royal Highness the Prince de Joinville, on Thursday, the 5th instant. The Prince was received by the headquarters of the 3rd West India Regiment, with the honours due to his rank. On the day after his arrival he visited Fort Thornton, where he was received by a guard of honour of the 3rd West India Regiment. On returning on board his Royal Highness ordered a salute to be fired, which was acknowledged by another of 21 guns from Fort Thornton.

SPAIN.—Our latest advices from Madrid are of the 1st instant. The elections in the capital were progressing favourably for the Government. In the Asturias the Regent's candidates were also in the ascendant. At Barcelona our latest accounts from that city are to the 24th inst. The appointment of a president and four secretaries to preside over the voting, when Moderado candidates were returned by a majority of 400 to 72. These persons are believed to be entirely devoted to the Government. Unfavourable accounts from Catalonia had reached the capital on the 1st inst.

AMERICA.—Papers and letters to hand by the packet ship United States, which left New York on the 16th ult. have reached town. The following from Detroit, which that vessel did not touch, from which place a packet had been made to leave the Senate to consider the Oregon Bill, but it had failed in consequence of it was reported that the House of Representatives. It was then proposed to refer the bill to the committee on military affairs, and then to a committee of the whole house, but both these propositions were negatived, and it was ultimately disposed of by committing it to the committee on foreign relations. According to the private letters from the usually best-informed sources, this is considered to lay the bill on the shelf, which shows that the majority of the Senate from whom more discretion than the majority of the Senate, from whom more just views of international rights have been expected.

These papers also contain the President of the United States' Message, with reference to the present and prospective condition of the country's finances. It appears from what the President says, that if the receipts from the various sources of revenue for the present year shall prove not to have been overrated, and the expenditures to be restrained within the estimates, the Treasury will nevertheless be exhausted before the close of the year, and that this will be the case, although authority should be given to the proper department to re-issue Treasury notes. He says that it is not certain that the expenditures which will be authorised by Congress may not exceed the aggregate sum hitherto assumed as the basis of Treasury calculations

After warning Congress of the necessity of public credit being maintained, and of the President's duty to see that it is duly advised of the state of the Treasury, and of any danger from not being enabled to meet the expenditures authorised by law, he states that there will be a serious failing off in the receipts from the sale of the public lands, and public lands. The President then argues against any mere temporary provision, and justly observes, that in a country so full of resources, of such abundant means, if they be but judiciously called out, the revenues of the Government, its credit, and its ability to fulfil all its obligations would not be made dependent on temporary expedients, or on calculations of an uncertain character.

The Message of the President, which is dated Feb. 13, concludes as follows:—"By the aid of a wise and efficient measure, not only would the internal business and prosperity of the country be revived and invigorated, but important additions to the amount of revenue arising from importations might also be confidently expected. Not only does the present condition of things, in the business and commercial exchanges, produce severe and distressing embarrassment in the business and pursuits of individuals, but its obvious tendency is to create also a necessity for the imposition of new taxes, and for loans, in order to secure the government and the country against discredit, from the failure of the means now relied upon to pay expenditures."

The Message of the President was accompanied with a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, which estimates the receipts of the year at 15 or 15 millions of dollars, and the expenses at 16 or 17 millions. According to this report, however, there are about two millions of dollars now in the Treasury.

We regret to state that there is little or no prospect of Sir Charles Bagot's ultimate recovery. Letters from Kingston, dated the 4th ult., mention that dropsy had commenced. The following is the bulletin issued on that day:—"His Excellency the Governor General has, since Wednesday last, experienced an increase of unfavourable symtoms, which continue unalleviated this morning.

MARSEILLES HARBOUR.

THE OVERLAND MAIL.

The occasion of the arrival of the overland mail (now momentarily expected) affords a good opportunity for introducing some features of attraction to our readers, in an article and engravings illustrating the history and marking the progress of this peculiar express, from the time of its outset from Marseilles up to its arrival at the office of one of those leading public journals which are so active to promulgate its intelligence at home.

RUE DES CHANGES, ABBEVILLE.

Nothing is more characteristic of the age we live in than the desire which everywhere prevails of increased rapidity of communication and multiplied facilities of intercourse. Everywhere the empire of commerce is extending, with its busy energies, its untiring speculation, its restless bustle, and never-ceasing movement; and the calls of curiosity and craving for adventure combine with the necessities of business to quicken the motions of men, and urge on the wheels of life in their revolutions with accelerated velocity. The bonds which unite to each other the great families of mankind are being drawn closer and tighter; the barriers of time and space, which once opposed to their union obstacles apparently insurmountable, are lessened, if not altogether removed; and those pioneers of society, the courier and the steam-packet, are annually spreading wider the circle of civilization, and preparing new triumphs for humanity.

Of all the improvements which have been effected of late years in our methods of communication, none is more remarkable than the change which has taken place in the transmission of intelligence to and from our Indian empire. The great importance of the vast and splendid domain comprised in it, the immense amount of British capital invested in the securities of the Indian Government, the number of our countrymen in India, forming a large portion of the flower of the middle classes of Britain, make it imperative on those who have the direction of affairs to avail themselves of every means which the mechanical discoveries of the day afford them to abridge the distance which separates us from our Eastern possessions. The importance of our Indian empire and the amount of its commerce with England have been trebled or quadrupled since the days of Hastings and Cornwallis, and the tardy communication which satisfied the public of half a century ago will not longer do for the present day. At that time less than a year would not suffice for the conveyance of a letter to Calcutta and the receipt of an answer in England, through the medium of the sailing-vessels of the Company, which made the long voyage by the Cape of Good Hope. The inconveniences of such a system, causing losses and delays to the merchants, and obstructing the path of the Government with serious difficulties, were too great to be endured a moment beyond the time when they could be got rid of; and the outcries of the commercial interests, as well as of the public in general, with the obvious advantages which would result to the state from shortening the time consumed on the route, forced the directors of the East India Company, a few years back, to establish an overland communication. The state of Egypt had always previously presented an obstacle to the realization of such a scheme, but when the Mamelukes had been expelled, and the country tranquillized under the rigorous sway of Mohammed Ali, this difficulty disappeared. Arrangements were made with the Government of that ruler by which a free passage through Egypt was secured for letters, passengers, and light goods; and the ports of Alexandria and Suez became the two points of arrival and departure on the European and Asiatic side. Without the aid of steam not much, perhaps, would have been gained by the adoption of the new route; for the light breezes and calms of the Mediterranean, the baffling navigation of the Red Sea (so called, we may take the opportunity of informing our readers, from the great reefs of red coral rocks which form its bed), and the monsoons of the Indian Ocean, would equally have interposed insuperable impediments to sailing-ships. But by the employment of that powerful agent which was discovered in the last century, and is slowly advancing to perfection in the present, the opposition of wind and tide is rendered nugatory. Neptune and Æolus, vanquished, must bow before the footstool of Watt. Two lines of powerful steam ships—one from Bombay to Suez, the other from Alexandria to Marseilles—carry the mails on their long course with perfect regularity, in spite of the alternate storms and calms of the tropical seas. This system did not come fully into operation till 1837, and is every year receiving some material improvement in the details, by increasing the size and power of the steam-ships, and smoothing the roughness of the journey from Alexandria to Suez. As to adopt the circuitous passage through the straits of Gibraltar would be a needless lengthening of the route, the mail is conveyed through France, from Marseilles to Boulogne or Calais, and so by Dover to London. This route was doubtless preferred to that by Trieste, at the head of the Gulf of Venice, and Hamburg, from the superiority which has hitherto existed in the inland communications of France over those of Germany. The highways are kept in much better order than the rough and uneven roads of Germany, and their mails and diligences move at a less sluggish rate. But it is very questionable whether this superiority will much longer continue, for the Germans are as far before the French in railroads as the latter are superior in paved high-roads. A line of railroad from Hamburgh or Ostend to Trieste has been laid down, and portions of it are already executed; and when this magnificent undertaking, which will connect the German Ocean and British Channel with the Adriatic, is completed, it is probable that the mail will come to England through Germany instead of France. This is a consummation to be desired on all grounds; the adoption of the present line of conveyance has the unavoidable effect of putting the French Government, by means of the telegraph, in possession of the chief points of each month's India news at least one day, if not often two or three, before they can reach our own ministers. The insolent and conceited jealousy of England which has marked the whole policy of France for some years past renders her people little deserving of the benefits conferred upon them by our selection of the present route for the conveyance of the mails. The object of our present article is to present to our readers several beautiful illustrations of the chief towns (Paris excepted) through which the mail passes, which cannot fail to give the highest pleasure, from the natural beauties of the sites chosen, as well as the interesting associations connected with them, as well as to assist the conceptions of our readers in understanding the various arrangements which we are endeavouring briefly to explain.

The first point on the journey we have selected is Marseilles harbour, of which our artist has made a graphic and faithful delineation, conveying the full idea of the scene. The calm waters of the Mediterranean, with the sunny sky which shines overhead, the indolent and dreamy repose of the picture, are all true to nature. Marseilles is a town of immense wealth, as well as of historical importance and ancient fame. We need not here fatigue our readers with statistical details of its commerce, which is second in amount only to the Liverpools and New Yorks of countries more exclusively trading and maritime. Founded by the Phocæans, a people of Grecian extraction, four centuries before the Christian era, it was one of the chief cities of ancient Gaul, and resisted the assaults of Cæsar in his Gallic wars. During the middle ages it was inferior as a mart only to Venice; and when the power of the latter declined, it succeeded to much of its commerce, and saw great part of the trade of the Mediterranean centre in its port. It is remarked that its people to this day show some traces of their Greek origin, which have not escaped the observation of French antiquarians.

Abbeville, on the road from Paris to Calais, is the next spot selected. It is celebrated for its fine old cathedral, the towers of which overhang its old-fashioned streets of massive projecting houses, and frown with awful grandeur over the traveller's head as the coach rattles into the Rue des Changes. The north of France has few national beauties of scenery, presenting for the most part an unvaried plane, with little or no wood but that of young plantations; but to make amends, it has to boast of some fine old towns, most interesting both in their appearance and from association. In the immediate vicinity of Abbeville is Montreuil, of which the northern gate is here engraved. Montreuil, situated on the only important eminence to be found for some distance round, is the strongest fortress of the north-west of France. It owes its strength to nature rather than art; all the inequalities of the ground are skilfully taken advantage of, and the country in the immediate neighbourhood is so flat and low, that it can be laid under water by the garrison. The approach by this gate is striking. You seem, as you descend the steep declivity which leads to the covered way, to be entering a subterraneous defile, until, after passing through narrow passages and arched vaults, commanded from various points, you suddenly emerge on the brow of a hill, and find yourself in Montreuil, and within the gates. In the old feudal times, Montreuil was a place of even more consequence than now, and was the scene of many a desperate contest in civil dissension, as well as in the wars between England and France. From its vicinity to the sea, it was a most important point for the English to win, and not less so for the French to hold. That these days of darkness may not again return, and the fair fields and vineyards of peace be laid desolate by the iron hand of war, ought to be the wish and prayer of every true patriot.

ENTRANCE TO MONTREUIL.

Few, perhaps, of our readers are aware of the extraordinary exertions which are made by the daily press of London to gratify the public curiosity in reference to each month's India news, by anticipating the arrival of the regular mail by an extraordinary express

CALAIS HARBOUR AFTER STANFIELD.

This was first established in 1840, at which time intense curiosity prevailed relative to the then impending war with China, and it has been continued, of course at vast expense to the proprietors of the various journals, ever since that time. The outlay incurred for this object affords an astonishing proof of the enterprise and spirit of the press Britain, in which our newspapers infinitely outshine all competition. It is well known that, such is the rapidity of conveyance attained by their combinations, although London is 200 miles farther from Marseilles than Paris is, the India budget of news is generally printed in the London journals, and published to the world, before it has been received in Paris otherwise than by the telegraph. The French couriers have long been celebrated for speed and endurance on horseback; the same qualities are also possessed by those of several other European countries, especially Russia and Spain.

Many of these are able to ride the whole journey from Marseilles to Boulogne or Calais, a distance of at least 700 miles, without any other rest or refreshment save what they can snatch on the horse's back! The old-fashioned high or demi-pique saddles in use assist them in taking repose; and they are accompanied by a relay of horses, in case of any accident on the road. It is by the employment of these invaluable agents that the conductors of our journals are enabled to supply the public with information forty-eight hours or more before the arrival of the regular mail; for these couriers reach the speed of thirteen or fourteen miles an hour, by the aid of strong limbs, good riding, and a plentiful supply of horses, while the mail jogs along at the rate of seven or eight. A steam-boat waits off Calais or Boulogne, according as the wind serves, and receives the express, which is immediately conveyed to Dover, and thence, by horse-express, to London. We illustrate this interesting crisis by a splendid view of Calais harbour, of which we need say nothing, as being so well known. Gad's-hill, on the Canterbury road, with its quiet wayside inn (where mad Prince Hal and Falstaff robbed the sheriffs), and the picturesque prospect it offers over the county of Kent, is engraved in order that we may not confine our illustrations entirely to a foreign country. Our artist has also selected for a sketch the office of the Times journal, in Printing-house-square, in order that nothing may be wanting to complete the chain of illustration.

THE FASHIONS.

Paris, Rue Chaussée d'Antin, March 6, 1843.

Mon cher Monsieur,—Without having got rid of winter, we may be considered as having made great advances towards spring, for we still see, though with a large admixture of those fashions and those forms which belong peculiarly to winter, the gradual appearance of those lighter textures which give token of a more joyous season. At the great parties which have been given lately, but more particularly at the Civil-list ball, and that splendid fête of M. Guizot, this might be particularly remarked; for though numerous of the guests wore costumes of silk and other light materials, still the preponderance might truly have been said to exist on the side of velvets and other articles more peculiarly adapted to winter wear. These, however, were gaily trimmed, and were worn in such a fashion as to denote the coming change which the return of spring always produces. Black and other velvets, trimmed with lace, and lined with rose and other gay-coloured satins, formed the majority of the dresses worn, yet here and there might be observed exceptions to the general rule; for instance, let me cite the costume of a lady, whose general good taste is almost proverbial in this capital. On the occasion I refer to she wore a dress of white crêpe, forming a double tunic, ornamented with pearls and silver, and with a berthe of similar materials. Her coiffure was composed of an edging of pearls, in which was seen a bouquet of moss roses. The general appearance of this dress excited general admiration, and was admitted to be extremely becoming. Two or three other dresses, of a similar fashion, but made of cabbage green satin, with an under petticoat of white satin, had a very tasty and remarkable appearance. I should observe that all these dresses were, to a certain extent, open at the sides for the purpose of permitting the under petticoat of satin to be seen, but the skirts were retained in their place by slight bands of puffed ribbon, and in their front, reaching from about the height of the knee to the waist, they supported two festoons of camellias, the flowers gradually diminishing in size as they approached the waist. The head dress which appeared to me the most becoming with this style of costume was a simple crown of white camellias or roses, with diamonds in their centre, or attached to sprigs, with the foliage in diamonds and other precious stones. I do not think the form or the style of these dresses have altered much within the last fortnight; perhaps (but it may be only imaginary on my part) the fashion of wearing two or three skirts is giving way slightly to the simple robe made entirely of the same material, and unbroken in its whole length. I confess I fancied I observed a tendency towards such an alteration in parties who are supposed to lead the way in our fashionable world, and, perhaps, a description of the toilette of one of those belles would be more to the purpose than any fancies of mine. The lady of whom I speak wore, at M. Guizot's party, a robe composed entirely of blonde, trimmed with a garland of May roses, and on her head she carried only a simple coronet of roses, with the foliage entirely composed of diamonds. The elegance, as well as the richness, of this dress was the subject of general observation, and equally of general admiration. The form and shape of the dresses are in nowise altered since my last communication; they are still made as low as before, the only variation being in the substance of which they are formed. Perhaps I ought also to remark that the fashion of flowers being intermingled with diamonds and other precious stones is completely in vogue; and a crown of roses or camellias, as set at the present day by our first houses here, is, I can assure you, one of the most becoming and, at the same time, splendid ornaments that you can possibly conceive.—Adieu.

Henriette de B.

The Russian Embassy.—We understand that in the course of the ensuing summer the Emperor of Russia's second son, the Grand Duke Constantine, will, in all probability visit this country. His Imperial Highness is in the naval service.

The contemplated matrimonial alliance between his Highness the Hereditary Grand Duke of Mecklenberg-Strelitz and the Princess Augusta of Cambridge is not expected to be solemnised until the middle of May. The illustrious bridegroom elect is expected daily at Cambridge House from the Continent.

It is stated that owing to the declining health of the Hon. Arthur Cole, brother to the Countess De Grey, and member for the borough of Enniskillen, it is his intention to resign on the first opportunity. It is added that his nephew, the Hon. John Cole, will be his successor.

North American Securities.—The following communication from her Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, the Right Honourable the Earl of Aberdeen, in answer to an application to his lordship by some of the deluded and unfortunate holders of the stock of several of the states of North America, will be read with deep interest:—"Foreign Office, March 6, 1843. Gentlemen,—I am directed by the Earl of Aberdeen to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 27th ult., calling his lordship's attention, on behalf of yourselves and other holders of American securities, to the non-fulfilment by several of the American states of their engagements with their public creditors. I am directed to state to you in reply, that the bonds, being bonds of the separate states, and not of the central government, that Government has no concern with the securities in question, and no power to compel payment of the sums required; and I am, therefore, to inform you that it appears to Lord Aberdeen that any good offices which her Majesty's Government might be disposed to employ with that of the United States, on your behalf, would, under these circumstances, be ineffectual.—I am, gentlemen, your obedient humble servant. "H. U. Addington."

A Female Maniac.—The Morning Chronicle of Wednesday last contains the following:—Yesterday only a female, who some time ago figured at the Mansion-house, and who has since been exceedingly troublesome at our office, as she, no doubt, has been at other newspaper offices, left a placard, partly in manuscript and printed, in which she says—"British soldiers'—Act like free men. The power you possess will be required, and when I need your aid—protect me. Who is now your Queen? I am, Sarah Newell. March 7th, 1843." There can be no mistake as to the state of this female's mind; the only question is as to the propriety of allowing such persons to be at large. A gentleman informs us that this woman is in the habit of frequenting the lobby of the House of Commons. Last night she was for a considerable time there, and addressed several members as they came out of the house into the lobby; and, amongst others, the Lord Mayor, with whom she familiarly shook hands.

The Assassin M'Naughten.—No order has yet been issued from the Home Office for the removal of M'Naughten to a lunatic asylum. Of course, until such order is given, the assassin will remain in Newgate.

LITERATURE.

THE ANNUAL BIOGRAPHY; BEING LIVES OF EMINENT OR REMARKABLE PERSONS, WHO HAVE DIED WITHIN THE YEAR 1842. By CHARLES R. DODD, Esq., author of "The Peerage," "The Parliamentary Companion," "The Manual of Dignities," &c. Chapman and Hall.

THE PARLIAMENTARY COMPANION FOR 1843. By C. R. DODD, Esq.

"The Annual Biography" supplies a deficiency in literature which had long been sensibly felt. "It has often been remarked," Mr. Dodd truly says in his preface, "that many celebrated men are allowed to glide away from the stage on which they have sustained such conspicuous characters, without any attempt being made to commemorate the admiration of the age in which they lived, or to form a record of those illustrious actions from which their reputation had been derived. The series of volumes, of which this is the first, will, it is hoped, not only satisfy the prevailing taste for memoirs, but enable those who take an interest in the lives of distinguished or extraordinary men to indulge their tastes, without the toil of searching through the many volumes of periodical literature, which are necessarily devoted to a great variety of subjects, or encountering the disappointment and delay of being obliged to wait for the tardy justice of a ponderous biographical dictionary." The plan of the work, as thus described, is an excellent one, and to no better hands could its execution have been committed. Mr. Dodd's well-known ability and accuracy, as well as his long practice in biographical researches, were a guarantee for the proper performance of what he here undertook. This promise of excellence has been amply realized in the work, which embraces concise and yet full memoirs of all persons who have died within the last year, in whose fate the public can be supposed likely to take an interest. It is written with much neatness and elegance of style; the judgment of the author has enabled him to avoid superfluity and prolixity of trivial detail on the one hand, or vagueness and generality on the other. We may refer to the memoir of the Marquis Wellesley as a model in this style of biography, presenting a clear and correct narrative of his life and actions, with a view of his public character, in as short compass as was consistent with the demands of the subject. If carried out in the same spirit, the work will furnish a complete view of the careers of all the persons who, in the present age, so fruitful in talent, have gained any degree of celebrity or distinction.

"The Parliamentary Companion" is a well-known hand-book of political information, which has now become established in the favour of the public.

The other works of the same author—his "Peerage" and "Manual of Dignities"—ought equally to be in the hands of all who interest themselves in public affairs, or desire thoroughly to comprehend the form of British society, and the workings of the constitution under which they live.

THE ORIGIN OF THE FASTS AND FESTIVALS OF THE CHURCH, arranged according to the Calendar. 1 vol. 12mo. Brooks.

It is properly remarked in the preface to this little volume that the information supplied by it "is of that kind which all persons are expected to possess, and are anxious to acquire, but which few know where to obtain." The want of such a compendium has long been felt. How few there are, for instance, who can explain the meaning of the terms Ember Days, Rogation Days, Quadragesima, Quinquagesima, and so forth, yet there are fewer still who would not be ashamed to confess ignorance. We recommend the work to all who are anxious to inform themselves on these particulars as adequate to its purpose, and compiled from the best sources. It comprises explanations of the names of the months, with biographical sketches of the persons, and historical accounts of the events on which the festivals are founded. A sketch of the origin and nature of almanacks, and explanations of their chronological and astronomical terms, is added.

A TOPOGRAPHICAL AND HISTORICAL GUIDE TO THE ISLE OF WIGHT, comprising authentic Accounts of its Antiquities, Natural Productions, and Romantic Scenery. By THOMAS BRETTELL. 1 vol. 12mo. G. Biggs.

An excellent guide to the island, which Walter Scott calls "that lovely spot, which he, who has once seen, never forgets, through whatever part of the world his future path may lead him." No spot is more frequently visited by summer tourists, especially since the establishment of the South-Western Railway; and all persons repairing thither cannot do better than possess themselves of this volume, which will furnish them with all the information they are likely to require, and some not uninteresting reading besides.

MAXIMS, MORALS, AND GOLDEN RULES. EXTRACTS, USEFUL, INSTRUCTIVE, AND ENTERTAINING. Madden & Co.

Two admirable manuals, each of which contains matter useful to men of all ranks and conditions. They consist, the former of apophthegms and sentences; the latter, of moderately long extracts, carefully selected from approved writers, and bearing on matters which, like the Essays of Bacon, come home to the business and bosoms of men. In the latter, many valuable extracts will be found from early English authors, whose works are scarce and costly, and in few hands but those of the scholar and book collector. Coleridge remarks, "Great old books of the great old authors are not in everybody's reach; and though it is better to know them thoroughly than to know them here and there, yet it is a good work to give a little to those who have neither time nor means to get more." With reference to aphorisms, Johnson says, "He may therefore be justly numbered among the benefactors of mankind who contracts the great rules of life into short sentences, that may be easily impressed on the memory, and taught by frequent recollection to recur habitually to the mind." We heartily approve of the plan of both collections, and have found them most useful in recalling many sayings and remarks of great writers which had slipped from recollection, or escaped our search in the original works. There is amusing as well as instructive matter, for a number of anecdotes illustrative of the principles and maxims are introduced.

[We take this opportunity of reminding publishers that they must send us their magazines and periodical works regularly and in good time, if they wish us to pay attention to them.]

NEW MUSIC.

VOCAL PART MUSIC, Sacred and Secular. Edited by Edward F. Rembault, F.S.A., &c. D'Almaine and Co.

We have been favoured with the first six numbers of this very elegant and desirable publication, and have no doubt that the praiseworthy object of the editors will be speedily and advantageously attained. If it were productive of no other effect than that of making young musicians (of the present day, who affect to despise the works of our masters) look into and study the "hidden soul of harmony" that is enshrined in the music of the ancients, a great good would be the consequence thereof. We should not be thronged, as we are now, with half-fledged composers, who think that if they can construct an air of a dozen bars' clumsy movement, all the desiderata of musical knowledge have been arrived at. Let them study such works as this delightful work promises to favour the public with, from time to time, and we shall soon perceive an amelioration in our musical taste. The numbers we have had the pleasure of perusing present us with some names probably not heard of by many before —such as Redford, Crecquillon, Richardson, &c.; but the sooner that every lover of poetical music becomes acquainted with them, the better for his taste and judgment. We entirely agree with the substitution of the G and F clefs for the C; and altogether recommend this elegant work, equally for instruction as for amusement. We cannot take our leave of it without specially recommending to notice Crecquillon's charming madrigal, "Hence, clouds, away!"

THE UNION. Kathleen Mavourneen and Dermot Astore. Written by Mrs. Crawford; composed by F. N. Crouch. D'Almaine and Co.

"The Union" is not so happy a production as any other of Mr. Crouch's melodies—it is too chromatic and laboured, without an object. The second part of the air is most anti-Irish, as is also the costume of Dermot on the title-page, which resembles Perrot in an Italian ballet. The words are not particularly remarkable, except for applying the epithet "Astore" to a male. But we must not enter here into philology.

LAYS OF ERIN, No. I. The Maid of Kildare. The poetry by W. H. Bellamy, Esq.; the music by Alexander Lee. D'Almaine and Co.

A pleasing and simple melody; not very original or characteristic, but easy of retention and performance.

LISTEN TO THE AIR THAT I LOVE BEST. Words by J. E. Carpenter; music by N. J. Sporle. L. Williams and Son.

In this ballad the memory of "the song of other days" is advocated to the exclusion of everything modern; the composer, however, has not rigidly adhered to his text, for he has presented us with a light graceful melody which is anything but old-fashioned.

THE HILLS OF MY COUNTRY ARE MANTLED WITH SNOW. Ballad. Composed by F. Kohler. L. Williams and Son.

A ballad of the extremest simplicity—no attempt at modulation or chromatic phrases—and, withal, pleasing from its great modesty.

THE PRINCE OF WALES'S MARCH, arranged for the Piano-forte. By C. Chaulieu. D'Almaine and Co.

A graceful and correct trifle, partaking, however, more of the Swiss style of music than anything connected with our young royal highness's title. But there are hills in Helvetia, and hills in Wallia, and that is quite enough.

FANTASIE ORAGEUSE, for the Piano-forte, composed by Charles Czerny. D'Almaine and Co.

A brilliant production in this popular composer's most felicitous manner. The larghetto, in four flats, is most elegantly treated, and the allegro vivace finely sustained in accordance with the subject to the end.

A SECOND FANTASIA FOR THE PIANO-FORTE. By R. Andrews. L. Williams and Son.

This is a misnomer: it is not a fantasia, but a series of variations in the old subdivisional style on the grand march in "Norma," wound up by a coda as common as well may be. We have not seen the first fantasia by Mr. Andrews, but we would recommend him, if he attempt a third, to aim at something original.

MORCEAU DE SONATA, for the Piano-forte. By C. Czerny. D'Almaine and Co.

Is a more elegant and serious composition than the foregoing. Bishop's celebrated vocal quintett, "Blow gentle gales," is most delicately and expressively reduced to the piano-forte; and in the following allegro con trio, the young contrapuntist, as well as pianist, will find some excellent writing, particularly at page 6, where a fugata passage suddenly breaks forth with all the energy of an impromptu. Altogether this is an excellent morceau.

FANTASIE DE CHASSE, for the Piano-forte. By Charles Czerny. D'Almaine and Co.

This is a brilliant and not difficult Fantasie de Chasse, but we are weary of "hounds and horns" on the piano-forte.

FANTAISIE AND BRILLIANT VARIATIONS ON AIRS FROM ADAM'S OPERA "LE ROI D'YVETOT. By Fred. Kalkbrenner. D'Almaine and Co.

It is quite a treat now-a-days to see the name of Kalkbrenner on the title-page of a musical novelty: it is a genuine guarantee of something good; at least with this feeling we turned over the pages of this publication, and we have not been disappointed. The introduzione is a masterpiece of solid writing, and the divertimento pages which follow it are sprinkled over with some elegant and novel passages.

ARCHDUKE OF AUSTRIA'S BAND MARCH. Composed by Fred. Kohler. L. Williams and Son.

This is a very unpretending little trifle: it will be found of use to very juvenile piano-forte players.

THE THEATRES.

ITALIAN OPERA.

This central arena of all that is attractive in the beau monde—all that is delightful in the arts of music, and her sister, the muse of poetical motion—and (to use the phrase of many magical influence) all that is fashionable in the gay world, will open this evening, March 11, with Donizetti's opera of "Adelia;" principal characters by Madame Persiani, Signor Conti, and Signor Fornasari. In former years it was the custom of the entrepreneur to open with any sort of a company, generally composed of third and fourth-rate artistes, who, although in their débuts they attempted the highest rôles, soon found their original level, or were withdrawn and forgotten before the season was half over; the lessee finding to his expense the error of applying the domestic axiom, Magnum est vectigal parsimonia, to the concerns of a national establishment dependant upon aristocratic patronage like the Opera. Mr. Lumley has acted upon a wiser principle, by not giving us at the opening of the forthcoming season any hazardous or doubtful novelties, but presenting us at once with an opera and ballet worthy of the best support. Of the skill, versatility, and artistical finish of Persiani, little need be said. Inferior to many of her rivals in physical power, she possesses in a great degree over, we may say, all of them, a more ready physical obedience to perform whatever her rich fancy, guided by the purest taste and judgment, may suggest; and if the volume of her voice be not of the calibre of a Pasta or a Grisi, her recitals are always eloquent, energetic, and graceful. There is also in some of her pathetic tones a thrillingness of design rather than reality, which not the less conveys the sentiment of the singer to her sensitive auditors. Her performances may be styled

It cantar, che nell' anima si sente—
Il più ne sente l' alma, il men l' orecchio!

With such a prima donna the opera never before (in our time) commenced its career. A new (at least to our boards) tenore serio, Signor Dominique Conti, is to appear also at the opening. He is an artiste of the Donzelli school, possessing a powerful and beautiful voice, which will be the "ninety-nine" out of the "hundred" requisites towards good singing with the multitude. We do not mean to depreciate the taste of the good folks of Lisbon (with whom he has been an immense favourite during the last four years), by mentioning his voice en particulier: we merely mean that it is his forte; while, on the other hand, he is by no means to be considered as an instance of "vox et præterea nihil," for his manner, although somewhat sombre, is chaste and impressive. In addition, we are to have another débutant in this country, Signor Luciano Fornasari (from the Teatro Regio, Turin), who, no doubt, is intended to fill the place of Tamburini, and whose abilities unquestionably will entitle him to do so, if there be not "got up" another shameful tyranny over the lessee, as was the case when Coletti (a good singer and an injured man) was brought forward under similar circumstances. Fornasari possesses an immense reputation in Italy as a prima basso cantante, and is an actor of the greatest versatility and discernment. His person is rather portly, resembling the "Gros de Naples" when somewhat younger, and like that great man, he is as impressive in opera seria as he is volatile and piquant in the buffa. His Barbiere is esteemed to be the best on the stage. Then for the ballet, we are to have Fanny Elssler, Guy Stephan, and Adèle Dumilatre (a most beautiful and accomplished danseuse), with the inimitable Perrot, Silvain, and a host of others, on the first night. Mr. Lumley you are right, "chi ben comincia ha la meta de l' Opera!"

But brilliant as this opening will be, we must consider it only as "the helical rising of the stars that are to follow." Grisi, Signora Ali (a contralto of continental celebrity), the charming Moltini,—Mario, Pannini, and "though last," certainly "not least,"—Lablache, or, as he is now styled, Don Pasquale, from his extraordinary performance of that character in Donizetti's opera of the same name. It is not improbable that Rubini also, who intends visiting London in the course of the season, will again "enchant our ears" by joining the operatic corps,—what a treat in perspectu! The ballet is to be reinforced by Taglioni and Cerito, and a hundred other "amoretti alati;" so that if there be not names "Apollineo digna choro," we know not what the subscribers and the public would look for at the hands of the liberal lessee.

Since writing the above it is with the greatest pleasure also that we perceive the name of the interesting and unfortunate Brambilla has been added to the list of engagements. It may not be known to all our readers why we apply the term "unfortunate" to this delightful contralto; but be it known that having captivated an Italian nobleman of the highest order, and accepted his honourable addresses, her union on the very appointed jour de noce was carried off by some ruffians, and has never since been heard of! This fatal circumstance has added a melancholy charm to the naturally plaintive voice of poor Brambilla, who now may be said, like the lorn nightingale, to mourn her mate,

In voice most sweet, but desolate!

If Signora Ali prove a "hit" the ensemble of the Opera cast will be more perfect than we ever recollect it to have been. Perhaps a prima seconda donna would be a desideratum, as we cannot suppose Grisi and Persiani will frequently, if ever, assume an inferior part to strengthen a cast; but we must not be too exigeant.

Various are the novelties, both in opera and ballet, which are now in preparation. In the first there are three new operas by Donizetti, including his wonderful "Don Pasquale," which has nearly turned the heads of the Parisians with admiration. Pacr's "Camilla" is to be revived, and Herold's "Zampa" will appear in Italian guise. A new opera, entitled (and founded upon Schiller's) "Don Carlos," with music by Costa, will also be produced in the course of the season. In the ballet department we are to have a new ballet, entitled "L'Ambre," the subject from Guido's celebrated picture, the music by Signor Puguy, in which Dumilatre will make her curtsey on the opening night; after which, on the same evening, "La Tarantule" will be revived for the reappearance of Fanny Elssler. Another new ballet, named "La Esmeralda," is in preparation for the same danseuse, and encore un autre entitled "La Naiade," for the début of Taglioni, most likely in conjunction with the aërial Cerito. The choruses are to be augmented, and to receive more than customary drill, that nothing may be short of perfection; and the splendid orchestra, increased to the number of one hundred performers, will be, as usual, under the able conduct of the clever, just, severe, but impartial Costa. With such a prospect before us we cannot but thank Mr. Lumley for his exertions, and sincerely wish that he may be as successful in his arduous undertaking as he has been liberal and indefatigable in his catering for the enjoyment of his patrons. We will present our readers from time to time with individual portraits and scenic groupings from the Opera as they may strike the fancy of our artist, who wants but a bird's-eye glimpse of anything interesting to transfer it faithfully to our pages for the entertainment of our numerous friends among the public.

DRURY LANE.

"Virginius" was one of the first tragedies which introduced Mr. Macready to the notice of the public, and will be, perhaps, the one in which he will continue to appear with the most success. The house on Monday was not full—not nearly so full as the manager deserved, but he must have experienced satisfaction in perceiving that he made a thorough impression on his audience, that all his efforts were appreciated, that sympathy followed him throughout. In the whole range of character which Mr. Macready plays there is, probably, not one which he has made so perfectly his own as the Roman plebeian in Mr. Knowles's tragedy—not one which he has seized so completely in all its bearings, and in which he gives such perfect satisfaction. In the paternal tenderness, which is the feeling of his first scene with Virginia—a charming scene, in which the tumult of old Rome is most pleasingly interrupted by a tranquil picture of domestic life—he exhibits that depth of affection which, to make the character dramatic, the author has given to Virginius. It is the dignified repose of a veteran, who seeks refreshment from the conflict with stern natures like his own, in the affection of a beloved child. This is the scene in which the character of Virginia is most striking, for in the subsequent parts of the drama her more delicate nature is almost lost in the bustle of the action. Miss H. Faucit appeared to great advantage here. The maiden-like consciousness of her love for Icilius, which she would half conceal from the knowledge of her father, by modestly declining her face—the very act that betrays it—and the warmth of filial affection with which she clings to her father, with a full sense of dependency, are great completenesss to the scene, and prepared us for that after situation, where the wronged maiden, claimed as slave, feels that all is lost, till her father has returned, and she finds herself once more in his embraces. Strikingly beautiful is Macready's pathos as he gives Virginia to Icilius, with the speech beginning—

Dost thou but know, young man,
How fondly I have watched since the day
Her mother died.

Dentatus, in the plebeian imitation of the old patrician Menenius Agrippa, was played with much ability by Phelps. The caustic speeches of the veteran he gave with rugged humour, but we wish that he would not allow the habit of bawling to grow upon him. The practice of loud speaking is also beginning to do considerable injury to Anderson, who played Icilius. At the fall of the curtain the audience broke out into true enthusiasm, and hailed Mr. Macready with every expression of delight.

COVENT-GARDEN.

Sheridan Knowles's play of Love was revived on Monday, the two principal characters being intrusted to a lady and gentleman making their first appearances. The gentleman, whose name is Mr. Paumier, has, we believe, previously made an attempt to take the higher walk of tragedy characters, about four years ago, but failed to make any successful impression. Beyond doubt his second trial has not placed him in any better position, the general feeling of the house, as far as any feeling could exist in so thin and chill an assembly, being that he had mistaken his vocation. The entire performance was a failure, and the curtain fell in silence, interrupted only by a few scattered plaudits.

ADELPHI.

A comic burletta, called "Captain Charlotte," in two acts, adapted from the French, was played at this theatre on Monday for the first time in this country. The piece was very cleverly played by all parties concerned. Miss Kate Howard, who sustained the principal part, is likely to be a great addition to the company already engaged at the theatre, is a very clever young lady, and to the attractions of a handsome face and good person, unites considerable talent as a dramatic artiste. She was received with applause at the fall of the curtain. There was an unanimous call for her, and on her appearance bunches of flowers and similar marks of approbation were showered on the stage. She is certainly deserving of public patronage. The piece has a great many good dramatic situations, and was received with strong marks of approbation.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL CHIT CHAT.

COVENT GARDEN.—The manager, Mr. Bunn, revives Weber's celebrated opera of "Oberon," for his benefit on Monday.

MADLLE. BRAMBILLA.—We gladly perceive that this interesting lady and delightful contralto has been added to the list of the Opera engagements.

CONCERTS OF ANCIENT MUSIC.—The first concert for the season will take place at the new rooms, Hanover-square, on Wednesday, the 15th of March.

DRURY LANE THEATRICAL FUND.—The "festival" in aid of the funds of this charity is "necessarily" postponed to Wednesday, March 22nd, in consequence of the first ancient concert of the season being fixed for Wednesday the 15th of March, at which his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge is to be present, and of course could not extend his noble ubiquity to the charity on the same evening.

MR. JAMES BENNET.—This gentleman has been appointed to succeed the late Mr. Vaughan, as tenor singer at the chapel royal.

LYCEUM.—The season here is drawing to a close; and Mr. Carter, the lion-king, takes his benefit on Friday; when Charles Freeman, the American giant, will go through his equestrian performances on two horses, one, we believe, not being competent to the task.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE TURF.

"Beware the Ides of March," is a wise old saw, having a currency of some twenty centuries. Even we cannot more conveniently preface our notices of the turf for this year of grace than with so wholesome a spice of caution. There has been, since old Forty-two went out, some little doing at Tattersall's, but in this instant mouth business has commenced in earnest, and the legs are heard exclaiming with Richard -

> Now is the winter of our discontent
> Made glorious summer.

The racing season has begun quoad the speculator, and its relation with him is our present affair. To the various sports of this island our attention will be turned in their succession, in fact, seasonably directed; for the present, the turf demands our especial attention.

If ever there was a company of monomaniacs going about loose, it is the backers of the great Derby favourite in 1843. For that race there are upwards of a hundred horses in training, and one is backed (and has been for months) at little more, on the average, than seven to one!! A beaten—a badly beaten horse backed under such circumstances, at seven to one! On this horse one individual, a leading man in the Manchester ring, stands to the tune of £60,000. "Think of that, Master Brooke:" let this be the key note of our song. "A British Yeoman!" as the most preposterously overrated of all the overrated that have ever flourished in the annals of Epsom credulity. Leave we the Derby, however, for a space, and betake us to the present state of the Chester Cup. This race seems to from the cradle to have been a rogue—a son of Olympic Bil Sykes. First they got up a quiet little "fix," upon the Corsair, picking the pockets of the green of any odds to be had, from 10 to 1 to 100 to 1 inclusive. Before this the foundation for a handsome larceny was laid by the handicapper, who put 8st. 13lbs. on Corsair's filly, or a stone and a half less on Corsair, in order to bad a runner of her own age. This being the case, everbody with a mouth and eyes, having by means of the latter espied a good thing, opened the former to turn it to account. Among these was one Mr. R——, of Manchester, who, finding all mankind ready to lay all their moneys on her, took their odds of all sorts, and ready to make them even by buying the mare, it is natural to suppose for the purpose of doing as he pleased with his own. This he conceived he had done, and then went and betted one Mr. Goodman Levi a wool £300 he did not start at all at Chester. Now on this Goodman became alarmed, and, seeking out one Mr. Clarke, who he ignorantly imagined to be the real owner of Bizarre, he learnt a bargain had been struck for her with R——, as aforesaid. This took him for a moment aback; but "inferance" not being the badge of his peculiar tribe, he made an offer to become the purchaser of her himself, seeing that R—— had unlawfully bargained for her on a Sunday! Taking a bond of indemnity for £8000 in case R—— should bring an action for breach of contract, Clarke resold to Levi for £2500 about six times the value of the animal, who of course will run at Chester, which will reduce her price by £300.

COUNTRY NEWS.

ASHBURTON ELECTION.—The polling commenced at eight o'clock on Wednesday morning, and throughout the day the proceedings were conducted in a very quiet and orderly manner. The numbers at the close of the poll were—Matheson, 141; Palmer, 98: Majority, 43. The defeated candidate is a Conservative principle.

LIVERPOOL.—ANOTHER GREAT FIRE.—We are sorry to say that another dreadful fire took place at Liverpool early on Tuesday morning, by which the bonding, sawing, and planing premises of Messrs. Whitty and Co., Parcels and Preston, in York-street, and two warehouses (one bonded and the other free) were destroyed. The fire broke out about one o'clock in the panel shop belonging to the foundry, and though Mr. Whitty and the fire-police were immediately on the spot, it was impossible to do anything effectual for a long time, owing to the usual deplorable want of water. At last a supply was procured, but not until the flames had got such a head as to make it impossible to extinguish them, until they had destroyed the greater part of the foundry and an adjoining warehouse, together with another on the opposite side of Lydia Anne-street. One of the most painful circumstances connected with this sad calamity is, that it will deprive from 300 to 400 workmen of employment, and thus add to the already frightful amount of distress existing in the town. Owing to the pressure of the times, the number of men employed in this great establishment had been reduced from nearly 700 to 350, and of these a very large proportion, if not the whole, will be unable to get employment until the workshops are rebuilt.

MANCHESTER.—ENORMOUS SILK ROBBERIES.—During the last two or three years a number of silk warehouses in Manchester and its neighbourhood have been broken into and robbed of goods, the entire amount of which is said to have exceeded £10,000 value. These robberies have been so ingenious y planned and executed as to have defied the utmost vigilance of the police either to trace the parties or the thieves at the time, and not the slightest information on the subject has till very lately been obtained. About a fortnight ago, however, it was rumoured that parties were connected with these robberies who stood higher in the world than the police had ventured to look—that they had been planned and effected at the instance, in fact, of master silk manufacturers and dyers. It was said that these parties, entering the warehouses of different merchants and tradesmen in the way of business, had thus the means, in the day time, without suspicion attaching to them, of observing the fastenings of doors, and getting to know the situation of the most valuable and most suitable goods for their purpose—that they then laid their plans and submitted these plans to workmen in their employ journeymen housebreakers—by whom the robberies were effected; that the goods so stolen were mostly yarns, which, on being brought to them, were immediately consigned to the dye-tub, and that thus, with the change of colour, the possibility of detection was removed. This rumour is said to have reached the police, and we understand that it has since been traced to the letter of a convict lately received from him by his parents. What the precise language of the letter is remains a secret, but we learn that the parties to whom it refers had in contemplation, besides their present plundering transactions, a scheme for swindling on a most extensive scale, from the effects of which the mercantile community will probably be saved, in consequence of these disclosures. The police have also been busy in acting on their newly-acquired information, and having obtained search warrants against Messrs. Nathaniel and Edgar Lucas, silk-manufacturers and dyers, carrying on business at Leigh, near Manchester, and who have also a place of business near Macclesfield, these men have been apprehended in consequence of stolen goods found in their possession, and they were brought up for examination at the New Bailey Court-house, and were last before D. Maude, Esq., and Elias Chadwick, Esq., the sitting magistrates. After a long investigation, which involved the examination of a number of witnesses, the prisoners were remanded for a week, the magistrates refusing to take bail.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

(Before the Recorder and Mr. Commissioner Bullock.)

MR ROBBERY AT THE CLUBS.—Joshua John Ashley, described in the calendar as "agent," aged 35, was put to the bar on a charge of stealing four silver spoons, and one silver fork, value £8, the property of the Earl of Carnarvon and others, in their dwelling-house. There were also five other similar indictments against the prisoner for robbery at other club-houses. Mr Clarkson and Mr. Bodkin conducted the prosecutions; Mr. Prendergast defended the prisoner.—Mr. Clarkson, in opening his address to the jury, said that the prisoner at the bar was indicted for larceny under somewhat peculiar and novel circumstances, and which must raise a discussion on a point of law. The prisoner for robbery at other club-houses. Mr Clarkson and Mr. Bodkin conducted the prosecutions; Mr. Prendergast defended the prisoner.—Mr. Clarkson, in opening his address to the jury, said that the prisoner at the bar was indicted for larceny under somewhat peculiar and novel circumstances, and which must raise a discussion on a point of law. The prisoner was most respectably connected—he was the son of an army agent, and a member of the following clubs: The Junior United Service Club; the Union Club; the Reform Club; and the Colonial Club. Silver plate was missed from the establishments of which the prisoner was a member, and from some circumstance which lately occurred, suspicion fell upon him as being the pur-loiner. At this period the prisoner was lodging in Allingham-street, Pimlico. Instructions were given to the police to watch his movements, and on the day named in the indictment he was seen to leave home. He was followed by a policeman to Holborn, and seen to enter a pawnbroker's shop of the name of Fleming. On entering the shop he pulled out a parcel from his pocket, which contained four spoons and a fork, which he desired the person he gave them to behind the counter to have them marked with the same initials as formerly. The policeman having obtained possession of the parcel, took the prisoner into custody, and asked him where he got the spoons from; prisoner replied that he had had them in his possession for four years. On examining the articles it was clear that some crest or initial had been rubbed or filed off. The policeman then went with the prisoner to his lodgings in Allingham-street, Pimlico. On searching them he found a great number of duplicates for which goods had been pledged; and he also found a file, which it would be most important to consider when the evidence was gone into. It would be clearly proved that these spoons were the property of the Junior United Service Club; but then a question would be raised as to whether the prisoner, be being a member of that club, could be indicted for larceny in taking them away—that was a matter of law, however, which must be decided by the court. The plate belonging to the club was entrusted to Mr. John Howse, the butler, who gave security for keeping it safe, and he believed Mr. Howse had been obliged to make the loss good; therefore he thought, in law, the prisoner might be indicted for stealing it from him. The learned counsel cited several cases in which convictions had taken place, which he should have hereafter to contend were analogous to the charge against the prisoner. Mr. Clarkson, after a few further remarks, proceeded to call witnesses, but as their evidence was precisely the same as that given a few days since at the police-office, and which was fully reported, we consider it unnecessary to give any detail of the evidence. The learned Recorder summed up, and the jury returned a verdict of Guilty.—Sentence, transportation for seven years.

TUESDAY

The Common Sergeant sat in the New Court to-day, and tried the charge of assault, in which one of the prisoners, who gave his name Simpson, was supposed to be either a baronet or a nobleman. We merely allude to the case from the speech of Mr. Bodkin, counsel for the prosecution, and a rumour had gone abroad of a most mischievous and cruel nature; the name of that respectable gentleman who was then sitting on the bench, Sir Peter Booth, had been made use of by the defendant. Now, a more honourable and moral man than Sir Felix did not exist. He had filled with the greatest credit the high office of Sheriff of London, and was in all respects entitled to the esteem of his fellow-citizens and the public. He (Mr. Bodkin) would prove the real name of the prisoner Simpson; his name was Robert Smith, and he had for a number of years carried on a respectable practice as a solicitor in the city of Worcester. Witnesses having proved that the real name of the prisoner was Robert Smith, the trial proceeded, and a verdict of "Guilty" on the eighth count of the indictment was returned.—Mr. Clarkson took a legal objection to the indictment, and consequently the judgment was postponed.

—Sir Felix Booth was on the bench during the whole morning.—The Common Sergeant observed, in summing up, that rumour was a "common liar."

The Recorder sat in the Old Court, but no case of interest was tried.

WEDNESDAY

(Before the Common Sergeant.)

George Coward, a porter, aged 33, was indicted for stealing (in London) 30½ yards of silk velvet, called waistcoating, and 5 yards of satin, value £9 15s., the property of Messrs. Sidney Smith and Co., of King street, Cheapside, to whom he was a servant; and James Newcomb (previously known to the pouce) was charged with feloniously receiving the same with a guilty knowledge. In this case the main facts of the evidence were similar in most respects. The principal difference was that these articles were contained in a trass which had been in its transit through the medium of Messrs. Chaplin and Horne. The scheme resorted to by the prisoner Coward showed that he was an adept by nature or tuition, upon each occasion some time both his employers and the carriers were prevented from suspecting him. Smith, the officer, proved that the articles named in the indictment found their way through the agency of Newcomb to the shop of Wallace and Co. Mr. Wallace was examined, and acknowledged that he purchased the property of the prisoner Newcomb on the day the robbery was effected. Common Sergeant: You did? Pray what time? You have given for the waistcoating per yard?—Mr. Wallace, 3s. 6d., and I sold it in a lot.—Common Sergeant: For how much?—The witness named the sum Common Sergeant: Pray how much was that per yard? Mr. Wallace, 5s. with a fraction. Common Sergeant: A quick return and a large profit. Neither you nor your partner shall have a farthing expended on your behalf. You know how the system is working. Who can wonder at the repeated failures of tradesmen, who, by an organised plan, are plundered wholesale by their servants. Mr. Wilde said he saw the difficulties he had to contend with, and was unable to rebut the evidence.—The jury were so satisfied with it, and simultaneously returned a verdict of guilty. The Common Sergeant then proceeded to sentence Coward to seven years' transportation, and Newcomb, the receiver, to fourteen years, being seven upon each indictment. The court at its rising adjourned till Monday the 3rd of April next.

POLICE.

GUILDHALL.—On Wednesday Messrs. Bradbury and Evans, printers, in Whitefriars, applied for protection against the mischief which might be done either to their property or persons by an insane person named James Deeie. Dowie was charged at this office on the previous Friday and Saturday with breaking five panes of glass at the printing-office of the complainants, to accomplish which he had carried stones in his pocket. In excuse for this he stated that Messrs. Bradbury and Evans published Chambers's Edinburgh Journal, in which one of his ancestors, who went to India, had been introduced, and neither the booksellers in Paternoster-row, nor the printers of the paper, would tell him where Robert Chambers lived in London. He knew Mr. Chambers was constantly driving a little phaeton up and down London, and the effect of the statement in the paper was, that he could get by the elevation as a journeyman stonemason.—Mr. Evans stated that Mr. Chambers resides in Edinburgh, and the alderman tried to reason the prisoner out of his delusion that what was said of Dowie in India could have no effect in this country. Who can wonder at the repeated failures of tradesmen, who, by an organised plan, are plundered wholesale by their servants. Mr. Wilde said he saw the difficulties he had to contend with, and was unable to rebut the evidence.—The jury were so satisfied with it, and simultaneously returned a verdict of guilty. The Common Sergeant then proceeded to sentence Coward to seven years' transportation, and Newcomb, the receiver, to fourteen years, being seven upon each indictment. The court at its rising adjourned till Monday the 3rd of April next.

CHINESE TRIBUTE MONEY ENTERING THE MINT.

THE CHINESE TRIBUTE.

The pleasant task devolves upon us this week of recording not alone verbally, but by pictorial representation also, the safe arrival at the English mint of the Chinese silver paid as indemnity as arranged by the recent treaty. Our engraving represents the waggons moving slowly under their valuable burden, and escorted by the 6th Foot. That regiment (and not the 60th as erroneously stated in the daily papers) guarded the treasure during its transit upon the Southampton Railway, and upon them devolved the gratifying duty of escorting it to the building in which it is destined to take a new form, and, impressed with the image of the British monarch, pass current amongst a people widely different to those who first cleansed it from its parent earth.

SYCEE SILVER.

The Sycee silver is in masses from three to four inches in width, as represented in our engraving, and appears as if cast to the shape of the crucible. In the centre of each piece of the metal are marks in the Chinese character. These hieroglyphics are also interesting from their similarity to those attached to the treaty recently completed between his Celestial Majesty and this country.

On Tuesday afternoon, about three o'clock, five more waggons, escorted by a strong party of the 10th Regiment, arrived at the Royal Mint, from the terminus of the Southampton Railway at Nine Elms, with 20 tons of the Chinese silver, in value 750,000 dollars, which was brought over from China by her Majesty's ship Columbine, which arrived at Portsmouth on Saturday morning, and was brought to town by the above railroad, under the especial care of Mr. Cooper, of the Commissary Department at the Mint. The silver is packed in boxes about two feet in length and one and a half in height, 425 in number. The official authorities were in readiness at the Mint for the purpose of receiving it, and, the usual formalities having been gone through, it was deposited in the same bullion storehouse as that in which the consignment brought over by the Modeste brig is placed, making in all nearly 2,000,000 dollars. The greatest activity and bustle now exist in that institution, consequent upon the arrival of this immense quantity of silver, and it is expected that in the course of the week they will have stored the 1,000,000 on board the Herald, and the 3,000,000 in the Blonde, which vessels are at present detained in the Channel. It has been stated the silver, after it has been melted, will be sold to dealers: such is not the fact. It is expected that orders will not be given as to the disposal of it till the whole of the ransom has arrived.

A Parliamentary paper delivered on Tuesday last shows that the quantity of silver imported from China in her Majesty's ship Conway, in January, 1842, amounted to 2,001,200 dollars, weighing 143,639 lbs. 2 oz. 5 dwt. gross, the standard weight of which was 148,526 lbs. 4 oz. 2 dwt. This, sold from the Mint, realised £440,720 10s. 6d., at the respective prices of 59¼d., 59⅜d., and 59½d. per ounce. There was no charge for melting the silver, Mr. Mathison, the Mint refiner, under sanction of the Treasury, having undertaken to defray all expenses, in consideration of being allowed 3½ grains of gold (less 10 per cent.) on every pound weight gross of silver. The gross weight of gold extracted therefrom was 2530 oz. 1 dwt. 17 gr.; allowance to Mr. Mathison, after deducting 10 per cent., 940 oz. 13 dwt. 9 gr., leaving 1589 oz. 8 dwt. 8 gr. gross, which produced in standard weight 1739 oz. 7 dwt. 21 gr. The expense of transporting the treasure from Portsmouth to the Mint was £300 15s. 8d. Gratuities to Mint officers, clerks, porters, &c., for extra exertions, £486 15s. 8d. The amount which the gold produced, at £3 17s. 9d. per oz. was £6723 0s. 4d. By sending the silver to the Mint, instead of selling it in the market at the estimated price of 59½d. per ounce, the Mint obtained a profit of £654 12s. 9d.

The Sycee silver is particularly pure, a quality shared by it in common with the metals obtained from the valuable mines of the celebrated Golden Island. Of this spot we give a sketch, since it possesses, at this moment, great interest, from the fact that the deepest recesses of its long wrought caves are now undergoing busy search for precious metals to aid the payment of the tribute to England. To render the series complete we have, at considerable expense, obtained likenesses of the two mandarins upon whom has devolved the duty of superintending the collection and payment of the ransom to the British Plenipotentiary. These Chinese dignitaries are habited in the costume which has long been familiar in England upon "china." Tea cups have not inappropriately acquainted us with Chinese appearances; and Viscount Jocelyn, in his recent work, remarks—"It is wonderful how correct they are in the main features." Here they are shown to be well clothed; and they are more completely so than the other nations in the south of Asia.

GOLDEN ISLAND.

CHINESE DOLLARS.

The Chinese dollars are mere rough pieces of silver, rudely circular, and having no impress save that placed upon them by various merchants through whose hands they pass. Each trader into whose possession they fall stamps them with his mark, and thus such of the pieces as have had long currency are completely covered by the names or signs of successive owners.

CHINESE MANDARINS.

The extremes of heat and cold which characterise the climate of China at opposite seasons of the year have led to a marked distinction between the summer and winter dress of the better classes. But the difference is principally in the cap, which in summer is of finely-woven bamboo, of conical shape, with a blue, white, or gilt ball at its point, whence falls, all around, silk or red horse-hair fringe. The winter cap is circular-crowned, and a broad brim, turned up all round, and faced with velvet or fur; at the top of the crown is likewise a ball, whence falls just over the dome a bunch of crimson silk. The changing of these caps with the season is of such importance as to be notified in an official gazette. A small skull-cap is commonly worn within doors in cold weather. The summer garment is a long loose gown of light silk, gauze, or linen; in full dress, worn with a silken girdle, to which are fastened the fan-case, tobacco-pouch, bag for flint and steel, and sometimes a sheathed knife and chopsticks. In winter a large-sleeved spencer is worn to the hips, over a dress of silk or crape, which reaches to the ankles. This spencer is of fur, silk, or broad-cloth, lined with skins; and the neck, which is bare in summer, is in winter covered with a collar of silk or fur. On state occasions the under dress is splendidly embroidered in silk and gold, and the caps are crimson, with various-coloured balls. The fur dresses of the higher classes are expensive, and descend from father to son. Little linen is worn, and the body garment, sometimes of light silk, is very rarely changed. Nevertheless, the costumes of all ranks and orders about the imperial palace are observed at Pekin with as much precision as in any court of Europe. Fashion, too, has its votaries; a Chinese fop being dressed in costly crapes and silks, boots or shoes of black satin of Nankin, embroidered knee-caps, cap of exquisite cut, and button of neatest pattern, and English gold watch, a toothpick attached to a string of pearls, and a scented Nankin fan; and such a personage is attended by servants in silk dresses.

LITERARY FUND SOCIETY. The anniversary meeting of the members of the above society was held on Wednesday at the offices in Great Russell-street, Bloomsbury-square. Amongst those present were the Earls of Arundel and Surrey, Sir H. Ellis, Sir R. F. Jodrell, the Rev. Dr. Croly, Mr. Crofton Croker, &c. Henry Hallam, Esq., took the chair. Mr. Blewitt, the secretary, read the report of the council. It stated that the presidency of his Royal Highness Prince Albert had proved highly advantageous to the institution, and that during the past year the sum of £1255 had been given as relief to distressed literary men, their wives and children, making a total, since the establishment of the society in 1790, of £39,000. The amount distributed in 1841 was £785. The report having been adopted, a letter was read from the Russian ambassador, announcing that the Emperor of Russia appreciated the objects of the institution, and presented it with 1,000 silver rubles (about £155). The Marquis of Lansdowne, the Earls of Arundel and Surrey, Mr. B. B. Cabbell, &c., were re-elected vice-presidents, after which thanks were given to the chairman, and the meeting separated.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND

DUMBARTON CASTLE.

This singularly picturesque old edifice is most advantageously situated at the mouth of the noble estuary of the Clyde, and, whether looked on in an artistical or historical point of view, presents in its solitary grandeur one of the chiefest charms of that romantic river; and, as the busy steamers ply along the peaceful shores of Argyleshire, many a story is told of Scotland's trials and glories, when Wallace the wight, with his brave comrades in arms, driven from their homes, occupied those heights in martial array, and successfully resisted the oppressors of their country. Perched on the top of an isolated basaltic rock, and overlooking the Clyde at an almost perpendicular height of upwards of five hundred feet, and almost inaccessible on every side, the castle from the south or sea view is seen to the greatest advantage; and, though it seems little the worse for the centuries which have passed over it, yet has time not passed it scathless, as we find by comparing its present aspect with that described by Froissart in 1334. Among other changes we find that it was then completely surrounded by water, a fact difficult of belief, but, coming from the painstaking Sir John, not to be disputed. On the south side, at the bottom of the rock, and defended by a battery in which a garrison is still kept, stands the governor's house. From this with vast labour the steps of a long stair, ascending between the cliffs, have been cut out of the solid rock. Near the top of this stair in ancient times there was a great iron gate or portcullis, that was drawn up or let down as occasion required. This gate so effectually divided the higher part of the castle from the lower that tradition says at one time the English held the south side, while the Scotch continued to possess the north. A square tower on the north side, built in the hollow between the two peaks, is said to have been the residence of Wallace (whose sword is still to be seen at the castle), while the English were in possession of the south side. On the western top, which is by thirty feet the highest portion of the building, are the remains of a watch-tower, from whence seven counties may be seen, taking in Ben Lomond with its beautiful loch, so well known by Scott's description in "The Lady of the Lake," and afar off Ben Nevis, amid hundreds of others as beautiful but less known; and here also at its very base is Leven, tranquil and pastoral as when Smollett so beautifully sang its praises in one of the sweetest and simplest odes in the English language. The following is from a descriptive poem by an Argyleshire poet:—

> The gleaming lake, the ever-changeful sky,
> Old ocean's waves in view, the prospect wide,
> The stream, slow winding in the grassy vale,
> The broken cliff abrupt, the waving flood,
> The barren heath, the lofty mountain wild,
> Whence soars the eagle on strong pinions borne,— > Sublime the soul, and nurse her dormant powers.

DANDY-LION—IN FLOWER, AND SEEDY.

seeds of lupins, larkspurs, and sweet peas, I observe his mature deliberation. Before putting them into the ground he surveys the little space, and walks round, with his garden trowel in his hand, ere he ultimately decides upon the precise spots where the future embellishments of his hobby shall display their beauties to the sun.

If he has a book in his hand you may be sure it is Abercrombie's "Complete Gardener," which to him, good soul! is as indispensable in the rearing of Flora's beautiful progeny as Buchan's or Graham's "Domestic Medicine" to the mother of a numerous family.

There is only one wish ungratified—he is not rich enough to put out his washing! and every six weeks he is sure to have some mischief to repair, some unfortunate flower's broken neck to deplore—for washerwomen, who are not bed-makers, invariably use a kitchen-chair in their operation of "hanging out," and make four woeful holes in the light sifted earth wherever they pitch!

Summer comes, and he sits in his snug arbour at the extremity of the garden, with his pipe and tankard, and sometimes with a "brother clerk," viewing with pardonable pride the many-coloured carpets his hands have woven.

The sun sinks. He lays aside his pipe, and fills the capacious watering-pot — giving the thirsty flowers their evening draught, which they gratefully acknowledge by exhaling their sweetest odours.

ALFRED CROWQUILL'S SKETCHES.

THE HORTICULTURAL MAN OF BUSINESS.

From the days of Adam the love of gardening has been inherent in the human breast. Even the monotonous and artificial life of those doomed to spend the greater part of their days in the smoky atmosphere of a commercial city is not sufficient utterly to destroy this innate feeling.

Some there are, indeed, who appear to possess no sympathy with the beauties of nature, displayed in the green and refreshing hues of the vegetable kingdom, or to reflect that the slice of mahogany on which they daily labour was once the pride of the forest and bore other leaves than those of the ledger and day-book. I say appear, because I do not believe there exists "a man with soul so dead" as not to feel, in a greater or less degree, the calm and sweet exhilaration which the fields and woods produce—a perfect consciousness of the truth that "God made the country, man the town."

How much natural pathos is there in the act of the mere boy (snatched from his pleasant native fields to become the occupant of a dingy office), who, still clinging to a flower as a part of the Elysium of his childhood, places it before him in a phial of water on the desk where he daily drudges, gazing upon it with a feeling of first love—pure and holy—a feeling which is never wholly lost even amid the blaze of the golden successes of his manhood. The pleasant vision still lingers in his imagination, but, unfortunately, it too frequently happens that increase of business involves him in a mesh from which he finds it daily more difficult to extricate himself—and he dies regretting, too late, the fields and flowers of his life's morning sacrificed to Mammon.

I was induced to employ my present worthy tailor from seeing a box of scarlet runners growing in the window of his narrow little cell in the corner of an alley—there was something so pleasant in the sight!

I have spoken of man generally, but there is a particular class who positively prove the correctness of my observation; men who have toiled all the youthful part of their days in the great Babylon—who, by industry, have been enabled, at the age of forty, perhaps, to quit their close apartments in the "courts" and "buildings" of the metropolis, and take a house in the suburbs, with a small garden in the rear!

My neighbour is of this class. With what pleasure I view him from my study window wielding his hoe and rake! The blue-aproned gardener who works by the "day, month, or year," is as a drone compared with this bee. The love he bears his new vocation renders it a pleasure—and how he toils!

He is a picture for a painter, with his short tartan plaid jacket, his thick shoes, and straw hat. How erudite does he become! With what an air he rattles off botanical Latin to the delight and pride of his little wife (who fondly believes he could speak the language if he chose), and the great admiration of the city friend who smokes a pipe with him, and believes him to be the most wonderful man of his acquaintance—"errors excepted."

Although I am sure he possesses a truly Brahminical feeling towards all created things—(for I never saw him crush anything—ever taking off the slugs and snails, and other destructive vermin, with a tender hand, and hurling them over the mural boundary of his little domain into the adjoining field—preferring banishment to the infliction of death)—I have seen him throw little pebbles at the cats who only intruded their whiskers over his walls. Indeed, so fearful is he of their claw-digging, that he will entertain none in his domestic establishment; rather suffering the invasion of mice and their petty peculations in his larder than the spoliation of his trim garden. The gravel walks are as bright and clean as the bed of the golden Pactolus; his parterres trimmed with thrift; and not a weed attains a day's growth, unless, indeed, it springs up in the identical spot where he has planted seed—marked with a white painted lath, and numbered—then his want of botanical knowledge sometimes spares the offender—for, like a merciful judge, he gives the criminal the benefit of his doubts: but, as is the fate of other pretenders, it flourishes only for a time, and, like an unsuccessful candidate at Cambridge, it is plucked!

There is always employment in a garden: but the seasons for turning the soil and sowing the seed are his delight.

POPULAR PORTRAITS.—No. XXXIII.

SIR C. NAPIER.

Sir Charles Napier's is the great naval name of the day. The achievements of the last war are but "as a tale that is told" to the present generation; and the two great battles of Algiers and Navarino, under Lord Exmouth and Sir E. Codrington, are now long enough ago to have paled in the recollection of men. But the taking of Beyrout and Acre seem as things of yesterday; nor have the circumstances connected with the taking of the fleet of Don Miguel, while Napier was in the service of Don Pedro, lost their interest in the eyes of the admirers of bold, decisive, and successful strategy, though, from political changes and the springing up of other subjects, the action is seldom alluded to in public discussion. The leader, planner, and animating spirit of all these enterprises, and of many more which we cannot particularize, was Commodore Sir Charles Napier, who, after nearly half a century of battle and storm on the ocean, has embarked on a sea scarcely less tempestuous, by changing the quarter-deck for the floor of the House of Commons, where, laying aside the warrior and assuming the legislator—cedant arma togæ—he sits as the representative of the metropolitan borough of Marylebone. And a very amusing, plain-speaking, blunt, downright, bluff "old salt" of a member he is. To our eyes he seems the very ideal of the old sea song embodied: it is almost impossible to conjure up a more fitting representative of

> The brave old commodore,
> The run old commodore, except that the "bullets and the gout" seem to have respected his corporality, and left him little the worse for the life of battle, siege, and storm he has passed through; and so far from its being the fact that

He'll never more be fit for sea,

we will answer for it he would take the command of a fleet to-morrow, and batter down the Sultan's seraglio at Constantinople, or give Mehemet Ali a "ditto repeated" at Acre, with the most perfect indifference as to whether he was bombarding Turk or Egyptian; whichever of them might have the misfortune to encounter him might rest assured that what he undertook would be thoroughly performed with "no mistake" about the matter

The personal appearance of the gallant officer would disappoint those romantic individuals who expect every hero to be either a Hercules or an Adonis. The commodore is as little like either as possible; he is short and stout, with a head somewhat bald, and a face of which the prevailing expression we should say is good-humour. He has a pretty considerable contempt for the graces of the toilet; but except for extreme carelessness, sometimes verging on the shabby, his costume has nothing remarkable in it, but the large sou'wester, or broad-brimmed hat of more than Quaker-like dimensions, which he occasionally sports. He sits, votes, and speaks with the Liberal party; and we believe is rather more of a Radical than a Whig. Like most men who have entered Parliament late in life, he used to be continually committing violations of the forms of the house; he would ask a question and append a speech to it, and be called to "order;" he would present a petition, and proceed to take a speech, and be called to "Order" again; if he had to explain, he would travel far beyond the limits allowed—which is another breach of "order;" and if any gentleman said anything he dissented from he would express his dissent rather loudly, without waiting for the end of the speech—a great sin against "order." His perplexity on these occasions is very amusing, every step he takes seeming to entangle him more and more in the network of "form;" his last resource is to sit down abruptly, and say no more. He is not at all scrupulous in speaking his mind. He once plainly told Mr. Hume that he was "a fool;" and but a few nights have elapsed since he called Mr. Ferrand "the greatest humbug in the house." Candour is a virtue, and it is refreshing to find even one man who says what he thinks. The commodore carries this independence of mind into his professional duties; he once electrified the house with a description of the unceremonious and unseemly manner in which he disposed of certain orders not to fight, sent him by a civil first lord of the Admiralty, when he was in command in the Mediterranean. It is needless to say that he thoroughly disobeyed them. In fact, he seems always to have done pretty much as he liked, following his own impulses, which were to act promptly and bravely, and his plans were uniformly guided by a skill that, fortunately for the nation, has been successful. Had it been otherwise, the case of Admiral Byng might not have stood alone in history. Of his courage there can be no doubt, nor of his eccentricity. He has been both admiral and general, for in Syria he led a charge of Turks, "flourishing his stick over their heads, to make them do their duty,"

Alike to him the sea, the shore,
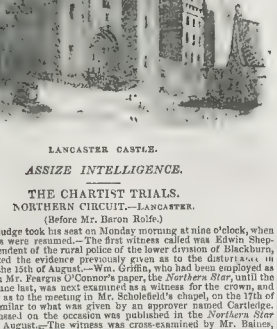
The brand, the bridle, or the oar, may be said of him as of Sir Sydney Smith, whose name is also united with that of Acre. But one proof of his courage seems to us even more decided than his taking of Acre itself; after blowing the citadel of Mehemet Ali about his ears, he "greatly daring," and without the fear of poison before his eyes, took pipes and coffee with the pacha as if nothing had happened!



LANCASTER CASTLE.

ASSIZE INTELLIGENCE.

THE CHARTIST TRIALS.

NORTHERN CIRCUIT.—LANCASTER.

(Before Mr. Baron Rolfe.)

The learned judge took his seat on Monday morning at nine o'clock, when the proceedings were resumed.—The first witness called was Edwin Sharples, superintendent of the rural police of the lower division of Blackburn, who corroborated the evidence previously given as to the disturbance in Blackburn on the 15th of August.—Wm. Griffin, who had been employed as a reporter upon Mr. Fergus O'Connor's paper, the Northern Star, until the beginning of June last, was next examined as a witness for the crown, and gave testimony as to the meeting in Mr. Schofield's chapel, on the 17th of August last, similar to what was given on the same day by an approver named Cartledge. The address passed on the occasion was published in the Northern Star on the 20th of August.—The witness was cross-examined by Mr. Baines, Mr. Sergeant Murphy, Mr. Atherton, and Mr. O'Connor. He admitted that he first gave information in this matter about the middle of September; that he had been living in Ireland since, and had five shillings allowed him, for which Mr. Irwine was responsible. He denied that he ever said he would be revenged of Mr. O'Connor before he died. He admitted that he had advised the witness Cartledge to give evidence on behalf of the crown; and that, at the time he dined with Mr. O'Connor, he had given the information which led to his (Mr. O'Connor's) arrest.—John Hanley, a reporter for the Manchester Guardian, proved the passing of certain resolutions at the meetings held in Carpenters'-hall.—Matthew Maddex, a constable, of Ashton, proved the violent conduct of the mob at Ashton, on the 18th of August, and the reading of the Riot Act.—Samuel Newton, James Whittam, Charles Slorack, and other witnesses, gave evidence as to stopping the works at several mills, but their evidence was not important.—The Attorney-General then said this was the case for the prosecution.—After a considerable discussion on the framing of the indictment, the learned judge intimated that he felt great difficulty, as to the numerous counts of the indictment. All the defendants were jointly charged with being guilty of conspiracy to cause a cessation of labour, in order to carry the Charter; and also with riot, unlawful assemblages, &c., without any such charge. It was clear that on many of these counts some of the defendants must be acquitted, whilst others might be found guilty on them, and acquitted on others. This created a difficulty, and it was hard to say how judgment could be given on such a record.—The Attorney-General quoted a decision of Lord Denman to prove that, though guilty charges with all the offences, one act of defendants might be acquitted on one count, whilst others were convicted, and e converso.—After much discussion, the learned judge intimated that there would be much difficulty in sustaining that view of the case, and the Attorney-General abandoned the four last counts of the indictment, charging the defendants with riot. On the fifth count, which will materially affect Mr. F. O'Connor, and on which the charge is per*s*ading and inducing others to cause a cessation of labour, and without charging that they persuaded them to do so by violence, the learned judge said there was a difference of opinion in high quarters as to whether mere persuasion constituted a crime at all, or not.—Mr. Dundas then proceeded to address the jury on behalf of the defendant Robert Brooke, in a most eloquent speech of some length.—He was followed by Mr. Baines on behalf of the Rev. J. Scholefield; and by Mr. Sergeant Murphy for Dr. M'Douall, Railton, and Derham, each of whom made powerful appeals in behalf of their clients, complaining in strong terms of the complicated nature of the indictment, and of the number of defendants included in it. At the conclusion of the speech of the latter learned gentleman the court adjourned until the next morning.

TUESDAY.—Mr. Atherton appeared for Fenton and Stevenson. He said the indictment was remarkable for the number of defendants included in it, and which threw upon the jury the especial duty of taking more than ordinary care that the case should be proved against each of the accused. The nature of the charge, and the penalties which imposed upon the defendants excessive hardships. In ordinary cases a man was liable but for his own acts, or for the acts or speeches of those acting with him and in his presence, while, under this conspiracy, a man is rendered accountable for the acts and the speeches of men of whom he knows nothing, and who are totally unconnected with him. The defendants, too, were poor men, unable to search out through the country means of procuring evidence, and opposed to all the power and unlimited means of the Crown. It was said the recommendations on the part of the Chartists to the maintenance of peace, law, and order, were mere words of mockery, but on what ground? These words had been all along the watchword of the Chartist meetings. The acts of the Chartists, the recommendations of their organs, were all in accordance with these words, and they could now be inferred, that, if activities before, they become a mere pretence in the commencement of this later agitation? The jury had before them witnesses who were acquainted with all the secrets of the Chartist conspiracy, and knew of the kind appealed. It might appeal almost to the demeanour of the defendants during the continuance of that trial, and to their exemplary peaceful conduct under what must have been to them, considerable provocation, as some evidence of the peaceful tenor of their principles. He would conclude by one observation, that in all political struggles there would be firebrands, who would wish to seek by violence to obtain that which others were endeavouring peacefully to attain.—Mr. M'Oubrey addressed the jury on behalf of Mooney and Aitkin. He said he would not go over the ground which his learned friends had already trodden, and which applied to the evidence at large. He would confine himself to the evidence solely as it applied to his two clients. He pointed out the facts connected with them which had been deposed to by the various witnesses, and contended that their conduct was one of not guilty.—George J. Harney addressed the jury. He apologized for his inexperience, and said he had been induced to undertake his own cause with the feeling that innocence was in itself the best defence. He was a resident at Sheffield, and knew nothing of the turn-out for a week after it commenced. He felt that he was brought there, however, not really as a conspirator, but as a Chartist. That was his offence, and he would be inferred, that, for principles

On the 1st of April will appear, price 3s. 6d., full coloured, Part I. of a New Edition of BETTS'S FAMILY ATLAS.
To be Completed in FOURTEEN MONTHLY PARTS, each containing Four Maps, or Two Double Sheet Maps, and eminently suited for PARTS OF THE KNOWN WORLD
The Proprietor has much satisfaction in appearing before the public with a NEW EDITION of a work which has already elicited for him much public and private commendation, and of this affording he trusts to many individuals the opportunity of supplying themselves with a valuable work at a very reasonable price, and on a plan which is found most convenient by a large portion of the community.
The present edition will possess the advantage of the introduction of several new and very important Maps, the whole work having also undergone a thorough revision, every new and important change and settlement will be found carefully introduced. The Maps of ENGLAND, WALES, SCOTLAND, and IRELAND are on an unusually large scale, accurately showing the various lines of Railways, the Turnpike and Principal Cross Roads, Rivers, Canals, &c. (that of England and Wales alone embracing no fewer than 8000 names. The Maps of the BRITISH COLONIES are also on a large scale; and, as a whole, the Proprietor feels confident that the work will be found fully to support the character it has obtained, and he confidently invite patrons even a larger share of patronage than on the first appearance. Extracts from a few literary notices of the former edition are subjoined.—
"The work is correctly described in its title as a good FAMILY ATLAS, compiled with care, executed with great beauty, and sold at a moderate price; and we observe that considerable attention has been made to bring down the information to the latest moment" Athenæum.
"This is a very elegant book of maps, the whole of which appear to have been got up with great care, and to be exceedingly accurate; they are printed from steel plates, and are remarkably clear. * * * Mr. Betts deserves the thanks of the public for the manner in which he has executed his labours." Gleaner.
"* * * Independently of these claims to notice, the cheapness of the work, and its elegance of appearance, must insure its popularity."—Morning Herald

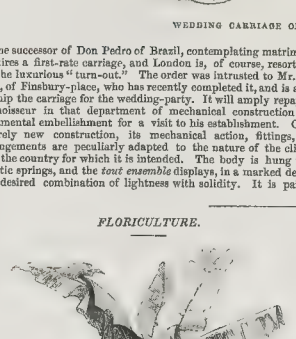
WEDDING CARRIAGE OF THE EMPEROR OF THE BRAZILS.

The successor of Don Pedro of Brazil, contemplating matrimony, requires a first-rate carriage, and London is, of course, resorted to for the luxurious "turn-out." The order was intrusted to Mr. Palliser, of Finsbury-place, who has recently completed it, and is about to ship the carriage for the wedding-party. It will amply repay the connoisseur in that department of mechanical construction and ornamental embellishment for a visit to his establishment. Of an entirely new construction, its mechanical action, fittings, and arrangements are peculiarly adapted to the nature of the climate and the country for which it is intended. The body is hung upon elliptic springs, and the tout ensemble displays, in a marked degree, the desired combination of lightness with solidity. It is painted green and yellow, richly gilt-mounted, and ornamented with silver. The windows are of plate glass in mahogany frames, and there are Venetian blinds, which act in a novel manner for the admission of air. The lamps are of cut glass, beautifully set off by silver ornaments. In front of the carriage are carved the coffee and tobacco plants, emblematical of the staple riches of the country; and at the back are the same ornaments, with flying dragons and snakes, richly gilt. The interior is lined with white figured satin, and the roof with fluted satin, from the centre of which is suspended a handsome tassel, and the sides of the interior are surrounded with spring curtains and footcloths. The appearance is altogether extremely chaste as well as rich.

FLORICULTURE.



THE PLANTAIN.

The Dwarf Plantain, Musa Cavendishii, being the species introduced by the Duke of Devonshire, is at this time producing its fruit at Jessop's nursery, Cheltenham. It rises with an herbaceous stalk ten feet high, with leaves more than six feet long and two feet broad, with a strong fibrous midrib, and a great number of transverse veins running from the midrib to the borders. The plant has grown with great rapidity, having come to its present perfection in nine months, so that it is expected to perfect its fruit in twelve months, and make way for a succession of plants now appearing. The flowers came out in bunches from the centre of the leaves, with a spike three feet in length; each of the bunches was covered with a spatha or sheath of fine purple colour within, which drops off when the flowers open. The fruit is now green, but when ripe is said to be of a yellow colour, and filled with a pulp of a luscious sweet taste; several hundred fruits grow on a spike, which is often as large as to weigh half a hundred, and frequently much more. But reckoning the weight of a cluster only at forty pounds, and a spot planted of a little more than a thousand square feet will contain from thirty to forty plants, such a plantation would produce more than four thousand pounds of nutritive substance. Calculating that as thirty-three pounds of wheat and ninety-nine pounds of potatoes require the same space as that in which four thousand pounds of plantains are grown, the produce of plantains is consequently to that of wheat as 133:1, and to that of potatoes as 44:1.

The plantain is one of the greatest blessings bestowed by Providence upon the torrid zone, offering its produce indifferently to the inhabitants of equinoctial Asia and America, of tropical Africa, and of the islands of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. Wherever the mean heat of the year exceeds 75 deg. of Fahrenheit, the plantain is one of the most important and interesting objects for the cultivation of man. Its produce, as already mentioned, is enormous; and for an immense portion of mankind is what wheat, barley, and rye are for the inhabitants of Western Asia and Europe, and what the numerous varieties of rice are for those of the countries beyond the Indus. The natives of both Indies, to many millions of whom it supplies their principal food, eat it with avidity, the fruit being a very sugary substance. Three dozen plantains are sufficient to serve one man for a week instead of bread. The ripe fruit of the plantain is preserved like the fig-beg, being dried in the sun. Meal is extracted from the fruit by cutting it in slices, drying it in the sun, and then pounding it.

CULTURE.—The dwarf plantain is well worth growing as a fruit for the table in our hot-houses, and is propagated by carefully takingoff the suckers, planting them in pots filled with light rich earth, and plunging them into a tan-bed in the stove. These plants must be plentifully watered, for the surface of their leaves being large, there is a great consumption of moisture. The plant now in fruit has been daily supplied with two buckets of water. The most sure method to obtain fruit in our stoves is to plant them into the tan-bed; the roots will then extend themselves many feet each way in the earth, and these plants will thrive a great deal faster than those which are confined in pots or tubs, and with the thermometer ranging from 75 deg. to 90 deg., in a very moist atmosphere, will certainly bring to perfection the beautiful and nutritious spike of fruit.

OXFORD, Wednesday.—The following gentlemen were this day elected Proctors for the year ensuing: The Rev. William Edward Jelf, M.A., Student and Censor of Christ Church. The Rev. Andrew Douglass Stacpoole, M.A., Fellow of New College.—At a meeting of the Vice-Chancellor, Heads of Houses, and Proctors, in the Delegates' Room on Monday last, the practice of using vehicles prohibited by the statutes of the University, which has of late prevailed amongst the under-graduates to a serious extent, was discussed, when it was resolved: "That the attention of the junior members of the University be specially directed to the statute, which prohibits the use of vehicles of all descriptions; and that they be informed that its penalties will be enforced against all persons who shall be found driving in, or otherwise using phætons, tandems, gigs, or any other description of carriages, whether drawn by one horse or more, in violation of the said statute."

SCOTLAND.

MARISCHAL COLLEGE, ABERDEEN.—On Thursday week the Marquis of Breadalbane was elected Lord Rector of this college. The other nominees were Sir James Macgregor, Lord March, and the Marquis of Waterford.

THE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.—The Edinburgh Weekly Chronicle says that the non-intrusionists are proceeding vigorously with preparations for seceding. Their agents, chiefly females, are going from door to door distributing printed invitations, and soliciting subscriptions. The leading clergymen of the movement have given some proof of their determination to sacrifice their endowments, by giving up their expensive houses for cheaper dwellings. Plans for the new wooden churches have been ordered, and other symptoms appear of a real intention of carrying the long-deferred threats of seceding into execution.

SPORTING INTELLIGENCE.

Among the distinguished persons who honoured the meet of the Quorn hounds, at Rolleston Hall, the seat of the master, on Monday, the 6th instant, were his Royal Highness Prince George of Cambridge, their Graces the Dukes of Leeds and Montrose; Lords Cardigan, Wilton, R. Grosvenor, W. Russell, Gardner, Manners, Cholmondeley, Wellesley; Hon. H. H. Wilson, C. Forester; Sirs W. W. Wynn, R. Bromley, G. Palmer, W. Carew, J. Prince George was on a visit to the Earl of Cardigan, at Deene Park, Northamptonshire. On Saturday, the 4th instant, a stag was uncarted at Loddington Rectory, which afforded a magnificent run, in which his Royal Highness went most gallantly, being shown the way across the cream of the Leicestershire country by his noble host in first-rate style.

THE MARKETS.

CORN-EXCHANGE.—Another very scanty arrival of English wheat has taken place up to our market this week, but it has proved in excellent condition. The stands on each market day have exhibited but a comparatively small number of samples of both red and white; yet the demand for them has ruled very dull, at barely, but at nothing quotable beneath last week's figures. The sale for both free and blended wheats has proved extremely inactive, and, when sales have been forced, lower figures have been accepted. Barley and malt have maintained their value, with a moderate inquiry. Good sound oats have commanded quite as much money; but the weathered parcels have had a downward tendency. Beans, peas, and flour have been a mere drug.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 48s to 50s; ditto white, 57s to 59s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 42s to 47s; ditto, white, 51s to 56s; rye, 34s to 38s; grinding barley, 27s to 29s; malting ditto, 30s to 32s; Chevalier, 32s to 36s; Suffolk and Norfolk malt, 56s to 62s; brown ditto, 52s to 54s; Kingston and Ware, 58s to 63s; Chevalier, 63s. Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 22s to 24s; potato ditto, 25s to 28s; Youghal and Cork, black, 17s to 18s; ditto white, 19s to 20s; tick beans, new, 24s to 26s; ditto, old, 34s to 38s; grey peas, 25s to 28s; maple, 32s to 34s; white, 36s to 38s; boilers, 42s to 47s per quarter Town made flour, 46s to 48s; Suffolk, 42s to 45s; Stockton and Yorkshire, 35s to 38s per sack. Foreign.—Free wheat, 52s to 55s. In Bond.—Barley, 20s; oats, new, 15s to 17s; oats feed, 14s to 15s; beans, 25s to 26s; peas, 32s to 37s per quarter. Flour, America, 22s to 24s; Baltic, 22s per barrel.

The Seed Market.—Although this may be considered the height of the clover season, very few transactions have taken place in that article this week. At other kinds of seeds go off slowly, at our last week's quotations.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed, English, sowing, 48s to 52; Baltic, crushing, 42s to 46s; Mediterranean and Odessa, 40s to 43s, hempseed, 32s to 40s per quarter. coriander, 10s to 12s per cwt., brown mustard seed, 7s to 11s; white ditto, 10s to 10s 6d tares, 4s to 5s 3d per bushel; English, new, 40s to 45s; Scotch and Yorkshire, 35s to 38s per Linseed cakes, English, £10 to £10 10s, ditto foreign, £7 to £7 10s per 1000; rapeseed cakes, £6 5 to £6 per ton.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread are from 7d to 7½d; of household ditto, 6d to 6½d for the 4lb loaf.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 48s 3d; barley, 27s 6d; oats, 17s 3d; rye, 29s 0d beans, 26s 7d; peas, 34s 1d.

Imperial Averages of Six Weeks which govern Duty.—Wheat, 48s 3d; barley, 27s 4d; oats 17s 6d; rye, 28s 11d; beans, 27s 2d, peas, 29s 9d per quarter.

Duty on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 20s 0d; barley, 8s 8d, oats, 5s 8d; rye, 11s 0d; beans 11s 8d; peas, 11s 6d.

Tea.—There has been a very steady demand for most kinds of bohea black and green teas this week, and former prices are freely paid. Several arrivals—amounting to about 5,000,000 lbs.—have taken place since our last. The stock in London is now 27,691,000 lbs., against 30,197,000 lbs. at the corresponding period last year.

Sugar.—This market has ruled firm the whole of the week, and prices may be considered 6d to 1s per cwt. higher, with every prospect of a further advance.

Coffee.—This article has been rather more in request, but we have no variation to notice in price.

Molasses.—Several parcels of Old St. Vincent's and fair Demerara have sold—the former at 24s 6d, the latter 25s per cwt.

Fruit.—The demand for currants is dull, but no further reduction can be quoted in prices. Deans raisins are still in demand at 29s, with a decreasing stock. In French fruit, little doing.

Metals.—We have not the slightest improvement to notice in this market, which remains heavily stocked.

Oils. The article still rules dull, but prices are not lower.

Saltpetre.—The prices remain much the same as before quoted. About 4607 bags have gone at public sales, at late rates.

Provisions.—The best kinds of Irish butter are selling on full terms; but the middling descriptions are a dull sale. Fine foreign butter is in demand at late rates.—fine Dutch realising 118s to 120s. There is not the least improvement in the bacon market. Prime Waterford, landed, is selling at 35s to 36s.

Tallow.—The market is quiet, and we have sellers of P.Y.C. on the spot at 43s to 43s 3d per cwt.

Hops.—Good coloury hops may be considered quite as dear; but all other kinds are little sought after.

Wool.—The imports this week have been very small—viz., about 600 bales and bags. By private contract, a very limited amount of business is doing, at the late depression in prices.

Potatoes.—About 1970 tons of potatoes have reached the Pool from various quarters since Monday. Good sound qualities command full rates. In other kinds, however, little is doing.

Coals. Adair's, 18s; Hedley, 17s 3d.; Hetton, 18s 9d; Lambton, 20s 9d; Adelaide, 16s 6d; Eyre, 17s 6d; Hetapar, 16s 6d; Killoe, 19s 9d, Seymour Tees, 18s per ton. Ships arrived, 18.

Smithfield.—The primest of each description of stock has sold steadily this week, at a trifling improvement in value. In other qualities, however, little has been doing. Beef, from 3s to 4s 2d, mutton, 3s to 4s 2d; lamb, 4s 8d to 5s 6d; veal, 3s 8d to 4s 8d; and pork, 3s to 4s per 8 lbs., to sink the offal.

Newgate and Leadenhall.—Although we have been fairly supplied with both town and country killed meat this week, the general demand has slightly improved, and the following are the ruling prices:—Beef, from 2s 6d to 3s 8d; mutton, 3s to 3s 8d; veal, 3s 8d to 4s 6d, and pork, 3s to 4s per 8 lbs., by the carcass. ROBERT HERBERT.

COMMERCE AND MONEY.

Nothing has occurred in the commercial circles during this week of much public importance, but any alteration which at the same time may have taken place in any department of manufactures, small though it may be, is of a favourable description. Although the supplies of cotton wool will be much increased when the winds permit arrivals from the west-ward, yet still the demand by the manufacturers for this raw material has, during the week, been so considerable, that a slight advance in its value must be quoted. For sheep's wool but an inferior still exists a fair demand, at late prices, from which we may infer that in this article also productive employment continues to be obtained by our workmen. In the fancy goods trade, however, improvement is more rapid than it is either in the cotton or woollen trades. From Paisley the accounts continue to be much more favourable than could have been expected so soon after the great distress which prevailed there at the close of last year.

In the money market the same difficulty of safely and profitably employing money, to which we have latterly had occasion so repeatedly to allude, still continues to exist, and the consequences are, that a further advance in the value of those public securities in which confidence can be placed. In Consols the increasing demand has again been attended by advancing prices, and that to the nearest value of three days ago. In Bank and East India Stock similar effects have been produced, and commercial acceptances of known respectability for definite periods are uncommonly scarce, as they can be easily turned into cash at the rates of from 2 to 2½ per cent. per annum. In the Foreign Stock Exchange, also, the abundance of money continues to create a gradual improvement in the value of most descriptions of foreign securities. In those of the Peninsula the improvement is increased considerably by the prospect of immediate commercial treaties, by which the revenues both of Spain and Portugal must eventually be materially increased, and the regular payment of the dividends rendered more certain. In the Bonds of Mexico and Colombia a gradual rise is weekly also in progress occurring, but the reason is not very obvious, for capitalists generally prefer adhering to their money dealings to the chances of large but uncertain profits. In one respect, however, the abundance of money is conferring many benefits on the people at home. Large investments of it continue to be made in railway shares, and thus an additional spur is given to these important undertakings. From one extremity of Great Britain to the other improvements in them continue to take place, those of the Edinburgh and Glasgow line having risen to par, and 5s/ are on sale at the present quotation of 2½, for a more decided rise, towards the end of the intensive month, a very confidently anticipated by their proprietors. Money has been also invested this week in the shares of those lines which heretofore have been much neglected, and have consequently been much depressed in their value. On the whole, it is very satisfactory to notice returning soundness in this great department of British industry.

The foreign exchanges during the week are again favourable to a further importation of specie.

LEGISLATION UPON INSANITY.

We last week addressed our readers upon the subject of the verdict given in the case of M'Naughten, the insane assassin. The remarks which we then had occasion to make have since been honoured with approval from high and influential quarters, and the numerous letters which we have received from general correspondents, entreating us to return to the theme—have held out to us an inducement to pursue our argument, which has been more than confirmed by the early Parliamentary proceedings of the week, and by the common siege which has been laid to the question by the whole of the contemporary press. It is in truth one of great and grave importance. It involves on one hand the liberty of the subject, on the other the security of the community—here the licence of tyranny, there the punishment of crime. It places society upon the horns of that fearful dilemma, which exhibits, as it were, the Scylla and Charybdis of morality, with no faithful compass whereby philosophy may steer between. On one side there is the dreadful danger of punishing with human visitation an affliction cast down from Heaven—of making one whom God has declared irresponsible by an awful fiat as amenable to the just trammels of reason as though she held her throne within his brain—in a word, of crushing madness with the retribution which the law can only direct with majesty against crime; while on the other side society rears its crest alarmed, and claims protection from the Legislature not only against the degrading and afflicting act and guilt of assassination, but equally against the impulse of monomania, by which the unconscious murderer of the moment may bring them fatally into force. Society, too, has a still further claim—that the presence of madness in the commission of such a sin against its brotherhood should be indisputable and distinct, and that no protection of the law should be misapplied to the sane criminal taking upon himself the "feint and measure" of the delusion which gives impunity to the really mad.

Between the difficulties which thus present themselves it has been found most hazardous and almost impossible to steer, at a time when the circumstance of the M'Naughten assassination, and the universal dissatisfaction expressed at the result of the M'Naughten trial, seem to have rendered it all but imperative that some passage should be found. On Monday night, the Lord Chancellor addressed the House of Lords upon the subject, as one full of importance and fraught with difficulty; and he discreetly, and perhaps wisely, preferred the doctrine of prevention to that of cure. He intimated his intention to attack the system of allowing monomaniacs to go at large, by more stringent legislation in their respect; and he seriously promised to bring the opinions of the judges to give weight and guidance to the decision of their lordships' house; but he still left untouched the crisis of emergency in which the social relations of the country are placed by the apparent coherency in the first place, and impunity in the second, of this M'Naughten murder.

Lord Brougham, Lord Cottenham, and the rest of the law lords followed the Chancellor almost in a similar spirit to the tenor of his own speech, expressing, however, only their belief in the propriety of the verdict according to evidence, but their dissatisfaction—some at the way in which that evidence was permitted to be taken, and others at the abrupt conclusion of the trial without the examination of the witnesses for the defence; the reply of the counsel for the prosecution, with its natural and fair influence upon the minds of the jury; and the summing up of the judge upon some more complete superstructure of evidence than was adduced by the mad-doctors, and their very peremptory qualifications of medical conceit. The fact is, that public impression accords the imputation of madness to M'Naughten, so far as delusion on one point is concerned; but it does not admit that the delusion extended its mania to the commission of the act, which seemed rather deliberate than otherwise; neither does it allow, what is most material to obtain the pardon of society for the crime of a man only partially insane, that he did not know and fear the consequences of that act, and possess a perfect consciousness that in its commission he was violating the laws of his country in the most fatal spirit of the penalty which they exact. It is this doubt about the insanity of the criminal (who has hitherto, according to the newspaper evidence of the week, slept so well in Newgate, and who is now removed to sleep in Bedlam more serenely still), in regard to the act of murder (not in reference to the delusion which justified it to the maniac's mind, for no law can recognise any justification), that has so unsettled the public feeling upon the whole question, and created an anxiety for more definite legislation. All our correspondents concur with us that the suggestion thrown out by us last week, having for its object banishment without punishment—a mild asylum at Norfolk Island instead of a "retreat of idleness" in St. George's-fields—would help the ends of justice by curbing, on the one hand, the desire to be profitably insane, and crushing, on the other, a sense of the impunity of crime, even in monomania as well as in simulated insanity. The injured parties at home, too, would feel that some little consideration was held by the country for their affliction, and that at least the poor reparation of the absence of the murderer would be afforded to those who had borne a load of bitterness and mental anguish for his crime. Lord Campbell echoed this suggestion in the House of Lords.

This, however, is only a part remedy, and a greater strictness of the prevention of facilities for the exercise of lunacy is, perhaps, better still. One thing, however, is certain. Everybody will look with anxiety for Lord Lyndhurst's proposition, because everybody feels that the trial of M'Naughten, if it has not disappointed justice, has at least evoked a distinct and universal belief in the necessity for a better protection of the public against the madness which, doubting in theory, they are forced to admit in practice, and which may, under the disgraceful semblance of morbid delusion, fix the brand of assassination upon the character of the land.

PUBLIC SUPPER OF THE SCHOLARS AT CHRIST'S HOSPITAL.

One of the most interesting Lenten sights of the metropolis is the supping in public of the scholars of Christ's Hospital on the evenings of eight Sundays, terminating with Easter-day. On these occasions admission may be obtained by tickets, liberally granted by the president, governors, and other officers of the hospital, "the noblest institution in the world."

These suppers are held in the magnificent hall, which, next to Westminster Hall, is the noblest room in the metropolis. It measures 187 feet in length, 51 wide, and 46½ high. It was designed by the late Mr. Shaw, architect to the hospital, and is in the style of the last period of pointed architecture, before its Italian debasement.

Provided with your ticket you enter the court-yard from Newgate-street, where the rattling of carriages denotes the arrival of the distinguished company, and the light streaming through "the stately range of beautiful windows, with their stained glass arms and devices," indicates that the hall is prepared for the occasion. The public are admitted to the floor of the hall as well as to the gallery facing the organ loft. Assuming your privilege to be for the latter, you enter by the arcade beneath the hall, whence you ascend on the left by a newelled stone staircase to the gallery. The scene from hence is very impressive, the vast apartment is lit with a double row of chandeliers with argand lamps. Immediately above you is Holbein's vast picture of Edward VI. granting the hospital charter to the city; and on the long line of wall facing the windows is another great picture—"Charles II. giving audience to a deputation from the hospital," by Verrio. There are other paintings here, but they are seen to less advantage than the flat-ribbed ceiling, the well-proportioned windows, the tasteful oak fittings, and, in short, the beautiful as well as gigantic architecture of the hall. The company fast pour in, and "the trade boys," a party to each table, bring in baskets of bread, knives, &c.; leathern piggins, into which the beer is poured from a leathern jack; and one brings candles, which are lit and set about the tables, already laid with the cloth. The boys next stream in, and seat themselves at their respective tables, each of which has its separate nurse. All being thus prepared, precisely at seven o'clock the official procession enters, consisting of the Lord Mayor, president, treasurer, and governors, walking two by two; the organ rolls forth its "billows of sound;" the assemblage stand up en masse, and join in the hymn, which is led by the singing-boys in the organ-gallery. Meanwhile the distinguished personages take their seat on the raised dais stretching across the further end of the hall. The Lord Mayor takes a carved chair, made of oak from old St. Katharine's Church; behind him sit the official personages, and next the distinguished visitors — invariably numbering many elegantly-dressed ladies; whilst other visitors are accommodated beneath the windows. On the opposite side a Grecian, or elder boy, mounts the pulpit; and, silence being enforced by three strokes of a hammer, he proceeds with the evening service, appropriate lessons, prayers, &c., at the close of which the supper commences; the visitors walking to and fro, between the tables. It is a homely meal of bread and cheese, relieved by sundry "pulls" at the contents of the piggins—carrying many a spectator back to his own school-days. After supper, an anthem accompanied on the organ is sung, that on Easter-day being composed by one of the senior scholars, and the subject of an annual prize in the school: an impressive prayer or blessing follows. The organ again peals forth, the singing-boys from the gallery join their full notes, and the ladies having found their shawls, and the cloths rolled up, the nurse of the first table leads the way, followed by the boys, two and two, towards the Lord Mayor, where she curtseys and they bow two and two; the trade boys carrying the baskets, piggins, &c., and the rolled up cloths, which add grotesqueness to their etiquette. Having passed the dais, they return by nearly the whole length of the room to the door by which they entered; and thus the obeisance continues until the whole number of boys, upwards of 800, have disappeared. The official personages then retire, the organ ceases, and by this time the majority of the general company have quitted the hall. The spectacle is altogether a most impressive one, awakening associations of general benevolence, and an especial sense of the excellence of this right royal institution.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.—The Paris papers of Friday week and Saturday contained no intelligence of any importance. It was stated that the differences between France and Spain were at an end, and that M. Lesseps was to be promoted with a view to his removal.

COUNT VILLEMAIN had addressed a letter to the Gazette de France, in which he states that Don Carlos is "actually a prisoner at Bourges;" that "the Prince, before entering the French territory, had merely asked leave to cross it;" and "that he had been detained ever since."

The Paris papers of Sunday were chiefly taken up with publishing the additional accounts that arrive from Guadaloupe and Martinique of the dreadful effects of the late earthquake. The French Government has lost no time in coming forward to aid the unfortunate sufferers, and the Chamber has already been called on to vote 2,500,000 francs, or £100,000. Private subscriptions are also opened in the capital, and no doubt a considerable sum will speedily be raised for that benevolent purpose.

The Paris papers of Tuesday, and journals and correspondence from Madrid and Barcelona up to the 29th inst., have come to hand, but they are totally destitute of anything interesting to the general reader.

SPAIN.—We have received the Madrid journals of the 3rd and 4th inst. The elections were still going on favourably for the government in the capital. Messrs. Argueiles and Mendizabal were so much ahead of their opponents that their return appeared certain. In the provinces the government had, on the whole, gained some ground; but in the Basque provinces the Carlist rand dates had an immense majority.

The Lisbon mail of the 6th has arrived. An important decision had been come to by the Chambers, to the effect that royal nomination was sufficient to establish the right of bishops to a seat in the Upper Chamber without appeal to the Pope AMERICA.—By the packet ship England, Captain Bartlett, which arrived at Liverpool on Saturday, we have advices from New York to the 21st ult.

Although the period for the adjournment of Congress was fast drawing nigh, yet that body had not turned its attention to anything like business. Mr. Rives had offered a series of resolutions, having for their object the assumpt.on by government of the State debts, which occupied the attention of the house for nearly two days, but, upon a division, the numbers being equal, the motion was lost. The Committee on Foreign Affairs had reported a bill to consider the Oregon Territory Bill was referred, had made an adverse report on the bill from the Senate, with a recommendation that it be not adopted. A bill had successfully passed to curtail the expenditure of the country by the reduction of the salaries of the various officers of State, but not those of the members of Congress.

From Canada there is no news, except that the health of Sir Charles Bagot had not in the slightest degree improved.

Advices from Campeachy, six days later, informed us that the Campeachians still held their position, and that the Mexicans had rather advanced their warris in their attempts to gain possession of the city. Reinforcements had arrived for the Mexican army, but it really is not as strong now as when the siege first commenced. Commodore Perry, who had succeeded Mr. Conner in the command of the Guadelope steam-ship, together with his first lieutenant, had been peremptorily ordered to their proper spheres, and had accordingly sailed for England.

The Somers mutiny case continued to occupy a large share of public attention, but no decision had been come to in reference to it.

From the Cape of Good Hope we hear that the threatened attack upon Phupolis had not taken place, and it was expected that as the troops advance the Boers will leave the country quite clear. The accounts from the eastern frontier are favourable, and everything seems to be in safety. The accounts show the great increase of St. Elizabeth during the last year; the Customs had improved from £402s, in 1841, to £10,060, in 1842; whereas Cape Town had only increased £1,000 during the same period.

UNITED STATES AND CANADA.—ARRIVAL OF THE ACADIA.—The Acadia arrived at Liverpool on Tuesday from Halifax in twelve days and a half, bringing between twenty and thirty passengers. As we anticipated, she has brought the account of the repeal of the backrupt law, which is the chief feature of her news. Trade was apparently very bad, and great complaints prevailed in consequence.

CANADA.—SIR CHARLES BAGOT.—Montreal, Feb. 15. We understand from Kingston that a most remarkable change for the better had taken place in the health of the Governor-General. On Saturday evening last he was despaired of. On Monday morning about one o'clock, however, his Excellency was seized with a vio ent fit of vomiting, which relieved him completely, his disease having been an abscess in the stomach, and not dropsy. His Excellency was so much better that fears were no longer entertained for his safety.

RIO BRAZILS.—The Brazilian mail, which arrived at Falmouth on the 11th inst., brings news of a change of Ministry, which was announced on the 19th January in the Chamber of Deputies. The Chambers had been discussing the reply to the Emperor's speech on the opening of the legislature. It was expected that the Brazilian ships of war, a frigate, a corvette, and two brigs, would be despatched at the end of February, or the beginning of March, to Naples for the Emperor's bride. The Prince Royal was shortly expected. Mercantile affairs at Rio yet looked very gloomy, especially as to importations, while the exportations had consi erab.y fallen off. The new crops of coffee promised a plentiful harvest, and the sugar crop in the Island Cam.os did not afford a similar promise for sugar. The Emperor visited the French war steamer Gomere on the 7th, on her return from the Falkland Islands, and similar honours were paid to her by the salutes from the fort of Britannic Majesty's, the French, and Brazilian ships of war there. Her Majesty's ships Alfred, Madagascar, Viper, Crescent, and Patridge, were at their moorings. The latter, we think, must soon be ordered home.

In addition to the shocking details of the ravages attending the earthquake in the West Indies given in our last, we regret to announce that accounts have been received of the destruction by the same cause of Port Louis, and other places in Guadaloupe, and of an immense loss of life by a similar calamity. We find the following on this melancholy event in the ministerial evening journal the Moniteur:—"A new shock of earthquake after the last fallen on one of our principal colonies. The earthquake of February 8th, which had only caused partial disasters in several islands of the Antilles, has covered with mourning almost the whole of Guadaloupe, and the important town of Pointe-à-Pitre no longer exists. We lay textually before our readers the report which the Governor-General Gourbeyre has addressed to the Minister of Marine from the scene of the disaster. Orders have just been sent by telegraph to Brest, Toulon, and Rochefort for money, medicines, and a million of rations to be sent immediately to Guadaloupe. The following is the despatch of the Governor General

"'Basse Terre, Feb. 8th, three o'clock, P.M.

"'An earthquake, which lasted seventy seconds, has just thrown the inhabitants of Guadaloupe into the utmost consternation. This event took place this morning at half-past ten o'clock. A large number of several buildings have fallen down, and a number of houses are so injured as to be no longer habitable; fortunately, no life has been lost. At Santes, all the houses built of masonry-work have been overturned. The quarters to-ward have much suffered; persons have been killed and wound ed. I have this moment learned that Pointe-à-Pitre no longer exists. I am about to get on horseback and proceed to the scene of the disaster.

"'Pointe-à-Pitre, Feb. 9, Three o'Clock

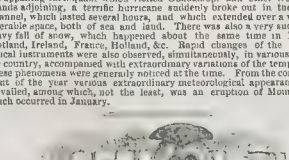
"'Pointe-à-Pitre is entirely destroyed. What was spared by the earthquake has since been assailed by fire, which burst out a few minutes after the houses fell. I am writing in the midst of the ruins of the unfortunate city in presence of a population without food and without asylum, in the midst of the wounded, of whom the numbers is considerable (it is said from 1500 to 1800). The dead are still under the ruins, and their number is calculated at several thousands. The fire is still raging. All the quarters of the colony have suffered. The town of Moule has been destroyed, and 30 persons are dead. The small towns of St. Francois, St. Anne, Port Louis, Bertrand, and St. Rose, have been overturned, and in all there are dead and wounded. I implore in favour of the inhabitants of Guadaloupe that inexhaustible goodness which, from the throne, pours forth so many benefits. I implore also France to stretch forth an aiding hand to us, as she has already done to Martinique. She will not abandon this population, entirely French, nor leave to stretche lessa the widows and orphans whom this terrible disaster has overwhelmed. I shall speedily send you such details as I shall be able to collect. I fear that the sugar crop will be lost, for the mills are all destroyed. Famine stares us in the face: prompt succour is absolutely necessary. Journals has much suffered; Petit-Bourg is destroyed.

"'(Signed) , Governor.'"

The Messager adds:—"By a happy circumstance the soldiers of the garrison of Pointe-à-Pitre had time to evacuate their quarters, and we have only to deplore the loss of three of them. Martinique only felt the earthquake slightly. We hear of no victims or any material damage."

The Moniteur Parisien says:—"The calamity was increased by the occurrence of a vast fire. Two thousand bodies are said to have been dug out of the ruins. It is certain that there were an equal number of wounded. At the moment when the account left 500 persons had undergone amputation, and died after the operation."

The Moniteur further states, that about forty eight hours preceding the appalling earthquake which visited Guadaloupe and other West India islands adjoining, a terrific hurricane suddenly broke out in the British Channel, which lasted about twenty hours, and which extended over a very considerable space, both of sea and land. There was also a very sudden and heavy fall of snow, which happened about the same time in England, Scotland, Ireland, France, Holland, and Belgium. Changes of the meteorological instruments were also observed, simultaneously, in various parts of the country, accompanied with extraordinary variations of the temperature. These phenomena, combined with the fact that there were an equal number of the year various extraordinary meteorological appearances have prevailed, among which, not the least, was an eruption of Mount Etna, which occurred in January.



HOUSE OF COMMONS.—SATURDAY, MARCH 11.

In the HOUSE of Commons on Saturday petitions on various subjects were presented.—Several railway and other private bills were advanced a stage.—After a discussion, in which the Government were taunted by some of their own friends, as well as by the Opposition, with not having taken proper care to secure a "house" on Friday evening, it was arranged that the committal of the Registration of Voters Bill would be taken on this day; and that the second reading of the Ecclesiastical Courts Bill should stand postponed to Monday, the 10th of April.—Adjourned at six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The house met at five o'clock.—The LORD CHANCELLOR informed the house that he had received a letter from Sir Gordon Bremer, in answer to the vote of thanx for the gallant and meritorious conduct of the officers of China, which was read. The letter was then ordered to be entered on the journals of the house.—Lord CAMPBELL gave notice that on Monday, the 20th of March, he would move certain resolutions respecting the difference which at present existed in the Church of Scotland, with the view of preventing the schism which was threatened, or, if it occurred, of preventing it from being so calamitous as it would otherwise be.—Lord WARRENCLIFFE said that he was directed by the Committee on the New Houses of Parliament to report that they had agreed to the following resolution:—"That there should be no delay in building the House of Lords beyond what was absolutely necessary for the safety of the works, that the architect should be directed so to conduct the works as to have the House of Lords fitted up for their lordships' accommodation by the session of 1844, and that if he thought that by doing so any danger to the rest of the works would be occasioned, that he should report the same to the house."—The same Noble Lord laid on the table, by command, the report of the Railway Department.—The LORD CHANCELLOR then brought under the notice of the house the question of partial insanity as exculpatory of criminals, for the purpose of expressing his opinion thereon, and of stating the nature of the legislative measure he was willing to introduce on the subject. After alluding to the great sensation created in the public mind by the late trial, he proceeded to show what the rule of law was on the point, and how far it allowed occasional insanity to be a valid plea to the commission of a criminal act; and, in doing so, he cited the opinions of several eminent judges. The law, according to all authorities that was, that, unless the person afflicted with monomania, delusion, or partial insanity were suffering under its influence at the moment of committing the crime, unless he was then unable to distinguish right from wrong, he should be held accountable for his act, notwithstanding his occasional defect of reason. That was the law not only in England, but in Scotland, in France, and in Germany; and it was a law founded on justice and reason. The mode and form of administering the law with regard to persons so circumstanced were precisely similar to those applied to others accused under like charges; nor could any solid argument be adduced against their having the same species of trial, the same defence, and the same line of examination. The question, then, for their lordships to consider was—the law being clearly laid down, and the mode and manner of administering it being unobjectionable—whether it would be practicable or judicious to alter the law or to change the procedure under which it was at present administered. It was his opinion that it would neither be practicable nor judicious, nor indeed possible, to do either. The only thing left to their lordships to attempt by way of legislation was to try if any preliminary measure could be framed which would have the effect of preventing for the future a recurrence of the crime which had, so recently and so fatally, been committed. He would in a few days lay a bill on their lordships' table having that intent, but, such were the difficulties that surrounded the subject, he could not undertake to say with certainty that it would effect what it was intended it should. In referring to the late trial, the Lord Chancellor declared that, while no question could be raised upon the acuteness of the law, as laid down by the judge who presided at it, and while it was plain that no alteration of the verdict would have ensued, had the evidence been continued to the end, he should have been better pleased had it been allowed to go on in the usual way, and to terminate only when the witnesses on both sides had been fully heard. In order to obtain the united opinion of the judges on the general rule of law, he suggested a consultation of all these learned persons.—Lord BROUGHAM also regretted that the late trial had not been allowed to take its regular course, and condemned the manner in which witnesses had been questioned at it—If newspaper reports spoke true—as to their opinions upon facts given in evidence by other witnesses—a mode of examinat on that had the effect of virtually placing witnesses in the position of jurymen. It was much to be lamented that, in the absence of precision in the nature of terms, language had not always been used by the judges, so as to convey a precise and correct impression of their full meaning. If the person committing the offence knew at the time that he was doing wrong, if he took premeditative to attain his end—used the same means as any rational man would to accomplish his purpose—and if he knew at the time that he was committing an act forbidden by the law—could he, according to the present test—legislate Correnham was glad that the Lord Chancellor had taken up the subject. As the Legislature could do would be to keep the law in a proper state, to see that the judges kept to the path of their duty, and that the juries applied the law as laid down by the judges. It was precisely that the juries applied the law in each particular case. He would support any plan which would insure more security to the public than the present law afforded, but should view with the greatest jealousy any alteration that would give greater facilities for the confinement of individuals than now existed.—Lord CAMPBELL, though he had no doubt of the proper acquittal of M'Naughten, would have considered it more satisfactory, if the trial had been permitted to reach its natural conclusion, and if the reply of the Solicitor-General and the summing up of the judge had followed in the regular course. It was most desirable to have some guide to assist them in declaring the law in cases of this kind, and this might be embodied in a declaratory Act. The learned Lord alluded to the treatment extended to unhappy persons of this class, by reason of their confining notions of character. He thought that, after acquittal, they should be removed from the public eye, to some place where they would never more be heard of.—The Lord CHANCELLOR replied to this last observation, that he precisely had the power to confine those unfortunate persons wherever she thought proper, without any further legis ation on the subject. With respect to the general question, he would take the earliest opportunity of calling the judges before their lordships to give their opinions on the law.—The house then adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

Mr. Newdegate, the newly-elected member for North Warwickshire, in the room of Sir Eardley Wilmot, and Mr. Matthewson, the new member for Ashburton, in the room of the late Mr. Jardine, took the oaths and their seats.—On the motion of Sir F. Baring, a new writ was ordered for the election of a burgess of the borough of Ripon, in the room of Thomas Perrington, Esq., who has accepted the stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds. Also a new writ for the election of a burgess for the borough of Cambridge, in the room of Sir A. Grant, who has accepted the stewards up of her Majesty's manor of Poynings. (A laugh.)—In answer to a question from Mr. MCKinnon, Lord STANLEY said the accounts received from Ashantee by the Government were very imperfect, but he feared the newspaper accounts were not exaggerated as to the extent of the damage from the recent earthquake. It might become his duty hereafter to call upon the house to aid the colony with a loan, which was the only shape in which they could afford relief.—On the motion for going into a committee of ways and means Dr. Bowring and Mr. Ainsworth, the two members for Bolton, entered into statements, contradictory of one another, as to the feelings of the inhabitants with respect to the necessity for the erection of barracks in that borough.—Mr. James Gibson inverted to the late bankruptcy trials, and to the particular evidence of Mr. J. Wilcox, who had stated that he had been in communication with Sir James Graham, and wished to know if there were any objections to the production of the correspondence.—Sir James Graham had received numerous communications from the disturbed districts at the time, but could find no trace and had no recollection of any correspondence with Mr. Wilcox. The nature and duty of the Home Secretary explained the circumstances under which he had been led to propose to release Sir James Graham from further attendance on the trials, by substituting the evidence of Wilcox, and defended his temperately in conducting the prosecutions on the part of the Crown.—Mr. Thomas Duncombe said that he had received many communications, all bearing testimony to the impartial conduct of the Attorney-General.—Mr. Ferrand moved the subject of a mill being erected in the workhouse of the Halifax union, which Sir James Graham had described, on the authority of the Poor-law Commissioners, as a kind concern, but which he affirmed was a rag-mill, on which rags collected on the Continent, and impregnated with diseases, were to be crushed. He moved for papers containing lists of the guardians of the Halifax Union, &c.—Sir James Graham, after remarking that Mr. Ferrand had originally spoken of a tread mill, and that he was occasionally led astray by inaccurate information, said that though he had in the present instance been himself misled, and had called the rag-mill a corn-mill, yet that on state points on a former occasion had been substantially correct and resisted the motion.—Mr. C. Wood said that Mr. Gulson, the assistant Poor-law Commissioner, did not deserve the imputations thrown on him by Mr. Ferrand.—After a few observations from one or two members, Mr. Wallace expressed his regret that the papers had been refused, as he wished to argue any complaint made on behalf of the poor fully gone into.—Mr. Stuart Wortley recommended that the motion should be put in a shape which would bring the question as to the erection of the mill before the House, without mixing up the case of private indivi.uals.—A desultory debate followed, partly carried on in the absence of strangers, which ended in Mr. Ferrand withdrawing his motion.—The House then went into a committee of ways and means, and a formal vote was taken after which, on the motion of going into committee on the Registration of Voters Bill, Sir James Graham, in reply to Mr. Liddell, stated that clauses had been prepared in order to provide against the fraudulent personation of voters, which would be added to the bill.—Mr. Hume did not anticipate much good from the bill, on ess more ample protection were given to the voters. The House then went into a committee on the bill, and on the fifth clause a long debate took place on an addition moved by Mr. T. Duncombe, that the grounds of the objections to voters should be added, instead of the simple words, "objected to;" but this was rejected by 51 to 47.—Mr. Tufnell, in moving that when an overseer objected to a vote, he should be compelled to give notice of the objection to the voter. This amendment was resisted by Sir James Graham, and rejected by 91 to 38.—At the 11th clause, Mr. Ainsworth objected to the tax-paying clauses of the Reform Act, as being unnecessary to the qualification of a voter, and moved their omission. He considered that the sufficient guarantee for with the exception of Mr. Marshall and Colonel Rolleston, who were absent from the house. After a delay of several minutes Mr. Marshall came into the house, and hastened up to the table, amidst great laughter, and cries of "Hear, hear." A further delay ensued, in consequence of the continued absence of Colonel Rolleston, and, at five o'clock, Lord G. SOMERSET said, that, as it was five o'clock, and the hon. member for the southern division of the county of Nottingham (Col. Rolleston), not having appointed a member of the committee for trying the merits of the petition against the return for the borough of Athlone, had not appeared in his place within one hour after the meeting of the house, there was no alternative left for him (Lord G. Somerset) but to move that, according to the standing orders, the hon. and gallant member be committed to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms. (Hear, hear.) The question was put from the chair, and agreed to.——Several private bills were advanced.——Lord Ashley gave notice of a motion for the 28th, on the subject of our opium trade with China.—Mr. Ewart postponed his Corn-law motion until after Easter. Sir R. Peel stated, in answer to Mr. Wallace, that the Portuguese Government had made considerable advances towards the views of our Government in the pending treaty, but not to an extent that could be considered as yet satisfactory. Another month would enable him to say whether or not we were to have a commercial treaty with Portugal. Sir R. Peel gave notice of his intention to move, on the 8th inst., for leave to bring in a bill to facilitate the completion of a survey map, on a large scale, of the metropolis.—Mr. Ward, in a speech of considerable length, introduced his motion for a committee to enquire into the peculiar burdens that press upon the landed property, and into the peculiar exemptions enjoyed by it. He could show that the power of the landlords had been systematically applied to the exemption of themselves from taxation, and that a combination existed amongst them dangerous to the other interests of the country.—Mr. G. Bankes moved, as an amendment, that the attention of the house should be directed to certain associations deserving the public peace, and inconsistent with the principles of the constitution; and, in doing so, took occasion to contradict the charge which Mr. Cobden had, on a previous evening, made against him, of paying to the men in his employment no higher wages than eight shillings a-week, and of having in his neighbourhood the worst paid, worst clothed, and most illiterate people in England. This he did by reading several letters, which showed that his average rate of wages was from nine shillings and some pence as high as twenty-five shillings a-week, with other advantages, the principal number ranging between these sums. He also said that the peasantry of his neighbourhood were as well, if not better, with respect to wages, clothing, and education, than those in any other part of the country.—Mr. Cobden said he had not spoken particularly of Mr. Bankes, but of the system which he upheld. Colchester Election Petition.—Mr. Bramston moved for the Report directing its attention to the dangerous and treasonable proceedings of the Anti-corn law Association. Such associations had been put down before, and there could be no doubt that the machinery of the League might be applied to insurrectionary purposes.—Sir R. Peel could not vote for the amendment, because it had no immediate connexion with the motion, and because it would be only right to give a separate consideration to Mr. Ward's motion. To that motion he could not agree. Should the committee be appointed, it would not be satisfactory to the gentlemen who proposed it unless there were a majority of their own opinion on it, which, he begged to say, as a committee, he could let permit. The peculiar burdens on the land were great, and returns of these might be laid before Parliament. With respect to the Corn-law, in his considered that any further alteration would not be required, nothing should induce him to continue it. Believing that the agricultural body was right to expect him to maintain the law until he was convinced of the necessity of a change, he felt bound to say that his intention at present was to maintain it.—Mr. Blackstone congratulated the house and country on the declaration made by Sir R. Peel of his fixed determination to maintain the present law. That declaration would give universal sat sfaction, and put an end to the hopes that existed in some quarters of being able to tamper with the law. He trusted, also, that the threat of importing American corn, at a nominal duty, through Canada, would not be again heard of.—Mr. W. Martin, Mr. Woodhouse, and other hon. members spoke against the motion, and it was supported by Mr. Williams, Mr M. Gibson, Mr. Villiers, and Lord Howick.—On a division, it was rejected by a majority of 99—there being for the motion, 133; against it, 232.—Adjourned at a quarter past one

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Wednesday.

The House of Lords did not sit.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Wednesday.

Colonel Rolleston was brought up in custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, for being absent from his duty as a member of the Athlone Election Committee, and a plausible excuse having been made, he was discharged on paying the fees.—Sir J. Graham declared his intention not to discuss the Poor law Amendment Act before Easter, though he should lay it on the table previous to the recess.—Mr. French, on the suggestion of Lord Eliot, moved for leave to bring in a bill to amend the Medical Charities Bill.—The Dogs Bill, after a division, in which there were 129 ayes and 129 noes, and despite a caution given to hon. members by Mr. G. Berkeley to beware of "house bank" in the event of a tie, becoming law, passed through committee. The adjourned debate on the question of privilege arising out of Howard's action was then resumed.—Lord J. Russell rose to move, as an amendment to the position of the Solicitor-General, to direct the defendants to plead—that Thomas Barton Howard be summoned to the bar of the house. He believed that, after the resolution of the 3rd of May, 1837, declaring the bringing of such actions like the present a breach of the privilege of the house, the Solicitor-General should have proposed, not only to plead to the present action, but to go into committee to alter the existing law, and to prevent actions like it. He proposed some other mode of dealing with this sort of actions. The course he should recommend was, to call Mr. Howard to the bar, and to inquire from him whether he proceeded in his action for an excess of the lawful authority of the house by its officer, or whether he disputed the authority of the house altogether. Great embarrassment and great peril would impend on the house if they resolved no longer to assert their privileges, but to submit them to the decision of the courts of law.—The Attorney General was not prepared to abandon the privileges of the house, nor was he willing to go along with those who were the advocates of compromise. But, on precedent, and on the ground that it was the course most consistent with the dignity of the house, he was of opinion that the defendants should be directed to plead to the action, and that the cause should be tried in Westminster Hall. By calling the plaintiff to the bar they would be giving him an opportunity of addressing the house, and visiting him in the way he most desired.—Sir R. Peel said, though his first inclination was against pleading, yet, if they did not plead, the action would proceed, and damages would be given, they would be driven to the necessity of committing innocent men, the agents of the courts of law, and he, therefore, could not avoid coming to the conclusion that the best thing that could be done would be to plead to the action. But while consenting to plead in this case, he was quite alive to the importance of not in any degree submitting the privileges of the House of Commons to the authority of any court of law. To plead and commit at the same time, as was proposed by Lord J. Russell, would [illegible] Mr. Wakley believed that [illegible] the house [illegible] the [illegible] Mr. Hawes [illegible] Mr. Hume [illegible] Mr. Aglionby [illegible] Mr. Bernal [illegible] Mr. Ewart [illegible] Mr. Bernal Osborne [illegible] Sir R. Peel, in reply, said he had not thought proper to recommend a course of proceeding in concurrence with them. Any unpopularity which might follow the assertion of the privilege of the house could not be admitted as a legitimate reason at any time for not exercising that privilege when circumstances imperatively demanded it. All ancient precedents were in favour of commitment, and in those modern instances in which counsel had pleaded, they had surrendered their privilege to the courts of law. To do so in the present instance would be to place in peril the constitutional authority of the house. They were bound, if not to commit Howard, at least to refuse to plead to his action.—The Solicitor-General could not discover amidst the learning and research exhibited by Sir Thomas Wilde what practical mode he had suggested for extricating the house out of its difficulty. If it were decided not to plead, what would be done with the action? Judgment would go by default, and a jury would be empannelled to assess the damages; and would the house then call the jury, or the under-sheriff, or the judges to the bar? It was not to be supposed, because an erroneous judgment had been given by the Court of Queen's Bench in the case of Stockdale and Hansard, that, were they again to plead, a similar decision would be pronounced against their privilege. There was no instance prior to 1840 in which the house had imprisoned the sheriffs or other officers for executing the due process of the law. They had the modern precedents of Burdett v. Abbott, and of Stockdale v. Hansard, in favour of pleading; and, after the maturest consideration of the present case, the same course was that which he felt it his duty to recommend. Should the court of law again demur against the house, he then could see no means of preventing a collision between them, except by some legislative enactment. He should decidedly oppose Lord J. Russell's amendment.—The house was subsequently addressed by Lord Howick, Sir R. Inglis, and other hon. members.—Lord J. Russell's amendment was rejected by 137 to 84; and the original motion was carried by 135 to 71.—A select committee was appointed, on the motion of Mr. Hutt, to inquire into the distribution of foreigners resident in this country.—Returns connected with the Halifax union were ordered.—Adjourned at half past two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Thursday.

The Lord Chancellor took his seat on the woolsack at the usual hour, but no business of importance being before the house, their lordships sat only ten minutes.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Thursday.

The Nottingham Lighting Bill was read a third time and passed.—Mr. Fergand gave notice that he would, on the 30th March, move for leave to bring in a bill to compel the allotment of waste lands enclosed to the labouring classes.—Lord Lincoln gave notice that on March 30 he would move for leave to bring in a bill for the better regulation of buildings in the metropolis.—Colonel Sibthorp gave notice that he would, in the week after the Easter recess, move a resolution for the reduction of the duties on fire insurance.—The house was counted; and there being but thirty-five members present, the house adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Friday.

The Attorneys and Solicitors Bill was read a third time and passed.—Lord Stanhope presented several petitions, one against the great use of machinery, which led to some observations in favour of machinery by Lord Brougham. Lord Campbell postponed his motion respecting the Scotch Church till the 27th instant.—The Marquis of Lansdowne moved for a [illegible] form of the correspondence between the Envoy in China and the British merchants trading in Canton. Agreed to.—Adjourned to Monday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Friday

The Speaker took the chair at four o'clock.—Sir James Lastage and Baillantine Bills, the Southport Harbour Bill, and the Preston Water-works Bill were severally read a second time.—Mr. Wodehouse gave notice of his intention, on Monday next, to move for a copy of the Report of Dr. Bowring to the Foreign-office, while in Berlin, with respect to the import duties.—Mr. F. French gave notice of his intention, on Monday next, to put a question to the noble lord the Secretary for Ireland, as to the truth of a report that had been circulated, that 4000 men had marched into Waterford, threatening to resist by force the payment of Poor-rates in Ireland.—Mr. Crawford, after complaining of the house being counted out last night, now gave notice that he should bring on the motion on Thursday the 30th of March.—Mr. Aglond asked whether it was the intention of the Government to bring forward the Education Bill in its present form, or to divide it into two bills?—Sir J. Graham replied that he did not intend to divide the bill, but he would take the two principal clauses pari passu. On Friday next he would move that the bill be read a second time.—The house then went into committee on the Registration of Voters Bill.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

Court of Aldermen.—A Court of Aldermen assembled on Tuesday at Guildhall for general business, which was fully attended. The Right Hon. the Lord Mayor nominated the Bishop of Norwich, who was requested to preach the Spital Sermon before the Governors of the Royal Hospital, at Christchurch, Newgate-street, on Easter Monday next. The Sheriffs delivered in returns of the number of prisoners, with the state of health, at the several goals of the city.—The Gaol Committee presented a report on considering a letter from Sir James Graham, with a code of proposed rules and regulations for the city prisons, and for new dietaries to be observed there, which they recommended the court to direct all the governors and other officers of the prisons strictly to carry into effect. The court unanimously agreed with the report, and gave orders accordingly. The court, after disposing of routine business, and referring various petitions for examination, broke up at an early hour

Bank of England.—The half-yearly meeting of the proprietors of Bank Stock was held on Thursday, when a dividend of 5½ per cent, interest and profits for the half-year ending 5th April next was declared, and the Governor informed the court that the dividend warrants would be delivered and paid on Thursday, 6th April

Retirement of Lord Abinger.—We are able to state on good authority that Lord Abinger's retirement from the bench is at length determined on, and will take place previously to Easter Term. Sir Frederick Pollock will be his lordship's successor. Sir W. Follett will become Attorney-General, and the Solicitor General's place will be supplied by Mr. Fitzroy Kelly, if that learned gentleman be successful in his new attempt to get into Parliament.—Globe

On Wednesday night the first weekly meeting of the Anti Corn law League took place at Drury-lane Theatre, which has been hired for the purpose. The theatre was well filled by a respectable audience. In the boxes there was a number of ladies, who occupied nearly one half of that portion of the theatre. The stage was occupied as a platform, the speakers addressing the audience from the front of the footlights. The stage was filled with the leaders and members of the League and their friends. Mr. Wilson was called to the chair, when a number of spirited speeches were delivered, and a series of resolutions adopted to give effect to the object of the meeting.

The Royal Exchange.—Great progress has been made during the last few days in placing the sculptured coping above the colonnade as well as over the other parts of the building. The transition is more striking on account of the elaborate workmanship being all performed ere the stone is raised, and but a short time is now required, with the improved machinery at command, to fix it at once in its position.

THE ISLAND OF FORMOSA.

Among the intelligence from China, brought by the late overland mail, is an event which must very seriously threaten the good understanding which we had hoped was restored between ourselves and the Chinese. This event is no less than a [illegible] massacre of British subjects in the island of Formosa [illegible] mountainous province of Fo-kien, on the eastern coast of China. It appears that, late in 1841, and early in 1842, while the war was yet at its height, two British ships, the Nerbudda and the Ann, were wrecked on Formosa; and, deducting a few who were drowned in landing through the surf, 297 of the two crews [illegible] were [illegible] became—must have reached the shore in safety. On the cessation of hostilities, 10 are restored to us [illegible] the heads of Sir H. Pottinger, in his careful proclamation, [illegible] Commissioner, that 237 persons belonging to the Nerbudda [illegible] long to the Ann, have either been put to death by [illegible] of the Chinese Government in Formosa, or had to undergo [illegible] treatment and starvation." It seems that, immediately [illegible] reaching the shore the crew of the Ann were seized, [illegible] and marched some distance without a particle of covering, exposed to a cutting north-east wind. Two men died from cold, and several others dropped from the same cause and fatigue, and the people in [illegible] vessels to the capital (about ninety miles from the spot where the brig was wrecked), where they were separated into small parties, and put into distinct prisons in irons." They were almost starved; and those who did not die under this treatment were, for the most part, beheaded, in or about August last, by "the Chinese authorities of the island, who allege that they perpetrated this cold-blooded act in obedience to the Imperial commands"—commands which Sir H. Pottinger asserts to have been drawn from the Emperor by the gross misrepresentations of those very authorities, and of whom, consequently that the sufferers were unarmed, unresisting, inoffensive, and distressed seamen, and camp-followers, it is difficult to speak in terms of too great indignation and abhorrence. Sir Henry has already threatened the Chinese with a renewal of hostilities, [illegible] declared that the Formosan authorities, with whom this massacre originated, "shall be degraded and punished; their property confiscated, and its amount paid over to the families of the innocent men who have been put to death." The laws of humanity loudly call for their vindication, which, it is hoped, may not renew our quarrel with China. The proclamation states:—"Among the sufferers is Mr. Gully, a British merchant, who was returning to Macao from the northward, as a passenger by the Ann. It is not possible to account for the lives of the six European and American seamen, and three natives of India being spared; but it is surmised that they were considered to be principal men of their classes, and were intended to have been sent to Pekin, to be there executed." The majority of the sufferers were natives of India.

Meanwhile, let us glance at the scene of this horrible event of massacre and starvation, rendered, if possible, more atrocious by its occurrence in a land of plenty; since Formosa is described as the granary of the eastern coast of China, supplying the celebrated port of Amoy, whence most of the Formosan colonists emigrated, with capital supplied by its merchants; and, in proportion as the island has flourished, so has Amoy increased in wealth and importance. Indeed, the western part of the island may rank with the best of the Chinese provinces: its surface is finely diversified, and watered by numerous rivulets descending from the higher parts of the island. Settlements were formed here, first by the Portuguese, and then by the Dutch; but both are now expelled. The epithet, Formosa (Lat. fair), is applicable only to the western part. The eastern side is rugged and mountainous, and occupied by races almost savage, who live by hunting, sleep on leaves, have scarcely any clothes or furniture, and tattoo their skin like the rudest of the South Sea islanders. Formosa is called by the natives, Tai-ouan. It is about 260 miles in length, and about 70 in breadth.

THE BRITISH FACTORY, CANTON.

The annexed engraving shows the immediate site of the conflagration, the view being taken from the bank of the river opposite Canton, directly in front of the foreign factories, as the warehouses and residences of the foreign merchants are called. They are all of granite or brick, and present a handsome and substantial front. The ground on which they stand, as well as most of the buildings themselves, are owned by the Hong merchants; the nation, English, French, or American, being denoted by the ensigns floating above the roof. The entire factories have not more than 600 feet frontage, with about 1000 feet depth; and within these narrow limits was conducted the whole foreign trade of the Celestial Empire. On each side of the factories may be seen a small portion of Canton, bordering upon the river; but, as the city is built upon low and flat ground, almost the whole of it is invisible from this point. In front of the factories a broad esplanade extends along the river, where the Europeans customarily promenade in the evening.

This portion of Canton is, however, a mere suburb, and does not contain many of the larger or public buildings. The several streets are commonly devoted to distinct trades: there is Carpenter-street, Curiosity-street (as the English call it), for the sale of antiques; and Apothecary-street, full of druggists' shops. The inhabitants of each division combine into a system of watch and ward for common protection. Fires are very common, and they are frequently not accidental: our engines have been adopted. The foolish notion of fatalism which prevails among the people makes them singularly careless as regards fire, although the conflagration in 1823 went far to destroy the whole city. Hog-lane, mentioned in the above letter, is one of the three thoroughfares crossing the foreign factories: it is more narrow and filthy than anything of the kind in an European town; it is lined with miserable hovels, occupied by abandoned Chinese, who supply drugged spirits to the poor ignorant sailors; and when the wretched men have been rendered nearly insensible by their poisonous liquors, they are frequently set upon by their wily seducers, and robbed as well as beaten. This quarter may have been the hot-bed wherein the recent disturbance was raised.

Meer Mahomed. Meer Musseer Khan. Meer Nour Mahoud.

THE THREE PRINCIPAL AMEERS OF SCINDE, FROM A DRAWING BY CAPTAIN POSTANS.

THE AMEERS OF SCINDE.

The Ameers, or Mahomedan chiefs, of Scinde, present the unusual form of a divided government, each chief possessing a certain portion of the country, yet ruling together under one title, as above designated. The eldest, Noor Mahomed (since dead); his second brother, Nusseer Khan, now the senior of the family; and the third, his cousin, Meer Mahomed. The country of Scinde extends for a distance of nearly 500 miles in length, from the mouth of the Indus upwards, and is exceedingly fertile, though at present wasted, and laid out in large hunting-grounds, the Ameers being devotedly attached to the chase, and sacrificing every other consideration to this absorbing passion for sport. We have now possessions on the Indus, within the Scinde territories; and the mighty river, so famous from Alexander's expedition down it, is navigated by iron steamers. The Ameers of Scinde, long jealous of our obtaining any footing in their country, and of opening the Indus to mercantile projects, resisted all our attempts to effect these objects; but Sir John Keane's army, in its march to Cabul, brought them to an understanding, and they appear to have remained ever since apparently well satisfied with the new order of things; though late accounts represent them as restless, and as being threatened with a visit by our troops under Sir Charles Napier. The latest intelligence from Scinde, received by the last overland mail, is to the effect that the Ameers, whose doubtful policy and intriguing conduct had during some weeks kept up the alternation of war and peace, have been influenced by the presence of Major Outram, with whom they are all personally acquainted, to enter into terms, which will, it is expected, establish a system of good intelligence between them and the Government of India. One of the youths of their family had attempted, by flying to a fort in a desert district, to baffle the intentions of the British commander, Sir C. Napier; but a force had been despatched, which soon obliged him to quit the fort, which was then destroyed. The necessity of requiring the most satisfactory conditions from the Ameers is obvious, for without such conditions neither the navigation of the Indus nor the progress of civilization on its banks can be secure for a year.

The Duke of Buccleuch commences his dinner parties on the 24th inst. at Montagu House. The Duchess of Gloucester, the foreign ministers, &c., will be invited.

Sir G. Cockburn has so far recovered from his illness as to be able to attend public business several hours every day.

Commissioners of Sewers.—On Tuesday, in the Court of the Commissioners of Sewers at Guildhall, Alderman Gibbs in the chair, Sir Peter Laurie brought forward a motion to the effect that those who approved of wood paving should be alone compelled to pay for it. Mr. King, after a few words, moved the previous question, which was carried by a majority of two; the numbers being against Sir Peter Laurie's motion 20, for it 18.

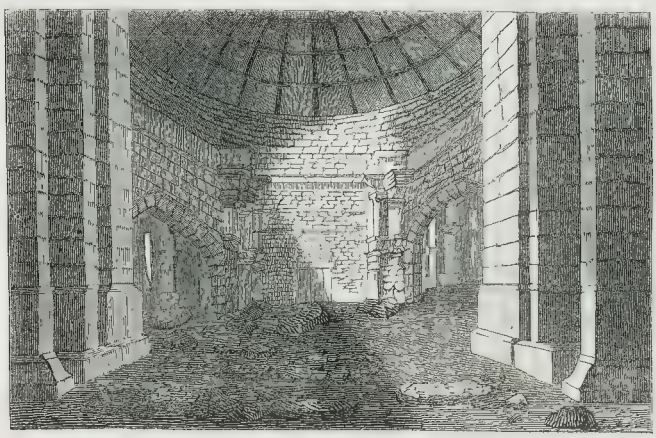
Removal of M'Naughten.—On Tuesday, at three o'clock, M'Naughten was removed from Newgate to Bethlem Hospital. He received with evident satisfaction the intimation that he was about to leave Newgate, and walked with a quick, firm step, to the outer prison gate, where a hackney cabriolet was in waiting to receive him. Mr. Cope alone accompanied the prisoner, and on arriving at the hospital, handed him over to the custody of the governor. He was immediately conveyed to that portion of the building, on the southern side, appropriated to the reception of criminal lunatics, where an apartment had been prepared for him. During his confinement the prisoner has frequently made inquiries as to the political movements which were going on, and has manifested great anxiety when, in the performance of their duty, the officers attempted to evade answering the question. His conversation generally is stated to have been interesting—frequently turning on mechanical subjects; but on one occasion only did he allude to the fearful crime committed by himself, and then only in the most unconcerned manner. He was impatient of confinement, and would sometimes pace his cell, backwards and forwards, for half an hour together. He slept remarkably well, generally retiring about ten o'clock, and seldom waking during the night. Since his acquittal he has been visited by his father, but no other relative has seen him. He attended divine service in the prison chapel twice on Sunday last and took part in the prayers with great apparent feeling.

TEMPLE OF SOMNAUTH.

Probably no place in the vast territory of India possesses more interest at this time than the Temple of Somnauth, the annexed engravings of which were taken from sketches made on the spot by Captain Postans. The almost interminable controversy which has been raging in the columns of our daily contemporaries with regard to the conduct of Lord Ellenborough in reference to these gates, and the recent debate in both houses of Parliament on his lordship's ostentatious restoration of a pagan temple, have doubtless rendered the subject sufficiently familiar to our readers to render it unnecessary for us to repeat all that has been said and written of these far-famed relics.

This great fane of the early worship of India is situated in the peninsula of Guzerat, near the ancient Hindoo town of Puttun, which is now inhabited by a Mohamedan population. The Temple of Somnauth stands on a sea-girt cliff, and was dedicated to the Lord of the Moon, whom, according to the old Persian historians, the sea itself worshipped. The mosque, which has been erected on the ruins of the ancient temple, is itself crumbling to decay, and of the five domes which once decorated it two only now remain; while the three entrances and the way leading to them are nearly blocked up by huge masses of stone, which have fallen from the roofs and ornaments of the building. A good deal of elaborate decoration, however, still appears on the back of the temple, but it consists of groups of small figures sculptured in the Jain taste. The present condition of Somnauth is one of ruin and abandonment; the interior a resting-place for cattle, and its decorative architecture the abiding place of the bat and the owl.

The Temple of Somnauth was originally one of the most splendid fanes of Hindooism, and of the very highest antiquity. Dedicated, at various periods, to the moon, to the self-existent, or Budh, and to the Siva of the Hindoo triad, it remained for centuries an object of the highest veneration to the people of India, until Mahmoud of Ghuznie, A.D. 1022, in his tenth expedition against the fanes of Hindooism, besieged Puttun and destroyed Somnauth. When the conqueror made good his entrance into this great temple, after having continued the siege for three days, and slain five thousand of its hapless defenders, he found an idol of stone, five cubits in height, surrounded by smaller images of gold, and standing in a sanctum supported by six pillars richly set with gems of the rarest value. Priests surrounded the altar, who, with prayers and shrieks, besought the King to spare their God; but the conqueror, rushing forward, aimed a blow at the idol with his mace, which severed it in twain, and from the body rolled gems, coins, and treasure incalculable. The priests were put to the sword, and by the command of Mahmoud the fragments of the idol were carried to Ghuznee, and cast before the Great Mosque in honour of the triumph of Islam; the mace of the conqueror was also long preserved, and, at the same time, probably, were taken thence the sandal-wood gates, although no mention is made of them by the historians.



INTERIOR OF THE TEMPLE OF SOMNAUTH.

Somnauth appears to have been restored as a Temple of Siva after its destruction by Mahmoud; but long years have past since its Hindoo origin was forgotten by the descendants of those who fought and fell for its honour, and the ruined mosque which now stands on its site is the property of the Mohamedan Government of Puttun, where it serves the purposes of a sheltering stable for cattle, and a resting-place for the wandering mendicant.

There remains, indeed, but little to mark its original greatness, for the interior of Somnauth consists simply of a large hall, supported on an octagon of pillars, with a smaller room, or sanctum, wholly undecorated. The floor of this first hall is covered with huge blocks, which have fallen from the roof, and the whole has an air of utter desolation. Yet the Persian historians tell us that when Mahmoud of Ghuznee, tempted as much, probably, by its reported wealth as by his religious zeal, laid siege to Somnauth, and, after a desperate resistance, planted the banner of the crescent upon its bastions, that he found a covered apartment, supported by six pillars, each pillar encrusted with gems of enormous value, and an idol of cut stone five cubits in height. This idol was venerated by the Hindoos more than any other; the attendants washed it daily with water brought from the Ganges. The revenue of ten thousand villages was assigned to the support of the temple; two hundred dancing women, with three hundred musicians, were ready to perform before it; many smaller images of gold and silver in the temple surrounded this the greatest of the gods; and three hundred barbers were in waiting to shave the devotees who sought admittance to the holy place. Such was the popularity of this obscene worship that the Princes of Hindostan devoted their daughters to the service of the temple, and, at the occurrence of an eclipse, sometimes as many as a thousand individuals came to perform their devotions. But 800 years have passed, and the hall of Somnauth has changed with its religion; it is now little but a heap of ruins, here and there a sculptured block alone revealing the cunning of the hands who chiselled its originally rich and gorgeous ornaments.

The following arrived in the last overland mail:—

THE GATES OF SOMNAUTH.

NOTIFICATION, BY THE RIGHT HON. THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF INDIA

Camp Ferozepore, December 23, 1842.

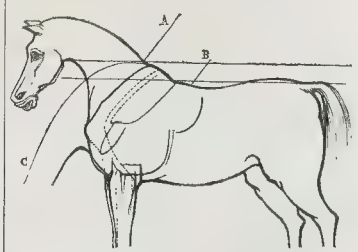
This day Major-General Nott passed the Sutlej at the head of his whole force. The Major-General was received at the foot of the bridge by the Governor-General and his Excellency the Commander-in-Chief, attended by their respective staffs and escorts. The Governor-General was accompanied by Jye Singh Rao Ghatkee, by the Rajah of Jheend, and other chiefs, to Sirhind. The troops and followers of the Rajah of Jheend and of the other chiefs were formed in two lines, beyond the escorts of the Governor-General and Commander-in-Chief. The gates of the temple of Somnauth passed the brigade under the escort directed to be formed by the Governor-General's order, the escort of infantry being composed of volunteers from the 2nd regiment of Grenadiers. The following are the officers selected by Major-General Nott to accompany the escort:—Major Leach, Political Agent; Captain R. N. M'Lean, and Lieutenant J. Travers, 2nd Native Infantry; Assistant Surgeon M. A. B. Gerrard; and the same are appointed accordingly. The Governor-General delivered to the senior Jemadar of the escort of the infantry a flag of the colours of the Military Riband of India, having inscribed thereon "Ghuznee," in English, Persian, and Hindee, and informed Captain M'Lean, Commandant of the escort, that on their return to their regiment the flag was to be retained by the 2nd Grenadiers as a third colour, in commemoration of their distinguished services. Major-General Nott, appointed Resident at the Court of Lucknow, will bear the title of envoy to the King of Oude, and that of "Excellency" in all communications with His Majesty.

HAYDON'S CURTIUS.

(To the Editor of the Illustrated London News).

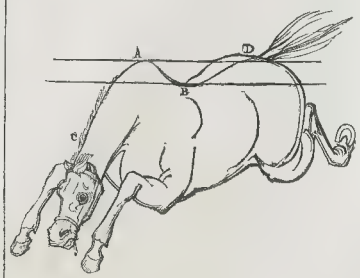
London, March 11, 1843.

Sir,—As a great many remarks have been made by judges of art on the seat of Curtius at the British Gallery—as if he appeared buried in the horse's body—will you permit me to send you two sketches illustrative of the cause, from the anatomical construction of the horse.



A. Nape, and top of the scapula. B. Back-bone, the seat of a rider.

When the head is in the natural position the position of the rider below the nape is not felt as low, but the moment the horse bends his neck down (C), the nape (A) keeping its position, the back-bone appears low (B).



When the neck is low, either in front or sideways, the relative position of nape and back must be the same; and, the nape never moving, it is really so much higher than the back-bone, that the rider must appear buried in the horse on the back-bone (B) between A and D.

This, I hope will clearly explain to your readers that an illustrative reply to the errors of the critic is the best of all replies.

B. R. HAYDON.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MARCH 18, 1843.

We have this week the pleasure of presenting to our readers what we hope will be accepted as a very attractive Supplement to the present number of this journal. The gift is made in most cheerful spirit, and not without pleasing promptings of gratitude for the unexampled favour we have received at the hands of the community, to whom we trust these little periodical offerings of thanks will prove as acceptable to receive as they are gratifying to bestow.

It is probable that some of the country subscribers to our earliest edition will find some trifling deficiency of later news, as, with a view to meet the increased demand at our office, and to give efficiency to the working of the engravings of the supplemental number, we shall be a few hours earlier at press. Editions of the journal will, however, continue to succeed each other as usual, with every fresh and [illegible] latest news; and, indeed, we may indulge our readers in the prospect of our being able soon to keep even pace with public intelligence in our working at press, by the great improvements which we are each week making in the practical application of machinery to the printing of our engravings—machinery already quite without precedent, and which it must take months and months of practice, experiment, and experience to attempt to rival, even at a humble distance of success.

It will be in the memory of our readers that, so lately as August last, among the lamentable shipwrecks of that terrible and stormy month were two occasioned by the driving on shore of vessels in Table Bay; and on board one of these vessels, named the Waterloo, a fearful sacrifice of human life occurred, in the consignment to eternity of near two hundred of our fellow-creatures, drowned in the agonizing conflict between hope and desperation, in very sight of shore. This awful calamity created the deepest impression upon men's minds, not only where it befel with so many features of dread and horror, but far from the scene of the fatality—in the bosom of old England herself, to whom the lives and safety of her children are ever dear, and whose community is still warmed by the sympathies of brotherhood towards all the creatures of her race. The unhappy beings who perished upon the shores of the Cape—"in the deep bosom of the ocean buried"—by the destruction of the shattered fabric of the Waterloo, were unfortunately the children of crime, and the reflection became more dreadful that they were thus hurried to their doom before the solace awaited them of any earthly atonement. But that they were convicts did not the less impress upon the people of this country, nor upon the distressed spectators of their appalling destiny at the Cape, their right to life preservation by every means within the power of human foresight, not only by the exertions of humanity in the hour of danger, but by preparing against the hour of danger, and so perhaps averting its consequences when arrived, with such due precaution as it is equally imperative to exercise and flagitious to omit. Over and over again have the natural guardians of the public safety, whether upon sea or shore, raised their voices against the infamous practice of sending across the ocean, freighted with a cargo of life, vessels not worthy of encounter either with the billows or the storm—not proof against the ordinary contingencies of danger—not fortified with all the security which human ingenuity can devise. Yet a fear that some such wicked neglect was suffered with reference to the Waterloo, and the unfortunate convicts to whom her fragile timbers proved as but "the rise of death," began to creep among men's suspicions. The point was mooted in England—echoed at the scene of the disaster—an inquiry instituted by Vice-Admiral King (the commander at the Cape station)—and the report of its board (under Sir J. Marshall, the captain of the Isis) printed for the information of the House of Commons here. That report confirms the worst fears and censures of the friends of humanity; it points to the grave of the unhappy convicts, and it condemns the Waterloo! The tale is really monstrous. The vessel is not only declared to have been, when she left England, unseaworthy, in ordinary terms, but the board declares that "general decay and rottenness of the timbers appeared at every step we took;" and again, that many of the planks and timbers appeared "crumbling to dust with age and rottenness." To have sent men to sea in such a vessel was to exhibit a recklessness of God's gift of human life, which no language is strong enough to brand with sufficient indignation and reproof. It was a crime of horrible magnitude—nothing less. The whole history of the vessel's fate, however, is most reproachful, and lays at some door—where we do not venture to surmise—an awful measure of responsibility and guilt. "This report states, that during the gale the master was on shore, that the Waterloo was left under the charge of an inexperienced young man; that she had no third cable on board; that the masts were not cut away to lighten the ship; that the long boat was not got out; that the quarter-boats were equally neglected; in a word, that no measures were adopted to avoid the worst and most probable consequences of the gale. Dreadful as were the actual consequences of this inefficiency and unseamanlike mismanagement, they fell far short of the horrors which only a providential interference averted from the unhappy convicts.

"The prisoners had been ordered below, from a fear that they would crowd into the life-boats that might come off to their rescue; they were then bolted down; the corporal of the guard affixed a padlock to the bolt, and locked it without orders. In the general panic he forgot to unlock the door; and, had not one of the prisoners been provided with a hammer, all that wretched crew would have been consigned at once to a helpless and disregarded doom!"

In this quoted narrative we have a complete catalogue of horrors; and are they not exciting and tragical enough to enlist upon the subject which they involve the warmest feelings and sympathies of the community? Ought we not to insist upon the most severe stringency of legislation upon the question of the seaworthiness of vessels of all denominations, of the fitness and activity of commanders, and of the proper guardianship of life even in those floating prisons which are bearing to our penal settlements their melancholy freight of guilt? Ought not Government to look well and jealously into the evils which the loss and condition of the Waterloo have made so flagrantly apparent, and of which the people's representatives have before them documentary evidence of the most resistless kind? We trust the arm of humanity upon the reform of this most wicked grievance will not be stayed.

By the way, the Times, in noticing this affair, throws out a practical suggestion on the subject of the system of the classification of vessels at Lloyd's, by which the Government surveyors may be rendered liable to deception. The arguments of our contemporary afford ample reason why this system should at once be examined into with a view to reform.

COUNTRY NEWS.

BURY ST. EDMUND'S.—On Saturday last the Feoffees of the Guildhall School elected Mr. Robert Craske master of their commercial school. Out of 84 candidates the number was reduced to two—Mr. Craske, of Bedford (who was elected), and Mr. J. Wortley, of Bennington, near Boston. The testimonials of these gentlemen were of the highest order, and the trustees had much difficulty in making their choice.

CAMBRIDGE. Sir Alexander Grant has resigned his seat for Cambridge, and Mr. Fitzroy Kelly has addressed the electors on the Conservative interest. The addresses of both gentlemen took the town by surprise. The Liberal party have called on Mr. Richard Foster to stand forward in opposition to Mr. Fitzroy Kelly. This gentleman and Lord Cosmo Russell were the candidates at the last general election. The Anti-corn-law League, it is said, intend sending a candidate of their own on the occasion, but there is no positive authority for such a rumour.

DEVONSHIRE.—SINGULAR CHARGE OF MURDER.—John Dawson, late a seaman on board the Earl Clive, has been committed to the Devon county gaol, on a charge of murder, alleged to have been committed on the person of a native of Zanzibar, an island tributary to His Highness the Imaum of Muscat. The homicide was committed by the prisoner while in a state of drunkenness, on the 25th of August last. He was sent home in custody, on board her Majesty's ship Andromache, which arrived last week at Plymouth, when he was examined and committed by Mr. R. Clarke, a county magistrate.

NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE.—On Saturday last a meeting, consisting of several hundreds of pitmen, and attended by a band of music from Sheriff-hill, Gateshead, was held at Scaffold-hill, near Longbenton, within five miles of Newcastle-upon-Tyne. The pitmen were met by several men of the locality, and by Mr. Coughan (a Scotch delegate), Mr. Swallow, from Wakefield, and Mr. Brophy, a Chartist lecturer. The condition of the pitmen of the Tyne and the Wear, which is now sorely depressed, was depicted in forcible language, and one of the speakers (the Wakefield delegate) stated that he had been in communication with Lord Ashley, who was ready to support their cause if they would only be true to themselves, and had sent him one of the Commissioners' reports, containing facts and pictures that must harrow up the feelings of every man of common humanity. Resolutions were passed in favour of a national union of coal-miners for the protection of their interests—of the repeal of the export-duty on coal, and of the retention of Lord Ashley's Mines and Collieries Bill unimpaired. Thanks were then voted to the noble Lord for his humane and zealous efforts to improve the condition of the people.

SOUTH WALES.—REBECCA AND HER DAUGHTERS.—MORE GATES DESTROYED.—On Monday week "Rebecca" and her followers appeared at the Pedlerdine and Cutts gates, in the neighbourhood of Narberth. It is said that the party mustered about 100 strong, and in each instance the gates were completely demolished in the short space of ten minutes. The Pembrokeshire grand jury have found a true bill for felony against Thomas and David Howell, two of "Rebecca's daughters."

UXBRIDGE. On Thursday, the 9th inst., Mr. Robinson gave his annual concert at the Public Rooms. The performers were the Misses Pyne, Mr. G. Pyne, Mr. Edney, and Mr. Robinson, assisted by the gentlemen of the choir of Uxbridge Church. The first part consisted entirely of sacred music; the choruses in which, particularly "The Heavens are telling," were indifferently sung: the voices and accompaniments were continually at fault. Mr. Robinson sang some ballads in the second part with his accustomed sweetness, in one of which he was encored. Miss L. Pyne met with a deserved encore in a serenade, "Light of my soul," by Asquil. This charming little singer is only 17, and sung several passages in the above-mentioned song in very excellent style. Mr. Edney amused the company with Mr. Parry's "Berlin Wool" and "Anticipations of Switzerland;" in both of which he was encored. Sir H. Bishop's well-known "Mynheer Van Dunck" concluded the concert, and, with the exception of a blunder in the chorus, was very nicely sung.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

SHERIFFS' COURT.—TUESDAY.
(Before Mr. Under-Sheriff Kenney.)

BRISTOL V. WHITAKER.

This action involved a material point relative to the individual responsibility of the shareholders of the London and Westminster Joint Stock Loan Company. Mr. Thomas stated the plaintiff's case. This was an action of debt brought by Mr. Thomas Bristol, an engraver, carrying on business in King William-street, Strand, to recover the sum of £13 10s. 3d. from Mr. Frederick Augustus Whitaker, a gentleman of property, residing at Mounton, in Kent, who was one of the directors of the London and Westminster Joint-Stock Loan and Investment Company. The sum sought to be recovered by this action was due for engraving done by the plaintiff for the company, of which the defendant was a director. A part of the sum formed the consideration of a bill of exchange, which the company had given to the plaintiff in part payment of his bill, but which was afterwards dishonoured. The defendant was the only man of property connected with this unfortunate company, and the plaintiff had therefore commenced this action against him individually. The secretary and actuary of the company were then called, the former of whom proved that, in the early part of the year 1842, he ordered the plaintiff to execute certain engravings for the Londonand Westminster Joint-Stock Loan and Investment Company, which he, witness, afterwards received. A bill of exchange, accepted by Mr. Charles Knight, was given to the plaintiff, in part payment of his bill, for the engravings. Previous to 1841 the company was a private concern, but in and after that year it became a joint-stock banking company, and the defendant then executed the deed of copartnership, as a covenantee. Witness had seen the signature of the defendant to several of the shares of the company. The defendant had deposited with the company £1250. The secretary proved that the defendant was in the habit of attending public meetings of the company, and was an extensive shareholder Mr. Crouch urged for the defence that there had been no case made out against the defendant, inasmuch as the witnesses had failed to prove that the defendant had signed the deed of the company as a director. The defendant had lost £1200 by this unfortunate concern, and the object of this suit was to make him responsible for the liabilities of the company. He, therefore, trusted the jury would, by their verdict, protect his client against such an attempt.—The learned under-sheriff then summed up, and the jury, after a short consultation, returned a verdict for the plaintiff for the full amount claimed.—Mr. Crouch then moved an arrest of judgment, on the ground that the evidence was insufficient to send the case to the jury, but the learned under-sheriff overruled the objection.

ASSIZE INTELLIGENCE.

NORTHERN CIRCUIT.—YORK, March 13.

CROWN COURT. (Before Mr. Justice Coltman.)

Thomas Dixon, 29, was charged with having, on the 22nd November last, feloniously stabbed, cut, and wounded Thomas Blakelock, with intent to do grievous bodily harm. The prosecutor was at the Rail-moon public house, Thirsk, where he had been drinking all night, and about three o'clock in the morning the prisoner, with two men, named Morell and Kitson, entered the house. There was some quarrelling, and the prisoner took the prosecutor by the collar, to pull him down, on which the prosecutor struck a blow at the prisoner. They then stood talking until they were apparently good friends, and prosecutor was going to turn round to go home, when the prisoner struck a knife into his neck, on the left side, near to the ear. The wound was of a dangerous description, but ultimately the prosecutor had recovered. On being taken into custody the prisoner asked if Blakelock was dead, and expressed regret when he heard that he was not, saying that Blakelock was a worse man than himself.—"Guilty."

Richard Sharp, 35, was charged for that he on the 2nd of March, 1833, was convicted of a capital felony, and sentenced to be executed; that the sentence was commuted to transportation for life, and that he had been found at large on the 21st of February last, without any lawful cause. The necessary evidence having been given as to the identity of the prisoner, Sinkler entered into his defence. He stated that he obtained a free pardon for good service and good conduct, on the recommendation of Mr. Hardy, Inspector of Crown Lands, but had lost his certificate. The jury immediately returned a verdict of "Guilty," and Mr. Justice Coltman sentenced him to be transported for life.

CARLISLE, March 13.—The confusion occasioned by the lengthened assizes at Lancaster having been remedied by the postponement of the Westmoreland assizes, the commission for the county of Cumberland was opened on Saturday evening. The calendar is rather heavy as to number, there being 28 prisoners for trial. The offences are of the usual character, but there is one charge of manslaughter in the calendar which is stated to be of a very aggravated character. The cause list contains seven causes, none of them of any importance, nor likely to be of any interest, unless it be one of libel upon the character of a dissenting minister. Mr. Baron Rolfe proceeded to the Court about 10 o'clock, and charged the jury, after which, as soon as a bill was found, he commenced the trial of prisoners, none of which were of any public importance.

OXFORD CIRCUIT.—STAFFORD.

James Stanyer Wilson, aged 23, Henry Wilson, 18, and Tristram Naden, 19, were indicted for burglariously breaking into the dwelling-house of George Swinnerton Bladen, in the night of the 15th of September, at Uttoxeter, and stealing £3 in silver coin, a silver pencil-case, and other articles, his property; and Rebecca Snape and Charlotte Plant were indicted for feloniously receiving the same knowing it to be stolen. The prisoner Wilson pleaded guilty, and the females acquitted. Wilson was sentenced to 15 years' transportation, and the others to 12 years' transportation.

NISI PRIUS COURT.

Mr. Justice Erskine has fixed O'Neil's trial for sedition, for Saturday morning, and that of Cooper, the Leicester Chartist leader, who is to be tried on a similar charge to the one on which he was acquitted at the late Special Commission, is fixed, it is understood, for Monday. An old man, 70 years of age, named Richards, is also included in the indictment with Cooper. These trials, which are looked forward to with great interest, will be tried in this court, having been removed by certiorari into the Court of Queen's Bench since the commission, and therefore made Queen's Bench records. They will be all tried by special juries

POLICE.

MANSION-HOUSE.—On Wednesday a man of respectable appearance, named George Edward Blyth, was brought before the Lord Mayor, in the custody of a constable in the employment of the Board of Customs, and charged as a person whom it was dangerous to allow to go at large. It appeared that the unfortunate man had been employed as a custom-house officer on a foreign station, but becoming insane he was sent back to England. Upon his arrival in London he made some noise at the Horse Guards about the Queen, and was conveyed before a magistrate. He subsequently was confined at St. Luke's and at Dr. Warburton's establishment, from which the latter of which he had lately been discharged as incurable. He had that morning called at the Custom-house and wanted to see the Commissioners, of whom he spoke in a very incoherent manner. The prisoner was ultimately sent to the Compter until his friends are communicated with on the subject of his future safe custody.

BOW STREET.—On Tuesday, a middle-aged man, having the appearance of a mariner, was brought before Mr. Twyford, charged with being insane and attempting to obtain, under suspicious circumstances, an entrance into the residence of Sir Robert Peel. The following was the account given of the police-sheet.—"Edward Colley, 12, Newcastle-street, Strand, ironmonger, late from Browsley, Salop, charged with being insane, and endeavouring to obtain an interview with Sir Robert Peel at his residence" Constable 16 A said he was on duty in Downing-street, in plain clothes, about one o'clock in the afternoon, when the defendant drove up in a cab to the official residence of Sir Robert Peel, and on alighting at the door rang the bell at the door for Sir Robert, when he was informed by the office-keeper he did not reside there. He then walked along Dowaing-street, and crossing over to the Duke of Buccleuch's, and inquired where Sir Robert Peel lived, upon which the porter directed him to the residence of the right hon. baronet, in Whitehall-gardens. He accordingly proceeded to the door, followed by witness and the cabman, and being told by the servants he should make his communication with Sir Robert in writing, he went away, and he'd a short communication with the cabman, paying him his fare, as witness believed, and leaving them, walked away in a very strange manner. He went up to him, and told him he was connected with the Government offices, and if he wished to communicate with Sir Robert, he would give him paper, or he would write a letter for him. To this he made no answer, but with eyes of apparently very wild, and witness finding he could not induce him to leave the place, he called two other constables to convey him to the station-house, where, on searching him, were found a newspaper, a bunch of keys, and several letters relating principally to religious subjects.—Mr. Twyford inquired of the defendant if the letters were in his handwriting? The defendant replied they might be, but he could not say unless he heard them read.—Mr. Twyford then directed the clerk to read one of the letters, of which the following is a copy: "Newcastle street, London, Monday evening 4 past 11 o'clock. "My dear Father,—I wish to communicate to the authorities that I have hitherto advanced as been written or said from the impulse of the moment, but no I state for—the Government office men, who can read well, that the form has hitherto used should be continued, and that I wish to be sent to my house for my wife (say Tuesday early, per the Ironmonger invention) as that is the maxim of mine. I don't mine so much as the state, therefore let proper men in the Charterhouse, but had to the old maxim and statute, and the church of England in a sound basis, and marriages should be solemnized therefore as hitherto—and that no men be suffered to have one—(this may be strange, but in opinion correct) as if theologians search they will find that the laws was given by Moses, but Grace and truth by (J. C.) that the whole may be crowned by one being able to say, Glory to God in the highest, peace on Earth, Good will to men. Adieu if I don't see you before I go. E. G. C.—Mr. Collier, of Cockspur street, said the defendant was very strange at times, and that the disease ran in the family. His father was in the Charterhouse, but had formerly been in excellent circumstances. The defendant had been apprenticed by Dr. Grainger, of Birmingham, his cousin. The defendant was asked if he could give any reason for seeing Sir Robert Peel, he replied, he thought he might make some suggestion to him. After some further conversation, Mr. Twyford told him he did not think it quite safe he should be allowed to go at large, and he should order him to be taken care of by the parish authorities of St. Margaret's, Westminster, where the offence was committed. He was then removed in the custody of the officers.

ANNIVERSARIES.

ST. PATRICK'S DAY.

Ingenium magni livor detractat amici,
Quisquis et ex illo Zoïle nomen habes.—Ovid.

If any bould traytor,
Or infayrior creature,
Denies Pat's jayrulus, I'd like to see the man!

Free Translation by Tom Ingoldsby.

History relates that Zoïlus, the detractor of Homer, not satisfied with waging war in his own country against the memory of the great Maeonian bard, took it into his ill-natured "silly pate" to transfer his ignoble and bootless exertions to, if it were possible, a still less congenial atmosphere, the capital of Egypt, the most renowned theatre in that age of the liberal arts, and where the most accomplished prince that ever wore a crown, Ptolemy Philadelphus, then held his classic court. Here it was that such divine spirits flourished under such truly royal patronage as Theocritus, thrice-favoured shepherd of the Dorian Muse; Apollonius Rhodius, who immortalized the "Ei Dorado" expedition of Jason and his companions; Lycophron, called "the dark one," from the awful sublimity of his Cassandra; Aristophanes, not the prince of ancient comedy, and whose productions even St. Chrysostom did not think it profane to put every night under his pillow, but the most accomplished poet at the same time the most candid critic of the age in which he lived; Callimachus, the easy-flowing, the elegant, the courteous, whose hymns to the gods, such of them as are extant, can never be forgotten until all sense of the beautiful and the memory of Greece herself shall have passed away—who, had he never risen higher than his "Rape of the Locks" (concerning Berenice's hair), had even then reached the stars, and his verses had been intertwined in the far-streaming radiance of the constellation they so divinely celebrated. Such minds, and many more of the same polished stamp, were in Alexandria in those days. They were, in fact, as Carleton's Irish schoolmaster called his first class (although we detest punning), all "Homericus." The time and place, too, which "the Thracian slave," as the ill-natured critic was called by an indignant public, selected as most suitable for firing his pistol off showed that he at least must have been a monomaniac of the first water. He arrived at Alexandria (not in the Gazelle steamer) on the very morning of the day when Ptolemy was to feast his court and the public with games to Apollo and the Muses, and to appoint honours and rewards to such writers as contended successfully in them. Zoïlus looked upon this as the happiest possible omen at his entrance; but, having something like wit in his madness, kept his intention to himself, or doubtless he had been taken up before the chief civic magistrate of Alexandria (Vitruvius states his name to have been Humphrus), and subjected to a most rigorous examination by that profoundly learned personage in the laws of Sesostris. The madman went to the public theatre, and remained there unmolested and unnoticing, until after the prizes had been distributed to the victors. He then stepped forward, and having demanded privilege to "have a shy at the gingerbread," he commenced flinging his critical crabstick at the memory of Homer. The King and his court listened with the dignified silence which might have been expected, but the people did not conceal their indignation. Paving-stones, however, were scarce, and they were not barbarians enough to behave like such modern Egyptians as those who at the O. P. rows in Covent Garden and the skrimmages at old Crow-street, Dublin, exhibited their notions of mewm and tuum by tearing up the managers' benches to pelt each other; they were patient. The king very soon rose, and "gentle and simple" rose with his Majesty, leaving the friend of ill-nature alone in his glory to be kicked out by the call-boy or scene-shifter. We do not know whether there was a public lunatic asylum in Alexandria at the time, where every crack-brained rascal who chose to drill holes in the bodies of the distinguished living or to pick holes in the memory of the illustrious dead was sent, and housed and fed and treated kindly for the rest of his days at the public expense; but certainly Zoïlus was not provided for in this extraordinary manner, although he was pronounced by "Humphrus" to be mad at the time, and just as poor as such a philosopher ought to be. He wrote a letter—give the devil his due, it was not a threatening one—to Ptolemy, soliciting some stannum, or "tin," which request was flatly refused; the prince desiring him to be informed that Homer, who had been for more than a thousand years dead, still maintained thousands of people, and Zoïlus, who boasted more wit than he, ought not only to maintain himself but thousands of others also. The poor wretch was afterwards hanged at Alexandria—not in propriâ personâ, but in effigy—on the occasion of the opening of the splendid temple which Ptolemy erected in honour of Homer. Of course "our gentleman" cut the Egyptian capital, such a moral flagellation as this being too severe for even the hide of a donkey or a rhinoceros to endure. He tried the same game afterwards at Smyrna, and proceeded so far as to enter the Homereum, a temple dedicated to the poet, where he played all sorts of wicked pranks, even to committing violence on some of the aged priests. The Smyrneans, who were amongst the seven sets of citizens of "credit and renown" who claimed Homer as a countryman, soon made short work of their natural enemy. It required no Lord Chancellor of the day to bring in a bill for such special cases. The wretch was tried by Lynch law, and condemned to death by fire, which sentence was duly executed, his own criticisms being made into squibs and crackers to light the funeral pyre. Thus perish all those whose cynical acerbity, amounting to the fanaticism of ill-nature, would throw dirt at the sacred memory of those whom not alone a nation but the nations both cherish and venerate.

But what has all this to do with St. Patrick? "Bethershin!"—as that destroyer of vermin himself said to the great boa-constructor which disputed, to his cost, the holy man's entrée into the Bog of Allen—and that means "wait a while," or "don't be in a hurry," or "keep your temper," or any tantamount expression, paraphrastic or circumlocutory, you like, for a literal explanation of the Delphic original were impossible.

Seven cities contended for the birth-place of Homer. More than seven cities contended for the birth-place of the Irish Saint, who, in addition to his other virtues and accomplishments, was a bard of high rank, or he would not have been called at the head of the learned commission who got up the renowned "Psalter of Cashel." Seven countries waged war to the knife for the honour of him whom Christian countries, and Ireland in particular, celebrate on the 17th of this month of March. Seven countries, each of which claims the birth, so seven cities, and some of them had cities to spare, which might, to follow the "Quarterly Review's" humane advice touching the manufacturing towns of the north, be sunk chin deep, and a little farther, in the ocean, without mankind being a bit the worse off for the immersion. As seven cities contended for the honour of Homer's birth, so seven times seven would have "fought blood to the eyes," as the Irish say, for the bit of luck which fell to the people of Smyrna, whose lot it was to prove to his detractor, on whom all other proof was thrown away, that at least he was not foreproof.

Gentle reader! it is a mathematical certainty that you either have been in Ireland, or you have not. If you have, and we mean before Father Mathew's crusade, you have seen the glories of an Irish row, or you have lain abed all day, and sat roasting your heels by the fire all night, in which case we have only to say, "we pities you," as the sailors say to those who have never been at sea in a storm.

THE CASTLE-YARD OF DUBLIN ON ST. PATRICK'S DAY.

Well, then, there's the point. Just fancy yourself in the Castle-yard of Dublin on St. Patrick's day, just at the time when they relieve the guard, and the Lieutenant, at the head of his splendid levée, appears in front, with his brilliant suite, and sports in his button-hole or his hat a bouquet, as large as a bunch of turnips, of the immortal trefoil—

> The chosen leaf
> Of bard and chief,
> Old Erin's native shamrock!

If you were to utter one word against St. Patrick, or his mother, or any of his relations to the fiftieth generation, miserable would be your doom. As the ill-natured character we have already alluded to perished by fire, in all probability you would be subjected to the "ultima ratio" of another element. The river Liffey is at hand, where "the Dublin boys" would souse you to your heart's content, the last "souse" being perhaps as conclusive as that which settled the poor Turk's business, when, having been sent under water by a very zealous Christian sailor every time that he professed his disbelief in Christianity, he declared that he was at last convinced. "Then," said the representative of the Church militant, putting Selim's head under water for the last time, "die in grace!" Were you to stand quiet and not uncover, nor cry out "Long life to St. Patrick!" although you knew that he was dead, there would such a storm assail you, that your capering would throw St. Vitus's dance into the shade. Were you to stuff your tongue into the right side of your face, you would be made to laugh with the wrong one. Were you to "look crooked," you would be sent to "look for your eye in the gutter."

With all this love and veneration for their Patron Saint which the Irish entertain, there is no character whose memory has been joked with so much, and by those even in whose hearts he reigns. The Irish, however, who drink merriment in with their mothers' milk, do not object to a joke, no matter when or where, so long as it be a good one. He who, according to the Donnybrook Fair song—

> Goes into a tent, and there spends half-a-crown
> Comes out, meets a friend, and for love knocks him down, does not object to the joke of being knocked down in return, provided you do it "decently" according to the rules, and he is convinced that it is all for that which

> Rules the court, the camp, the grove,
> And an Irishman's heart—for the ladies.

We have said that seven countries waged fierce warfare on the point as to which of them should be deemed the real "Paddy's land." They were as follows:—France (fancy St. Patrick being a frog-eater), Britain, Scotland (imagine the holy man in a kilt), Wales (a great grandfather of Owen Tudor, or Owen Glendower, or a thirty-first cousin of Ap Shenkin!), and Ireland (now we come nearer the probability). These are five of them; the other two have been lost in the night of time. Some say the Irish records kept in the palace of Tara were gnawed in this portion by some heretical mice; and some say that the history of the seven countries and their famous controversy was preserved in "the Seven Churches" in the county Wicklow until the monks began to use them as gun wadding when snipe-shooting, shortly after their discovery of gunpowder. There is a tradition, however, amongst the people of the Isle of Man that our saint first saw the light amongst them; and that he landed in Ireland one fine afternoon on the outside of a three-legged Manx poney. Dr. Magin, a great and learned authority, who is gone, poor fellow, to "the tomb of all the Patricks," contradicts this in his famous song on the Saint:—

> He came to the Emerald Isle
> On the top of a paving-stone mounted;
> And the steam-boat he beat by a mile,
> Which mighty good sailing was counted.

Graver chronicles, with which we have nothing to say, especially on St. Patrick's Day, declare that he was of gentle origin, and that with his two sisters (we forget their names) he was led captive by Niall of the Nine Hostages into Ireland, after a successful descent which that Irish prince made upon the French coast. In Ireland he soon commencedhis career, and astonished the natives.

The most facetious history of his family connexions states that

> St. Patrick was a gentleman,
> And owned a decent people:
> He built a church in Dublin town,
> And on it put a steeple.
> His father was a Hoolagan,
> His sister was a Grudy,
> His mother was a Mullagan,
> And his wife the Widow Brady.
> CHORUS
> Success attend brave Patrick's fist,
> He was a Saint so clever;
> He gave the toads and snakes a twist,
> And bothered them for ever.

These lines, by the way, and the whole of the song from which they are extracted, are but a translation of a rhyming Latin ditty which appears in the "Green Book of Glendalough," and was written for his convent by a jolly member of an order long since extinct in Ireland, called "The monks of the Screw." As we have given the first stanza of the modern version, which we attributed to Archbishop Usher, we may trespass on the reader's classic sympathy to give the same quantity of the real old original:—

> De gentis natus inclytâ,
> Patricius Iernæ;
> Urbem donavit cathedrâ,
> Pyramide superne!
> Pater, Laurentius Hoolagan,
> Cui soror erat Græsla,
> Et mater Maria Mulagan,
> Vidusque conjux Bonda.
> CHORUS.
> Sic faustus sit Patricius!
> Dextrum in angues pedum,
> Torast bufones fortiter,
> Omnesque tremefecit!

As Bacchus taught the people of the East, whom he conquered, the method of cultivating the vine, so St. Patrick instructed those whom he converted from heathenism in the mysteries of the barley juice, telling them, so the old legends say, that the Council of Trent put no fast upon drinking. Many are the miracles which the Irish saint is reputed to have performed, in all of which it is not for profane posterity to affirm whether he drew more largely on the Irish Hippocrene—"the mountain dew," or on a holier fount. Many are the simple tales which the natives, especially in the primitive districts, tell to this day of his good deeds and holy achievements. With one of these, which has reference to the shamrock, we shall, at present, be satisfied, and close our notice of St. Patrick. An old Irish song alludes to this celebrated trefoil as follows:—

> Our forefathers tell us Saint Pat
> Drove venom away from our shore;
> The shamrock he blessed,—but first that
> He steeped it in whiskey galore!

With this ceremony of drowning the shamrock every Irishman complies before St. Patrick's night is over. The tale of the blessing and drowning is as follows. On a great occasion, when he had challenged the Druids to turn out their best man to do conjuring battle with him before the king of Ireland and the assembled estates of the realm, the old white-beard of the groves professed his fancy for the Socratic method of "question and answer," which was, he said, beyond all rhetorical artifice, and the style of thing which Truth herself liked whenever she entered the ring. "Coilar and elbow," says Patrick, "or any way you like, my old buck; I'll bet five thirteens on the first fall!" "Done," says the king. "At you, my darling," says the queen, and she backed Patrick. "Done," said a thousand more; and there were bravers in plenty. At it they went, the Druid, who thought to make mince-meat of his antagonist, opening the ball; and, says he, thinking Patrick had not been to college, but to a hedge-school,

> Omnis homo est animal;
> Patricius est homo;
> Ergo Patricius est animal.
> Every man is an animal;
> Patrick is a man;
> Therefore Patrick is an animal!

The roar of applause which arose from the pagans resembled the voice of the storm on "woody Morven." The king rubbed his hands with joy, and the queen nearly fainted. "That's what I call doubling up, Paddy Flanagan," says the grand lord in the boxes, in a paroxysm of delight. When at length, however, the herald proclaimed silence, the saint is reported to have said, in a loud voice that made Tara's old rafters tremble: "Nego majorem,—I deny the major, every man is not an animal. Bielhernunskyte (that was the Druid's name) is not an animal. He is an ass on two legs, the like of which was never seen before; so go home with your logic you old heathen vagabond, and teach your grandmother to milk the ducks!" The legend which we draw on, and which, never having been in print, we quote from memory, states that this argumentum ad hominem drew down great applause from the saint's supporters, and loud cries of "order" from the ministerial side of the house. The Druid very much irritated at being foiled in his opening attack, determined to make short work of Pat; and "how do you prove your three in one?" says he; "How do you explain your Trinity? and don't be more than two minutes about it." That was the time allowed between every question and answer. The saint looked at the queen and beheld a shamrock beaming out on her snowy bosom, like a triplet emerald amongst a bouquet of spring flowers. In an instant he was on his knee before the throne, and made his request for the immortal emblem, which was as quickly acceded to. Holding it up, he cried, "There is a tria juncta in uno,—three leaves upon one stem!" This soon settled the Druid, and he was dead to time. St. Patrick, in token of his victory, blessed the shamrock on the spot, and the legend further states that having been invited home to "take pot luck with the royal family, and the queen having dropped her shamrock, which had been returned to her in her gold cup, the saint, with his characteristic politeness, asked her majesty to pass it to him. He then pledged her and blessed her, and the king likewise, and everybody present, and swallowed the contents, declaring that "they were the sweetest bit and sup he ever tasted since the first bit of bread he put into his mouth, and that was a potato." This happened on a 17th of March, the year the Lord knows what, but the day has ever since been celebrated, par excellence, as St. Patrick's day.

This is enough of the saint and his anniversary, both of which are an antidote to thirsty preaching. With glorious Tom Ingoldsby, who is more Irish than the Irish themselves, we shall therefore conclude with—

You dear bewtcher,
Just hand us the pitcher,
For it's ourselves that's getting mighty dry!

DUBLIN CASTLE,

which is represented by the annexed engraving, was built by Henry de Londres, or the Londoner, who in the year 1204 was translated from a bishopric in this country to the archdiocese of Dublin, and, as secular power was then to a great extent in the hands of the more ambitious portion of the clergy, it is not surprising that to his clerical functions should be added the more onerous duties of Lord Justice of Ireland. In addition to the subject of the present sketch, which occupied about eight years in building, the citizens of Dublin are indebted to him for another enduring memorial—the Cathedral of Christchurch, which was commenced about the same period. In the records of the reign of John deposited in the State Paper-office we find the congratulations of that Monarch on the completion of the building, which is described as a place of great strength, and calculated to be of great service to "the King, his crown, and dignity." It was formerly moated, and flanked with towers on every side, but the ditch has been long filled up, and the old buildings taken down, with the exception of the Wardrobe Tower, which has weathered the storms of six centuries, and been witness to many a strange vicissitude through the prolonged scenes of turmoil and bloodshed which have marked a struggle scarcely to be paralleled in history, between English domination and Irish insubordination. Birmingham Tower, called after Sir Edward Birmingham, who was imprisoned here in 1331, and suffered a long confinement, situated at the western extremity of the castle, was left standing until the year 1775, when it was taken down, and rebuilt in 1777, and is now called Harcourt Tower. The records of this tower alone, which was formerly appropriated to the safe keeping of state prisoners, would fill a goodly volume. We shall glance at one by way of specimen.

In 1487 the Lord Deputy, having received information that Tyrconnell contemplated a rising of his followers, with a view to overturn the English authority in Ulster, despatched an armed vessel to the northern coast, where, having arrived in the neighbourhood of O'Donnell's castle at Donegal, the captain gave out that he was a Spanish merchant, who had brought a cargo of wine, for which he found a ready purchaser in the old chieftain. Having, at the captain's request, sent his only son, a youth of seventeen, on board the vessel, the anchor was immediately weighed, and the youth treacherously conveyed to Dublin, where he was lodged in the Birmingham Tower. Here he remained for two years, when by the aid of a faithful follower he was enabled to escape by a rope unto the drawbridge, from whence he got safely into the country; but having lost his way among the Wicklow mountains, he was retaken by some of the O'Tooles, who were at variance with his father, and was by them again conveyed to his old prison, where, after remaining three years longer, he, in company with two brothers named O'Neil, a second time effected his escape on a wild and tempestuous night; and after wandering about until their strength was exhausted, the three companions together laid themselves down in a snow wreath to die, but they were happily discovered in time to recover two of the sufferers, the third, the elder O'Neil, having fallen a victim to the inclemency of the weather. By the kindness of some friends, the young chieftain was furnished with a horse and attendants, and was at length enabled to reach home after an absence of five years, and his father having, by this time, grown too old for active life, he was invested with the authority over his clan, and many a lord of the Pale in his after career was severely made to pay for the lesson which he had learnt in the Birmingham Tower. It is at present a repository for preserving the ancient records of the kingdom, for which purpose an establishment was made of £10 a year for the keeper, but afterwards, on Mr. Addison being appointed to the office, the salary was raised to £500. The gate at the left side is the grand entrance to the castle. In this building are apartments for the master of the ceremonies, in an open space, supported by Ionic columns. In the front the state musicians appear on the birthdays of the sovereign and of Ireland's patron saint, when the cavalry from the garrison are drawn up in the square, and the Irish capital pours out its "fair women and brave men" to hear the patriotic and national strains with which they have, from time immemorial, on such occasions been gratified. At each end is a regular range of buildings, which completes the north side of the square, and are appropriated to the use of the secretary and other officers under the lord-lieutenant. The opposite side is ornamented by an arcade at each side of a grand entrance, in the Doric order, which leads to the apartments belonging to the viceroy. The council and ball-rooms are grand and spacious apartments, and are admirably adapted for the purposes of state magnificence, which has generally characterized the viceregal court.

SACKVILLE-STREET, DUBLIN.

There are few streets in Europe, certainly none in our metropolis, superior to Sackville-street, Dublin, whether viewed in relation to its spacious limits, the uniformity and architectural grandeur of its buildings, or to the favourable site which it enjoys. Standing on Carlisle bridge, turn which way we will, what a magnificent view presents itself. Before us Sackville-street, with the grand and glorious proportions of its aristocratic mansions—its beautiful Ionic pillar commemorative of England's naval hero, the immortal Nelson; nearly opposite to which is the new Post-office, a Grecian edifice in the purest taste. Further on is the Rotunda, with its pleasant gardens; while the vista is closed in by a gentle ascent, terminating in one of those handsome squares for which the Irish metropolis is pre-eminent. At our foot rolls the Liffey, which, though in extent is not at all comparable to the Thames at London, has the great advantage that, instead of coal-whippers and waggoners, one meets thousands of well-dressed people promenading along its beautiful banks through the most thickly populated parts of the town. Turning the eye in another direction, we perceive Westmoreland-street, bounded on either side by Trinity College and the Bank of Ireland, formerly the Parliament house, and terminating in College-green, with its statue to King William III. From no city in the empire, with the exception of London, are there so many spires to be seen as from this spot, and with even more truth than in the original application do Wordsworth's sweet lines on Westminster-bridge occur to the beholder:—

Earth has not anything to show more fair:
Dull would he be of soul who could pass by
A sight so touching in its majesty.
The city now doth like a garment wear
The beauty of the morning: silent, bare,
Ships, towers, domes, theatres, and temples lie,
Open unto the fields and to the sky,
All bright and glittering in the smokeless air.
Never did sun more beautifully steep,
In his first splendour, valley, rock, or hill;
The river glideth at his own sweet will:
Dear God! the very houses seem asleep,
And all that mighty heart is lying still.

A ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

AUTHOR OF "VALENTINE VOX," "STANLEY THORN," ETC.

CHAPTER I.
THE INTRODUCTION.

HE Right Honourable Alexander Greville, in the early part of his political career, courted Fortune with so much fervour and zeal, that despite her prescriptive blindness, her eyes were opened to his merits, and she took him affectionately by the hand. She led him, with the aid of her sweet sister Hope, from a somewhat plebeian sphere, through various circles described by Ambition, until, feeling himself secure, he with barefaced ingratitude treated her with contempt, when she withdrew her patronage and left him to Ruin, who sedulously follows in Fortune's wake to pounce upon those whom she discards.

At the age of twenty-six Fortune kindly introduced him to a young and lovely heiress, to whom in the fulness of time he was united. A son and two daughters were the fruit of this union, of which the chief characteristics were tranquillity and joy, until he became a cabinet minister, when, in consequence of some imaginary slight on the part of his colleagues, he abandoned them, and with them his principles; and to be revenged, launched into a sea of extravagancies to prove to them what influence they had lost; resigned his seat with truly admirable magnanimity when called upon to do so by his old constituents; and after having been unsuccessfully engaged in a series of ruinous contests, and run through nearly the whole of his wealth, he became so disgusted with the ingratitude of the country, and so thoroughly convinced that he should never be able to get into Parliament again, that with all the noble indignation in him he repudiated every patriotic feeling, and boldly retired from public life altogether.

Up to this ever memorable crisis he had held that a man had within himself the power to compass any object proposed; that prosperity depended upon his own exertions solely, and that it was all perfect nonsense to imagine that destiny had anything to do with human actions. He had the utmost contempt for those who could not get on; he felt perfectly sure that they were alone to be blamed; he could not conceive how any man, having the smallest pretensions to intellect, could have sufficient brass to show his face to the world when poor, and claim sympathy without a blush; and invariably pointed to himself as a living proof that talent and perseverance may surmount every obstacle which can by possibility be thrown in the way of a man's advancement. But when his lady patroness Fortune had left him, and he found himself surrounded by difficulties which with all his tact and talent could not be overcome, his opinion upon the point so entirely changed, that he became an inveterate predestinarian; he contended for the pre-ordination of everything, however momentous or minute, which either has been, is, or will be, and held with surpassing tenacity the doctrine which denies the free agency of man. Upon every occasion, and under all circumstances, here he took his stand: he would not move an inch; while the principal business of his valuable life was to prove to all with whom he came in contact how utterly ridiculous it was for men to endeavour to prevent things from taking their pre-ordained course, which—assuming the premises to be sound—was in the abstract extremely correct.

At the period of his retirement, upon this highly laudable doctrine, and something like five or six hundred a year, his daughters were approaching a marriageable age—Caroline being twenty, and Lucrece eighteen. They were both lovely girls, healthful, elegant, and accomplished; and while their hearts were warm, and their imaginations pure, Greville's pecuniary circumstances prompted their mamma to be constantly on the qui vive.

In this labour of love, up to the period of her death, which occurred soon after, she was zealously assisted by Lady Grange, their paternal aunt; who, having been accustomed to move in the highest circles, proposed to take charge of them during the season; and, as this proposition was acceded to with gladness, they, under brilliant auspices, made their début.

At first they were all heart, all soul, all nature; at which their preceptress was dreadfully annoyed; for, notwithstanding their vivacity and beauty inspired general admiration, they conversed as freely with men of intelligence without rank as they did with men of rank without intelligence. Of course this was highly incorrect. In the view of Lady Grange it was not to be borne: she was perfectly shocked, in fact, and delivered, in consequence, innumerable lectures on prudence in general, and matrimonial diplomacy in particular.

With Caroline these lectures had immense weight: she studied them deeply, and hence became an fait to the mysteries involved. But Lucrece was not nearly so apt a pupil: she could not dissemble: in her heart Nature still maintained her ascendancy: despite the rallying of her sister and Lady Grange, she could not appreciate that dazzling hypocrisy which, unhappily, constitutes one of the chief features of fashionable life. She was not, therefore, nearly so attractive as Caroline, who studied to subdue all those beautiful feelings which render the female character so charming, and who became, what her preceptress had laboured to make her, namely, a woman of the world.

With all the arts, however, for which a woman of the world is distinguished, Caroline failed to make "a good match." She had had, indeed, suitors; but they were not of the right caste. The hand of Lucrece had also been solicited; but the solicitors had received no encouragement from the prudent Lady Grange, although Charles, the only son of her late physician, and nephew of Sir Arthur Cleveland—a wealthy old knight, and one of Greville's most intimate friends—was among them. And thus were the girls, for four seasons, in the labyrinth of artificial love, without a chance of making a matrimonial exit.

Of course, this was very distressing; and when, at the end of the fifth season, they, as usual, returned to Greville Hall, Caroline began to look at the matter very seriously indeed. She felt, and very naturally, that it never would do to go on much longer so; and, as Sir Arthur and Charles—of whom the old Knight was proud, and who, having studied his father's profession, was about to commence practice—had agreed to pass ten days or a fortnight with Greville, she, after mature deliberation, resolved to do something.

Having conceived and arranged all her plans she accordingly, on the eve of Sir Arthur's arrival, named the subject to Lucrece, whom she had heretofore studiously kept in the dark.

"Lucrece," she observed thoughtfully, "Lucrece, I have something to communicate, something of importance—at all events something which may perhaps surprise you."

"What is it?" enquired Lucrece.

"In a word, dear, I've made up my mind to be married!"

"Indeed," said Lucrece, smiling archly, "to whom? I had begun to despair."

"Despair!" echoed Caroline, "Ridiculous! Why should we despair? We are both still young, and, while I admit that you are handsome, I shall claim the same admission for myself. It is true, too true, that we have been hitherto unsuccessful. This has not been our fault. We have endeavoured with all our souls, my love, to win those prizes which without our souls have been secured by others. How is this? Of what are we destitute? Of spirit, beauty, wit, sincerity, or affection? No, Lucrece, but of that incomparable virtue before which every other sinks as if it were valueless—yes, of that virtue, for a virtue it is deemed, whose powerful lustre so dazzles every sense and attracts admiration so strongly, that with it folly, vice, and deformity pass unperceived, or, if perceived, unheeded; while without it, mind, sweetness, beauty, virtue, all combined, are absolutely looked upon as nought, of that, dear Lucrece, of that paramount attraction we are destitute, and to that, and that alone, must we ascribe the loss of all we strove to gain. Yet why should we despair?"

"Why should we not, dear, seeing that it is by the very consciousness of this that despair is created?"

"Despair, Lucrece, although the offspring of folly, can seldom if ever be won, and if it could be, easily, why should we court it? What would be the value of a conquest there? But we have not lost all; we have, in fact, gained that experience which will teach us to win fortune yet."

"I confess," said Lucrece, "that I cannot see the game."

"The game," returned Caroline earnestly; "the game which we must henceforward play is that which all the world are playing, women as well as men, for even we have proved that fortune-hunting is not an exclusively masculine sport. We must no longer insist upon a perfect reciprocity of affection, for men do not love as they were wont, if, indeed, they ever did love as we are told they loved, and as we have found that all around us are calculating we must be calculating too. We have practised the art of pleasing unprofitably so long, that that which was in itself pleasurable has become a perfect toil. We broke through Nature's rules at first: our aim was to be naturally artificial; as that has in our case so signally failed, why let us try the effect of being artificially natural."

"I do not exactly understand you."

"Let me explain then: Sir Arthur and Charles, as you are aware, will be with us a fortnight or ten days at least. Do you not think, dear, that something may be done in ten days? Charles and I, you know, are on amiable terms: I believe him to be sincerely attached to me, although I must confess that I am not much enamoured of him."

"Well, dear?"

"Well, if you wish me to come to the point at once, I have but to say that I have resolutely made up my mind to have him.—Why do you smile?"

"Simply in admiration of your fancied security."

"Fancied security! I shall not, I apprehend, have much trouble to win him! I feel that I can, and I will secure him."

"But if even he were inclined to be, as you say, secured, you could surely never be happy with one whom you have a thousand times told me you despise?"

"That remains to be proved, my dear. He is not, you know, absolutely horrible: indeed some say that he possesses many admirable qualities, and they may be correct: I am sure that I have no disposition now to set up my judgment in opposition to their's: nay, I myself admire him for one thing, which is, that he has the prospect of being extremely rich, for he must eventually have the greater portion of Sir Arthur's property. But I confess that I hate him for his intolerable coldness; he is so precise, so diffident, so fearful of committing himself, as if immortality were attached to every syllable he uttered; he has no life, no soul, he cannot speak until he has mentally rehearsed his speech and dwelt on its importance and probable effect; he cannot on any occasion converse, unless indeed the conversation be profound."

"That Charles has peculiarities none can dispute," observed Lucrece; "and yet I know of no one so generally admired."

"It is hence;" rejoined Caroline "that I am able to tolerate the creature."

"But how do you imagine he is to be won? That I apprehend to be the chief consideration."

"He is not, dear, to be won by the usual means. I must assume his own character; be retiring, yet eloquent; apparently apathetic, yet intense. I must dwell not on his countenance only, but on his words; I must affect to feel their unfeilte importance, and repudiate every species of ridicule, of course."

"That character you never can sustain, dear," observed Lucrece emphatically. "Pray, do not attempt it."

"Oh, I am resolved, my love! firmly resolved. You will see how completely my design will be accomplished. I must, of course, be all that is interesting and amiable; dressing as plainly as may become the native purity of a perfectly unsophisticated creature, and glancing as timidly and looking altogether as uncomfortable as if I had been taught to regard man as a monster to be dreaded. I perceive that you do not admire this project, that you have, in fact, no faith in its success; but when I have fully explained to you the minutiæ of my scheme, I have not the slightest doubt of being able to make a convert even of you. And think, my love, when I have thus made my fortune what splendid opportunities I shall have of making yours! But I must prepare: no time is to be lost: you shall assist in the completion of my arrangements, and then I'll convince you that failure is impossible."

The happiness of Lucrece was more deeply involved in this experimen than Caroline imagined. Lucrece loved Charles, dearly, passionately loved him; but she never revealed the secret, conceiving, as she did, that Caroline was as dearly loved by him. The task of listening to her sister's explanations touching the details of her scheme was therefore fraught with unmitigated agony. She did, however, listen with all the patience at her command; albeit she felt that, whether the project succeeded or failed, the result would be death to her own dearest hopes.

SCENE FROM CHAPTER II.

CHAPTER II.
THE DISCOVERY.

T may be said to be one of the most prominent characteristics of unmarried ladies in the aggregate, that their anxiety to be united to particular persons increases exactly in proportion to the difficulties which others imagine exist between them and the attainment of the objects proposed. That direct opposition tends to strengthen attachment, is a fact which, being demonstrated daily, can excite no surprise; but that women should peril their happiness for ever, by forming alliances with those whom they have been long accustomed to ridicule, if not indeed to despise, solely because it has been said that they cannot have them, would be perfectly incredible, were it not known that a woman is by far the most interesting anomaly in nature.

Had Lucrece, for example, treated Caroline's scheme as a jest—had she caused her to feel that the conquest of Charles would not require any very extraordinary tact, or that any one of common intelligence might win him—it is extremely rational to suppose that her design would have been relinquished; but as she laboured to inspire her with the belief that she could not sustain that character which she herself conceived to be essential to success, she resolved to succeed, and became, for the satisfaction of her own pride, so anxious to appreciate those mild, yet manly qualities, which others admired, and for which he was distinguished, that before he arrived she almost fancied that she loved him.

On his arrival, therefore, she proceeded to develop her well-studied character. And it was a most artistical performance. It was all art. There was no nature in it; yet it failed not—so seldom indeed do we care to look below the surface of that which delights us—to prompt the belief in Charles that he had previously mistaken her character. He was amazed! She looked so unassuming, so interesting, so amiable, and spoke with so much diffidence, judgment, and discretion, that really she was in his view a very different person indeed to that which he had heretofore imagined her to be; and hence, knowing the influence she possessed over the family, and conceiving that she would assist him materially in the promotion of his suit with Lucrece, he paid her every possible attention.

This apparent success was to Caroline a source of delight. She was in raptures! But the mind of poor Lucrece was on the rack: she had witnessed in silence what she conceived to be his affection for her sister, and was tortured by the conviction that no doubt could be entertained of the result.

"Well!" exclaimed Caroline, having retired with Lucrece—and while she spoke her eyes sparkled with joy—"what think you now? Pretty well for the first evening, dear, consider-ing!"

Lucrece was silent.

"Why what on earth is the matter?"

"I am not well, Caroline; indeed, I am not well."

"I am sorry that you are not in good spirits, dear; but tell me, do you really believe, now, that I shall fail?"

"No," replied Lucrece, with a sigh; "I do not."

"Lucrece! I will have him! I feel that were he an emperor I should not fai now. Did you perceive how excessively anxious he was to conciliate me, dear; and how ridiculously he blushed when I addressed him? And occasionally he really looks a very charming fellow! What is your private opinion of his personal appearance?"

"Do not ask me, Caroline," replied Lucrece, with energy; "I hate him!"

"Hate him! Why, Lucrece, I have always supposed him to be one of your most special favourites! I am sure that there is nothing objectionable in his appearance. But what has he done to forfeit your good opinion?"

"Caroline, pray do not pursue this subject."

"Well, if it be painful to you, dear, I will not; but I am quite sure that nothing can be said against his personal appearance!"

There are times when we wish to conceal even from ourselves the existence of feelings which we cherish, notwithstanding we know that they ought to be repudiated, and which—so imperfect is our nature—acquire additional strength from the conviction that they are utterly unworthy of being fostered. Such feelings Lucrece was on this occasion conscious of possessing; and although they may be said to have been, under the circumstances, venial, she reproached herself bitterly for allowing them to be entertained, and would gladly, if she could, have destroyed them.

"And yet," she argued with herself, when alone, "what power have I to banish those thoughts which exist independently of the will? It is unkind—I feel, I know it to be unkind; but what is it which prompts me to pray for her failure? She is my sister, my own dear sister; and yet, although quite aware that if she should not succeed not only will she feel humiliated, but Charles will be disgusted with us all, I cannot but hope that she may fail. For I love him: he ought to know that I love him—yet how can I expect him to know that which I have at all times studiously endeavoured to conceal? It is painful, very painful, to see him thus snared by one who really does not love him. Still she is my sister, and I must, therefore, be silent, although that dear hope yet remains, and will not be, by even a sister's love, banished."

Lucrece, of course, passed a most miserable night, while the bright imagination of Caroline revelled in golden dreams.

In the morning Charles, having resolved to embrace the very earliest opportunity of soliciting the assistance of Caroline, renewed his attentions; and as he could not fail to perceive that they were appreciated highly, he drew her arm in his, after breakfast, and led her across the lawn. Of course she inferred from this that he was about to propose, and began to congratulate herself on the signal success of her design, and to think him a very agreeable person indeed; but she very correctly fixed her eyes upon the grass, and, with a slight convulsive movement of her arm, which was admirably intended to convey to him the idea of a tremor, waited with highly becoming patience for him to begin.

"I do not know," he observed, after a lengthened pause, "when the hours appeared to me to pass so delightfully as they did last evening."

"Believe me," returned Caroline, fervently, "I am overjoyed to hear it. I feared that you would find our dull common-place domestic circle too cold, too monotonous."

"Indeed I never experienced so much happiness ——"

"Now you are about to flatter!"

"Upon my honour I am not. But I never really knew you till now! I feel ashamed to confess it, but ——"

"I know what you are about to say," interrupted Caroline, playfully. "You have always imagined me to be a very naughty creature."

"No, no! But I have been so excessively dull that I never formed till now a just estimate of your character."

"You are aware," rejoined Caroline, "that in society a woman has an extremely difficult part to perform. She is ever apprehensive of her conduct being misconstrued. If she endeavour to be at all times agreeable, she has the prospect of being deemed a coquet; and if she studies to avoid that, she immediately becomes chargeable with affected prudery. In striving to avert the latter charge, it appears, I incurred the former."

"It was unjust: I feel it to be so now; and having confessed my error, you must forgive me. But Caroline," he added, and as he did so her heart in reality fluttered. "I am anxious, Caroline, to speak to you on a subject of some considerable importance."

"Now for it," thought Caroline; but she would not have broken the pause which ensued for the world.

"The subject," continued Charles, with appropriate deliberation, "is indeed a very interesting one: it is—in fact—the subject of marriage. You are aware that I am about to commence practice ——"

"Charles!" shouted Frederick at this interesting moment.

"It is Fred," said Caroline, scarcely knowing how to sustain the mild amiable character she had assumed. "But you will not go out with him this morning? Pray do not allow him to prevail upon you: promise that you will not."

"I will not," returned Charles.

"How tiresome," said Caroline, in the most perfect confidence to herself, as her brother approached them. "Just as he was coming to the very point!"

"Charles," said Frederick, "Sir Arthur is anxious to see you. He has just received a letter, which I fear will induce him to leave us to-day."

"I hope not," said Charles. "Do you know at all whom the letter comes from?"

"I do not; but go, he's impatient to see you. Leave Caroline with me.—Caroline," he added, when Charles, who obeyed the summons instantly, had left them. "It strikes me that you are not acting wisely. What have you been doing?"

"Have you any desire to be impertinent, sir? What do you imagine I have been doing?"

"Giving encouragement to the addresses of Charles."

"And pray do you see anything very monstrous in that?"

"Do not be simple. Listen to me. You have no fortune."

"Well, sir! I know that I have no fortune. What of that?"

"That you ought not to think for a moment of marrying a man—whom I know that you do not love—without one. Charles has not a shilling."

"But Sir Arthur has; and of course the greater portion of his property will eventually revert to him!"

"How is it possible for you to know that?"

"Whom besides has he to leave it to?"

"Harriet, his niece, who is now in India."

"But she is provided for amply. He surely would not leave it to her!"

"Possibly not; but even in that event it does not by any means follow that he will leave it to Charles."

"To whom else can he leave it?"

"To his wife."

"His wife!" echoed Caroline, laughing very merrily, for she held the idea to be excessively amusing. "Gracious, Fred! His wife! Pray do not talk like a child."

"You are possibly sure," rejoined Frederick—"quite sure that he never will marry."

"Absurd! What at his age? Why he is upwards of sixty!"

"Well, I know of no law to prevent a man marrying at sixty!"

"No law; but is it likely?"

"Old bachelors occasionally inspire strange fancies, you will remember; and innumerable precedents for such an act can be found."

"But surely he would never for a moment think of marrying?"

"Caroline, I know not a more likely man of his age: therefore be cautious."

"But—did you ever hear him, Fred, intimate anything of the kind?"

"Not directly; but at table words are sometimes uttered, from which certain rational inferences may be drawn."

"Very true; but you perfectly astonish me. Really I should have supposed him to be the last man in the world to entertain the thought of marriage."

"Well, be upon your guard; and recollect, if you have Charles, you will have a man who is not only now without a shilling, but without the actual certainty of ever being possessed of one. But come, let us go in."

"Frederick," said Caroline after a pause, during which she appeared to be thinking profoundly—"Frederick, if Sir Arthur should marry—the idea, of course, is ridiculous—but if he should, would his property be left to his wife?"

"In all probability."

"The whole of it?"

"Charles would doubtless have a simple legacy—perhaps a pitiful annuity; but depend upon it, Caroline, nothing more."

"Sir Arthur is rich, very rich, is he not?"

"I should say that he must be: he has always been an exceedingly provident man; while his style, although good, has never been expensive."

"What, now, should you imagine his income to be?"

"Why, I can't exactly say; but certainly not less than ten thousand a year."

"Ten thousand," said Caroline, thoughtfully.

"What are you thinking of?"

"Nothing—nothing—oh! nothing."

At this moment Sir Arthur appeared upon the lawn, and Caroline flew to him in an instant; and, while pressing his hand with affectionate warmth, gazed at him in silence, but with an expression of tenderness mingled with respect.

"Caroline, my girl," said he, "I have come to take leave of you: circumstances have occurred which render my presence in town indispensable."

"But, Sir Arthur, dear Sir Arthur, you will not leave us yet?"

"Must, my dear, must. I have sent for a chaise, which I expect every moment."

"Cannot Charles, cannot Fred, cannot any one go for you?"

"Cary, you are a dear good girl," said Sir Arthur, as he kissed her, "but I must go myself."

"Oh do not say so: you will not leave us yet? It will, indeed, be unkind if you do."

"My dear girl——"

"Can you not write? Will not that do as well? Will it not be cruel to leave me—leave us," she added, with a show of confusion, which really appeared to be excessively natural.

Sir Arthur looked at her intently, but he could not make it out; nor could he pretend even to guess what it meant. He thought it odd—very odd: he experienced, moreover, some extremely droll feelings, which appeared to give an impetus to the action of his heart, and to make his veins tingle in a very peculiar manner; but what the meaning of it was, what had induced it, or what it denoted, he was utterly unable to conjecture."

"The chaise is at the gate!" shouted Charles; and Sir Arthur, the spell which bound him being broken, led Caroline tenderly in.

"Well," said Greville, "it appears we must lose you? I am very sorry—very."

"So am I," returned Sir Arthur. "I would not leave the charming society I find here, I depend upon it, Greville, if I were not compelled."

"Well, but we shall see you again in a day or two?"

"No; I'm afraid I must not hope for that. You may keep Charles a week, if you like; but don't let him stop longer. Good-bye, God bless you. Adieu, Lucrece; make haste and get married, you little rogue, do. Caroline, my good girl," he added, and as he approached her she appeared to be lost in a reverie; "Caroline! come, my dear girl, good-bye, good-bye; if Charles should not behave himself well, let me know. God bless you."

"Farewell!" sighed Caroline, faintly; and, while pressing his hand, a tear sparkled in her eye which she appeared to be anxious to conceal.

Again Sir Arthur looked with an expression of amazement, and again he had some of the drollest sensations that were ever experienced by man; but, having gazed until his faculties became so chaotic that he scarcely knew either what to say or how to act, he turned from her abruptly, and hastened from the room, followed by Greville, Fred, and Charles.

"Caroline, dear, what on earth is the matter?" exclaimed Lucrece, when Sir Arthur had left. "What is it, dear? speak."

But Caroline was silent.

"What has happened?" continued Lucrece, throwing her arms round her neck with affectionate solicitude. "Tell me, dear Caroline; pray, pray speak to me."

Caroline sank upon the sofa and wept.

"Papa!" cried Lucrece, as Greville returned with Charles.

"What's the matter? what's the matter?" cried Greville, perceiving Caroline in tears; "what has happened to the child? What is it, my girl? Lucrece, what has occurred?"

"Indeed, papa," replied Lucrece "indeed I cannot tell."

"It must be something. Compose yourself, my dear; you will soon feel better; compose yourself—there."

"Pray, let me retire," said Caroline, faintly.

"Aye, do so," said Greville. "Lucrece, go with her—there, there, you'll very soon recover."

Lucrece received her from Greville's arms, and affectionately led her from the room, while Charles stood in a state of amazement.

"How very extraordinary!" he exclaimed, when they had left.

"What can be the meaning of it?"

Charles shook his head as he replied—"It's all a mystery to me."

"Well, well," said Fred, "it will very soon come out; there's no understanding these women at all; they are all right one moment, and all wrong the next. But to business? you have only a week to stop, Charles, and a week is a very short time: an amazing short time is a week. However, we must manage to make the most of it. Now, let me see; tomorrow—ah, tomorrow—why, tomorrow, we shall probably bring down some birds. I understand you're an excellent shot."

"Far, very far from it."

"Well, well, we shall see: we may have some capital sport."

"That is to say," said Charles, smiling, "in the event of good sport having been preordained. Your favourite, Shakspeare, you recollect, says that there's a special Providence even in the fall of a sparrow!"

"That's correct, very correct; he knew every thing, that fellow did!"

"But I know a man who can bring down twenty of them out of twenty-four, from five traps, at twenty yards, and that twenty-four times a day, for twenty-four years; but it is at the same time equally clear that, if it hadn't been predestined to be done, he couldn't have done it. But," he added, rushing to the window, "what is that? Why, Sir Arthur has returned!" and he and Charles instantly went out to meet him. "What's the matter?" he inquired, on reaching the gate—"Anything happened?—any accident?—forgotten anything?"

"Nothing," replied Sir Arthur; "I'm not going—changed my mind—changed my mind."

"I'm glad to hear it—very glad to hear it. Why, you couldn't have got far!"

"No, not far—not far; to the second lane only; not farther than that."

"Well, indeed I'm very happy to see you back, and the girls will be delighted!"

"Bless them!" returned Sir Arthur. "Charles," he added, having entered the parlour while Greville was giving instructions to the servants—"Now, Sir, I want to ask you a question—a serious question—a question which I expect you will answer with your customary candour—Did you, as I left just now, notice anything peculiar—anything extraordinary—anything strange?"

"I noticed something rather extraordinary when you were gone," replied Charles.

"Ah—yes; well?—what?

"Why, on returning to the room, I found Caroline in tears."

"I was right!"—thought Sir Arthur—"I was right!—It is as I suspected. What said she, Charles?"—he inquired—"What said she?"

"Nothing."

"How very mysterious"—observed Sir Arthur, chuckling—"How very mysterious."

"Do you know the cause?" enquired Charles.

"The cause! How is it possible for me to know the cause? Not a word?—Did she not say a word?"

"She merely expressed a wish to retire."

"Poor little girl! How very strange, is it not? What can it all mean?—Tell Greville I want him.—How fortunate!" he added, when Charles had left the room. "What an exceedingly fortunate discovery! I'm all on fire! How delightful are these soft sensations, these emotions, these feelings—feelings which I never experienced before. To be loved at fifty-nine! and that by an accomplished, beautiful, fascinating, splendid young creature! Domestic felicity, happiness, bliss—nay, all the joys of life are before me. But fifty-nine!—Well! what's fifty-nine? A man full of blood and muscle—pooh! what's fifty-nine? My constitution's youthful—juvenile—an iron constitution. Here's a calf here's an arm, firm as a rock, with lungs as sound as they were when I was born. It is not the number of years a man has lived, the constitution's the thing, that's the point: the constitution. And the appearance," he added, approaching the glass, "the appearance, the appearance.—My sweetest girl," he exclaimed, as Caroline entered with Greville and Lucrece.

"How extraordinary," thought Greville, as Sir Arthur embraced her; "What is it all about?"

"I have altered my plan, you see, Lucrece," said Sir Arthur; "I have returned, you perceive, somewhat sooner than you anticipated. My good girl," he added, addressing Caroline, "You are better?"

"Yes, much, much better."

"Greville, Cary and I have a little private business to arrange: you will probably allow us to settle it at once."

"Oh! certainly—oh! by all means," returned Greville, who, with an aspect of wonder, looked at Lucrece and then led her from the room.

"My charming little girl" exclaimed Sir Arthur; "My dearest child! am your friend: I feel that you know I am your friend. But you must not look sad. I cannot bear to see you sad. Cheer up, my pretty one: smile, my sweetest, smile. You never looked so beautiful as now. Caroline," he added, leading her to a couch and sitting beside her, "I have placed you in my heart. Teach it then that which from your own sweet lips it throbs to learn. You have a secret—nay, by that unconscious blush I'm answered Dearest Caroline, confide in me. What am I to understand? When I left but now those soft eyes swam in liquid love—pardon me, tenderness, perhaps, I should have said—while the sigh which bore farewell derived its burden from a heart so full that 'farewell' seemed half stifled ere expressed. Haste then, subdued the emotions which that sad sigh inspired: I left, but, on reflection, they rose again to prompt the sweet conviction that your happiness was secretly allied to one whose soul would be devoted to secure its constant reign. I instantly returned and, Cary, what did I hear?"

"Forgive me!"

"Forgive you! what? My Caroline, these feelings are too warm for common friendship—far too warm for mere respect. Come, if you hope to be forgiven tell me what they spring from. Well, well, do not avert those lovely eyes, and I'll not require so much. But, may I—dare I—guess the source? Is it love? It is! it is! I know it is, and the knowledge teems with extasy."

"Oh, pardon me," said Caroline.

"Pardon you? Never! Why, pretty one, I might have known it—fool that I have been not to see it before. But now let every care and every thought give place to love—immortal love. My life's enchantress! Caroline, I said I was your friend. May I not hope to be shortly something more than a friend? Do you reject me? Come to my heart! It is your own, your own! Joy blushes to acknowledge that it never entered there before. But come, we must be merry, merry, my sweet, merry! Your secret's mine—mine's yours: there is no secret between us. And now run away: be in the highest possible spirits, and I'll instantly go and break the ice to papa. Caroline," he added, embracing her with fondness, and gazing upon her with an expression of rapture, "I never tasted happiness till now."

(To be continued weekly.)

CONCERTS OF ANCIENT MUSIC.—The first concert of the season was given at the Hanover-square Rooms on Wednesday night, under the direction of the Duke of Cambridge. The chorus by Giovanni Porta was performed for the first time at these concerts, and may be regarded as a curiosity. It is a fine majestic composition in the old style, terminating with a magnificent fugue, led off by the bass voices. Mrs. Alfred Shaw sung in her best manner, and Madame Caradori Allen was heard to great advantage. The choruses and band were exceedingly well executed, and it would be scarcely possible for that sublimest of compositions, the "Hallelujah Chorus," to go off with better and more imposing effect. Mr. Loder was the leader on this occasion, and Sir H. R. Bishop was the conductor.

THE OVERLAND MAIL.

We were enabled to lay before our readers in a late edition last week the telegraphic despatch, in anticipation of the Overland Mail (the route of which from Marseilles to London we purposed to present in a series of accurate engravings), and we this week give such extracts from the despatches since received as may contain matter of intelligence interesting to the general reader. If destitute of the exciting influences which the news from China and India was wont to spread throughout this country, the present communications are replete with grave and serious matter for reflection; and to the commercial interests the intelligence from China is charged with deep and serious interest. The present mail brings down letters and papers from Bombay to the 3rd of February; Macao, January 1st; Singapore, January 10th; Manilla, December 29th; Madras, January 25th; Ceylon, January 14th; Calcutta, January 23rd; Delhi, January 22nd: Lahore, January 9th; Scinde, January 25th.

CHINA.

MASSACRE OF BRITISH SEAMEN.

PROCLAMATION.

(From the Canton Register Extra, December 7th)

Sir H. Pottinger, Bart., her Britannic Majesty's Plenipotentiary in China, has, on his arrival at Macao, learned with extreme horror and astonishment, that many more than 100 subjects of her Britannic Majesty, who were wrecked in the ship Nerbudda and brig Ann, in the month of September, 1841, and March, 1842, on the coast of the island of Formosa, have been recently put to death by the Chinese authorities in that island, who allege that they perpetrated this cold-blooded act in obedience to the Imperial commands.

Had the unhappy people who have suffered on this occasion even been prisoners of war, taken whilst fighting with arms in their hands, their massacre (which is aggravated by a lapse of time of nearly a year) would have been a most flagrant violation of the acknowledged and well understood rules and feelings which distinguish warfare amongst civilised nations, and contrast it with the sanguinary and inhuman practices and ideas of mere savages; but when her Majesty's Plenipotentiary calls to mind that the unfortunate individuals on whom this foul deed has been committed were inoffensive camp-followers and seamen, who neither were armed nor had any means of defending themselves or of molesting others, and who were specially entitled as distressed and shipwrecked men, both by the laws and usages of China, to kindness and protection, the Plenipotentiary has no language by which he can sufficiently proclaim the sentiments of abhorrence and detestation with which he views this lamentable affair, the recollection of which will remain as a stain and disgrace in the annals of the Chinese empire.

Her Britannic Majesty's Plenipotentiary has already obtained positive official proof that the commands issued by the Emperor for putting to death her Britannic Majesty's subjects were drawn from his Imperial Majesty by the gross and merciless misrepresentations of the local authorities in Formosa, who, with the object of personal aggrandisement, basely and falsely reported to the Cabinet at Pekin that both the ship Nerbudda, and subsequently the brig Ann, had gone to that island with hostile intentions—an assertion not more lying and false than manifestly absurd, since neither of those vessels were ships of war, or had, when wrecked, any troops or other fighting men on board of them.

Her Britannic Majesty's Plenipotentiary now intends respectfully though firmly, to submit the real facts of this dreadful affair to the special notice of the Emperor through the Imperial Commissioners and Ministers, and to demand in the name of his Sovereign the Queen of Great Britain, that the local authorities in the island of Formosa, who so false and pitiless misrepresentations have led to the horrible event which has caused for this proclamation, shall be degraded and (cordingly) punished: and further, that their property shall be confiscated, and its amount paid over to the officers of the British Government, to be applied to the relief and support of the families of the innocent men who have been put to death on false and foul accusation. Without this just atonement her Britannic Majesty's Plenipotentiary is prepared to say that the event which has occurred, and which it becomes the Plenipotentiary's unwilling duty to report to her Majesty's Government, will not of the cause of a further serious misunderstanding, or fault it may not even lead to a renewal of hostilities between the two empires, which would be greatly to be deplored, as involving this country and its people in fresh misery and evil, for the crimes of a few shameless and unworthy functionaries in power, who have from base motives acted on their own Sovereign. Her Britannic Majesty's Plenipotentiary, however, trusts that the Emperor will, in his wisdom, see the justice as well as policy of marking the retribution which is herein pointed out; which is due both to England and China, and which will avert further calamity.

That all persons may know the real state of the case, this proclamation is published in the English and Chinese languages for general information. God save the Queen!

HENRY POTTINGER, her Majesty's Plenipotentiary.

Dated on board the steam-frigate Queen, at Amoy, on the 23rd day of November, 1841, corresponding with the Chinese date 21st of the 10th month, in the 22nd year of Taou-kwang.

PROCLAMATION.

TO HER BRITANNIC MAJESTY'S SUBJECTS.

Sir H. Pottinger, Bart., her Majesty's Plenipotentiary in China, purposely refrained from making any allusion in his proclamation of the 23rd inst. to the European portion of the crews of the ship Nerbudda and brig Ann.

The Plenipotentiary imagines that it must be already generally known that when the Nerbudda got into danger the natives of India on board of that ship were abandoned by the master and mates of her, and also by no officer and small detachment of her Majesty's regiments, who were proceeding in her to join the expedition. It now appears that the natives remained by the ship for five days after they were thus abandoned; that they then landed on rafts under the guidance of the head and second serang; that in thus landing some of the men (both camp followers and Lascars, or seamen) were drowned or killed by the Chinese who came down to plunder them, that all who landed were made prisoners the moment they got on shore, and confined in heavy irons, under circumstances of great cruelty, in small parties and separate prisons, for about eleven months, at the expiration of which period they (with the exception of the dead and second serang) were carried in sedan chairs to a plain a short distance from the capital of the Island of Formosa, and there beheaded in cold blood, in the presence of the Chinese local authorities.

It further appears that there were altogether 240 natives of India (170 camp-followers and 70 seamen) left on the Nerbudda when her master and mates deserted that ship, out of whom only the head and second serang have escaped with their lives; but it is not possible to determine how many were drowned, killed by plunderers, and natural deaths, perished from ill-treatment or starvation, or were beheaded by the Chinese at Formosa.

With regard to the brig Ann, it has been ascertained that she had 57 souls on board when she was cast away, of whom 14 were natives of Europe or America, two or three Portuguese and Malays, five Chinese, and the remainder natives of India. The vessel was driven high and dry (at low water) on shore, about midnight, and the whole of the 57 individuals quitted her at daybreak next morning, and took possession of a Chinese junk which was lying in a creek or river near the spot, with the object of putting to sea in the junk, but the violence of the gale prevented them even making the attempt, and they surrendered, without even firing a musket at the host of armed Chinese who had been assembled round them, about three o'clock in the afternoon of the same day. They were instantly stripped, and marched some distance without a particle of covering, exposed to a cutting north east wind. Two men died from cold, and several others dropped from the same cause and fatigue, and were carried on in baskets to the capital (about 90 miles from the spot where the brig was wrecked), where they were separated into small parties and put into distinct prisons in irons. Subsequent to this the parties had little communication with each other, but it is known they were all subjected to the most barbarous treatment, and were scarcely allowed sufficient food to sustain life. In this manner above seven dreary months passed away, when it was announced to the eleven survivors, including the two belonging to the Nerbudda (six natives of Europe and America, three natives of India, and two Chinamen, which latter individuals had been pardoned on condition of entering the services of the government of Formosa), that peace had been made; and they likewise then ascertained that all the rest of their fellow-sufferers in captivity and wretchedness had been put to death, on or about the 18th of August last, on the grounds stated in the Plenipotentiary's other proclamation.

Among the sufferers is Mr. Gully, a British merchant, who was returning to Northern China on board the brig Ann. It is not possible to account for the lives of the six Europeans and Americans, and the nine natives of India being spared; but it is surmised that they were consumed to be principal men of their classes, and were intended to have been sent to Pekin, to be there executed.

This proclamation is now published to satisfy the great anxiety and interest which has been manifested on the subject of it. It is superfluous for her Majesty's Plenipotentiary to record the free grief and sincere regret and sorrow with which he discharges so painful a duty. God save the Queen!

HENRY POTTINGER, her Majesty's Plenipotentiary.

Dated on board the steam-frigate Queen, at Amoy, on the 25th Nov., 1841.

PROCLAMATION TO THE CHINESE.

Sir Henry Pottinger, Bart., her Britannic Majesty's Plenipotentiary in China, purposely, in his proclamation under date the 23rd instant, that a number of her Britannic Majesty's subjects had been cruelly and causelessly put to death by the local officers in the island of Formosa.

The Plenipotentiary has since had the following clear details, which he has obtained from a few of the shipwrecked men who have been sent over to Amoy, to be released agreeably to the treaty.

On board the ship Nerbudda, which sailed from Hong-kong in September, 1841, there were, altogether, 274 sailors: of these, 29 were Europeans; 2, Manilla men; and 243, natives of India.

All the Europeans, accompanied by two Manilla men and three natives of India, left the ship in the boats as soon as she struck on the rocks; and thus, exactly 240 natives of India were left behind. These men remained by the ship, which had drifted over the reef, and was lying in smooth water in Kilung-kay for five days, and then landed on rafts, without arms or weapons of any description. In landing, some men were drowned in the surf, others were killed by plunderers who came down to strip them as they reached the shore, and the rest were seized and imprisoned in separate small parties, where they were left in heavy irons, with hardly any clothing, and a very small allowance of food, from which privations many died after great suffering. Of the whole 240 who left the ship on the rafts, only two men have been sent over to Amoy.

On board the brig Ann, which was wrecked on her passage from Chusan to Macao in the month of March, there were, altogether, 57 souls. Of these, 14 were natives of Europe or America; 5, Chinamen; 4, Portuguese or Malays; and 34, natives of India. The brig was driven by the violence of the wind and sea so high on shore, that when the tide ebbed she was left dry, and the 57 men quitted her, and got on board a Chinese junk, with the hope of being enabled to put to sea in her; but this could not be effected, and they surrendered without having fired even one musket, or made any the smallest resistance to the Chinese troops that had come down to the spot.

Like the unfortunate men in the Nerbudda, those who were in the Ann were stripped stark naked, and dragged in that state to the capital of Formosa, when they were separated and confined in small parties which had little communication with each other, but were all treated with extreme barbarity, and almost starved.

Out of the 57 souls who were cast away in the Ann, eight have just arrived at Amoy. Of these, six are natives of India, and one Chinaman. A second Chinaman is alive, and is said to have staid at Formosa at his own request.

It thus appears from the preceding details that 237 persons belonging to the Nerbudda, and 45 belonging to the Ann, have either been put to death by the officers of the Chinese government at Formosa, or have perished through ill-treatment and starvation.

These atrocious and unjust facts are not to be refuted or questioned, and, that all may judge of them and contrast the conduct of the officers of the British Government (who set all their prisoners free), this proclamation is made in Chinese. Her Britannic Majesty's Plenipotentiary trusts, however, that the Emperor will yet make the only atonement that remains, and thereby avert further evils. God save the Queen!

HENRY POTTINGER, her Majesty's Plenipotentiary.

RICHARD WOODMAN, Acting Secretary.

Dated on board the steam-frigate Queen, at Amoy, on the 27th day of November, 1841, corresponding with the Chinese date, the 25th day of the 10th month, in the 23rd year of Taou-kwang.

COMMERCIAL INTELLIGENCE.

By the Hon. Company's steamer Memnon intelligence has been received from Macao to the 1st of January, and from Canton to the 29th of December, some sales of cotton had taken place, and the finer qualities prices ruled from 5 to 8 taels per picul. Limivel y, 9 to 9 3 nominally. A vessel from the east coast had arrived on the 1st of January, and the prices of opium are reported to be about the same as those at Macao. The export of teas was proceeding with more activity than previously.

TEA.—To England, as yet, of the new teas, not more than 150 chops have been shipped, although it is not likely the reduction of duties will take place for some months; yet many parcels bought are lying in the hongs waiting for shipment. Since the first transactions which opened the market very little has been done, and prices are declining; and although confident expectations are entertained by many (owing to the very large crops) that congous will go down to 15 taels, yet shipments are now making to the United States, and many ships despatched.

"The accounts from the north afford very encouraging prospects for British manufactures. The Singapore market has been cleared of cotton goods for the Chinese buyers, who have sent a vessel direct from Singapore to Chusan. If the treaty and tariff turn out as expected, a vast development of our commercial relations with China cannot but result. We would, however, wish to see matters carried on with all proper caution upon the first of any apparently great improvement in trade under the new régime, as sudden, exaggerated, and unsafe as they are seldom to be trusted to from the moment, and, in the excitement caused by the sudden impetus to commerce, parties ought to be exceedingly careful not to allow themselves to be hurried into what may eventually prove imprudent speculations.

THE RIOT AT CANTON.

CANTON, Dec. 8, 2 o'clock P.M.—After a night of much anxiety and excitement, I send you word to say that we are all safe, and the danger apparently over for the present.

Before this reaches you, you will have heard that a row commenced at 8 or 9 o'clock yesterday morning between some Lascars and Chinese, which went on increasing through the day, until at night it reached a fearful crisis. We early sent notice to Howqua, but his report, if he made any, was not heeded. The mob increased in numbers and audacity every hour, and by 3 or 8 o'clock we could see by the plunder carried by, that Mr. Murrow's factory had been forced. The English ladies had already taken refuge at Mingqua's. This scene of plunder and violence went on through the afternoon, a feeble party of the city police, which came out to restore order, being beaten off the field.

Early in the evening the anti-English feeling began to show itself in the setting fire to the British flag-staff, and the consecration of the mob to the Company's factory. Matters getting thus serious, old Mingqua politely sending a chair, the American ladies were taken to his factory, whence he kindly promised they should go to his family house in case of necessity. Soon after they had been comfortably placed there the smoke appeared issuing from the interior of the British hong, and it became evident that the incendiary mob had fired that factory. We were now attended to Mingqua's terrace, whence we had a full view of the sad but splendid conflagration. The skylight of Mr. Murrow's house and the chapel being shone beautifully for a while till they sank in the flames. The verandah still stood firm, but sudden volumes of smoke poured from every crevice, and soon after the whole roof and architrave were burning furiously. The square all the while was crowded by Chinese, who had early thrown down the Canton wall and forced sundry passages through the paling of the square. Alarms were from time to time communicated to this imminent mass, and they at one moment fled in all directions, and then swayed back again to their former position. Furious cries and shouts were every instant mingled with the crackling of the fire and the crash of the falling ruins. The fire extended slowly back into No. 2, but happily the night was nearly calm, and the slight breeze which the conflagration made veered a little to the eastward: this and the strong west walls of the British hong saved the factories on our side of Susan-wan (Hog-lane), not unarred the destruction of that quarter. It was evident that the Dutch and Creek hongs must go, and our concern for the inmates of the former was increased by the report of fire-arms from that quarter which several times reached us. Large fires were set to check the flames were driven off, the mob declaring no one should interfere to save the British hong, and when that was down they themselves would help to save the others. This was the eastern factories was impossible; and Mr. Heard and party, after defending their entrance against the thieves were from time to time communicated to this imminent mass, and they at one moment fled in all directions, and then swayed back again to their former position. Furious cries and shouts were every instant mingled with the crackling of the fire and the crash of the falling ruins. The fire extended slowly back into No. 2, but happily the night was nearly calm, and the slight breeze which the conflagration made veered a little to the eastward: this and the strong west walls of the British hong saved the factories on our side of Susan-wan (Hog-lane), not unarred the destruction of that quarter. It was evident that the Dutch and Creek hongs must go, and our concern for the inmates of the former was increased by the report of fire-arms from that quarter which several times reached us. Large fires were set to check the flames were driven off, the mob declaring no one should interfere to save the British hong, and when that was down they themselves would help to save the others. This was the eastern factories was impossible; and Mr. Heard and party, after defending their entrance against the thieves for some hours, were forced by the fire to escape by the back passage about seven o'clock. Happily they effected this in safety, and soon after the flames running along the verandah consumed it, and now, of these fine porches, nothing remains standing but the lower arches and some broken pulars. Of course the Creek hong shared the same fate. The heat was still intense there smoke issuing from Mr. Fisher's showed that that also had been doomed to destruction. Some new alarm was felt from this fresh outbreak, but happily the same causes prevented the fire from spreading westward. The assurances of the ringleaders of the mob that they would fire no other factory were now corroborated by the evident exertions going on along the outskirts of the square to check the thieving by despoiling the wretches of their plunder. We became less and less apprehensive for the rest of the hours, and after keeping the terrace all two or three o'clock in the morning, lay down on mat couches and got a few snatches of broken sleep. Some of our party (twelve in number) sat up till morning. It was on the whole a fearful night, the fire threatening all of us, and the furious mob in full possession of the square, making the removal of anything impossible to us all, the ladies especially.

Towards dawn there was a lull in the popular violence, and it was determined that the ladies and a large escort should take Mingqua's boat and proceed down to Whampoa, where they accordingly started without further incident, and got a few hours' rest on board the Memnon. The Parsees, from whom much was expected, were the first to join him. The "faithful" Kuzzilbashes and likewise turned tail, and Khan Sheeren Khan had done nothing of consequence, and the second section of the Cabul brigade would be the consequence, as nothing but fear prevented the whole country rising, whereas, now, every thing bears the most peaceful character. However, a report is current, and generally credited, that a move will be made on Hyderabad.

Another revolution, it is said, has taken place at Cabul. Ukbhar Khan had come to terms upon which Akbar is said to have agreed

TURKISH SULTAN'S UMBRELLA.

PRESENT FROM ALI EFFENDI, THE TURKISH AMBASSADOR, TO THE SULTAN ABDUL MEDJIB.

We are enabled to give a series of engravings, in our publication of to-day, of the splendid and highly elaborately finished umbrella, with several of its various details, which has just been manufactured by Mr. Taunton, of Norfolk-street, Islington, by the order of his Excellency Ali Effendi, the Turkish Ambassador at the court of St. James's, and intended as a present to the Sultan Abdul Medjib. This truly magnificent specimen of English workmanship, perfectly unique in point of its gorgeous embellishments, and unparalleled with regard to the multitudinous uses to which it may be applied, as well as with reference to its general character and truly regal appearance, has been produced by the inventor, and manufactured at a cost of five hundred guineas; and when it is stated that the entire of the mass of metal of which it is composed (with the exception of the ribs and stretchers, and those form but a very trifling portion of the umbrella) is of pure gold, the sum expended in the manufacture of this superb production need not excite surprise.

Mr. Taunton had the honour of attending at Buckingham Palace, on the morning of Monday last, for the purpose of her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert inspecting this extraordinary specimen of English workmanship before it left this country for Constantinople. The nature of its peculiar and complicated construction, and all the numerous and useful purposes to which it could be made applicable, were minutely described to those illustrious personages, who were graciously pleased to express themselves in very high terms of approval of the great taste and inventive ingenuity which had been displayed by Mr. Taunton, in perfecting a production so worthy, in every way, of the acceptance of the exalted personage for whom it is intended.

We now proceed to give a general description of the umbrella:—

The first engraving, as will be perceived, represents the umbrella open, which afforded our artist the opportunity of showing the pattern of the rich figured damask silk, which was manufactured expressly for the purpose, in Spitalfields, at a cost of nearly £5 per yard.

The second engraving represents the case open, with the umbrella, and the following articles, the whole of which are pure gold, and are secreted when the umbrella is required for use in the tube of the handle and the ferule:—

1. A powerful microscope. 2. A comb, the star and crescent engraved on the handle. 3. A thermometer, the figures engraved in Turkish characters. 4. A knife, with two blades, ornamented in the same manner as the comb. 5. A pencil-case, the top of which contains the key of the chronometer. 6. The case for the pencil leads, containing two dozen in three divisions. 7. A toothpick.

These seven instruments are elaborately engraved with a design of scroll-work and flowers, to correspond with the embellishments upon the tube of the telescope and the ferule.

The case, which is four feet six inches long, and nine inches in width, covered with morocco, elegantly embossed in gold, contains in the centre the monogram of the Sultan, also in gold. The six ornaments of the star and crescent, in the interior (which is lined with rich green Genoa velvet and white satin), are likewise of pure gold. The lock, key, and hinges are manufactured of the same precious metal.

We now proceed to describe the following engravings, a, b, c, d, and e; the letters having also reference to the open umbrella represented above:—

a The top of the engraved handle, which opens with a secret spring, and then displays a gold chronometer, the dial being an inch and a quarter in diameter, and the figures on the dial-plate engraved in Turkish characters.

b The compass and sun-dial, the characters upon the gold plate (in the centre of which is a large brilliant of the first water) being also similarly engraved to those on the dial of the chronometer. The sun-dial has been adjusted to the meridian of Constantinople.

c The carved ivory portion of the handle, representing various military trophies, which contains, in six compartments, the various instruments marked from 1 to 6 in the engraving of the interior of the case.

d A mirror, set in a bordering of chased gold.

e The eye-piece of the adjusting or sliding tube of the telescope, which extends (upon the portions a, b, c, d, and e, and the ferule being unscrewed) throughout the whole of the remaining length of the highly engraved and ornamented stick, forming a perfect telescope with a 20 miles' range. The diameter of the tube is not quite one inch.

His Excellency the Turkish Ambassador, who will proceed to Constantinople in about a fortnight or three weeks, will take this present with him; and, upon passing through Paris, it is intended that it should be exhibited to his Majesty the King of the French.

NEW HALL AND LIBRARY AT LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS.

We are this day enabled to lay before our readers a plan and south-east view of the New Hall and Library already commenced on the West side of Lincoln's Inn-gardens, from the design and under the direction of Philip Hardwick, Esq., R.A. This noble building has no relation to the public Courts of Law which were some time ago proposed to be placed in the middle of Lincoln's Inn-fields; it is to be erected from the private funds of the honourable society of Lincoln's Inn, and is to contain a dining-hall and library, the present hall having been found for many years inadequate to the increasing number of benchers and students; and being also used as the Court of Chancery on the judges leaving Westminster, it is occasionally found extremely inconvenient to apply the same room to the two purposes. The dimensions of the new hall will be 120 feet long, 45 feet wide, and 54 feet high. For the style of architecture we refer our readers to the engraving. The external walls will be constructed in red brick and stone, and the room covered by an open timber roof of the character of those used in the sixteenth century, about the period when the Inn was established for the study of the law.

The new library is as much required as the hall, the present one being wholly inadequate for the valuable and continually increasing collection of books belonging to the society; it is to be of sufficient size to contain 30,000 volumes, being 80 feet long, 40 feet wide, and 48 feet high; it will be placed at the north end of the hall, and will be of a similar character. Between the hall and library will be placed rooms for the meetings of the benchers, a council-room, 32 feet by 24 feet, and a withdrawing-room of the same size. Under the hall are two stories containing all the requisite domestic offices, and other rooms required for the use of the society. A fine terrace-walk will be formed on the east side of the new building, continued to the northern extremity of the garden; which, being at present extremely low and damp, will be raised by the earth excavated for the foundations of the building, to the great improvement both of the appearance of the garden and of the health and comfort of the members of the Inn. A new carriage-entrance is to be opened from Lincoln's Inn-fields into New-square, which has long been wanted as a more convenient access to the Inn, instead of the present circuitous one from Serle-street. We understand that these improvements have long been in contemplation, and we heartily congratulate the benchers, under whose control the funds and government of the Inn are placed, upon the commencement of a work which will be a great ornament to this part of the metropolis, and which must contribute considerably to the comfort and convenience of the members composing this honourable and learned society.

THE FASHIONS.

Our press of engravings prevents us giving our usual engraving to the Fashions.

Paris, Rue Chaussée d'Antin, March 12, 1843.

Mon cher Monsieur,—Between our winter toilettes, which are going out, and those which are to succeed them, but little is to be seen worth mentioning in the way of novelty, and that little may truly be said to originate in the absence of all present or dominant fashion. We may, however, look soon to see the resuscitation of fashions after the fête of Longchamps, a solemnity which generally serves to revivify all our old ideas, and to work a reform in the transition. The expectation of this event does away with any intermediate change in our modes, as our fashionable folks are holding back until Longchamps shall have set the seal of approbation upon their inventions. Our leading artistes, in anticipation of this event, are busy in the secrecy of their cabinets, but they work in secret. No minister of state, no diplomatist, is more on his guard against committing himself by an indiscretion than is at this moment the fashionable milliner, inspired with a new idea. When these secrets shall transpire, I shall without hesitation reveal certain confidential communications which I have already received upon the subject, and shall enrich your columns with the artistical conceptions of Alexandrine and others, and the graceful and imaginative coiffures of others of our most distinguished artistes. At present our only fêtes are bals, for as yet our other street costumes are hidden under the folds of the camail or the graceful complications of the cashmere. The costumes adopted at these balls are generally very rich; they are composed of costly materials, or are seen with a profusion of crêpes, of flowers, and of lace. Formerly, when a simple robe of crêpe was mentioned, it conveyed only the idea of a toilette, without any circumstances of importance attached to it. At the present moment the word carries with it a larger signification, and requires some explanation, as a crêpe robe as now made is composed of five or six skirts, and when worn by some of our elegant women, is a very elegant and recherché toilette. As an illustration of this, I may mention that at the last ball given at the English Embassy, Mdme. le Duchesse de N. wore one of these tunics in cabbage-green crape, on which each skirt was of deeper shade, so that the robe, which appeared to be of pale green at the lowest part, became deep green as it approached the waist, and I assure you that this appeared no less elegant than original. I should also add that she wore most magnificent diamonds both on her corsage and on her arms. This same fashion of crêpe robes, shaded in white, has a really marvellous airiness, and they are highly set off by natural flowers, which agree exceedingly well with their purity and lightness of appearance. Perhaps nothing has been more highly appreciated in this city than the fancy dress balls that have taken place this season; the genius and taste of the Parisiens delight to revel in the scope which these balls afford them, and certainly nothing could have been more superb than the dresses and costumes which have been worn at many of them. This was peculiarly conspicuous at a superb soirée given by le Vicomte d'A., where the luxury and profusion of the diamonds worn positively dazzled the eyes. Here might have been observed a robe of gold lamar, there a Russian cap, completely embroidered with precious stones; now an Oriental tunic, followed in its turn by a Peruvian crown. In fact, to enumerate one half of the beauties or the elegancies which appeared at that party would far exceed the space afforded by a letter, and I shall therefore leave it to your imagination to picture everything that is most splendid in our fashions, and then you will fall short of the dazzling reality. To return, however, to our actual fashions, I can only observe that little change has taken place in them since my last, and I shall postpone any further observations on them until time shall have given birth to something more novel. Adieu, HENRIETTE DE B.

POPULAR PORTRAITS.—No. XXXIV.

THE BISHOP OF EXETER.

The see of Exeter is one of the most insignificant in point of value in the kingdom. Its present possessor is the best known of all the bishops who occupy the seats of the Lords Spiritual in the highest chamber of legislation. Not that his reputation is altogether such as a humble Christian would covet, for the general impression of his character is not a favourable one. Faults of temper often influence the exercise of the intellect, and to a somewhat contentious and bitter spirit may be attributed many of those things that have given Henry of Exeter the reputation of being a modern Laud. His talents are undoubted, his learning unquestioned, and on his moral character not the shadow of a stain can be cast. Yet the Bishop of Exeter is unpopular with many parties. We know not where the fault may lie, but with many of the clergy of his own diocese he is at open variance: he suspends them from their functions, with little scruple and less ceremony, and uses his privileges as the superior to rebuke what he deems errors in the most public and, to the offending party, the most humiliating manner. He has been called a political bishop, but he can hardly be termed a politician: certainly he is not a mere party man. The questions in the discussion of which he has taken a public part have always been those of a politico-clerical nature, in which the interests, the claims, or the principles of the Church were involved. With such questions no one can blame a bishop for dealing; though he has not always been fortunate in his manner of doing so. When we say he has not mingled much with the struggles of party we ought to have qualified the assertion, by stating that he never omitted any opportunity of expressing his political feelings, which, like all the impulses of the man, are deep and strong. His opposition to the Government of Lord Melbourne had in it something more than dislike; and to that of Lord Grey he was equally hostile, especially upon its introduction of the New Poor-law Bill, the cruel clauses of which he opposed with the noblest eloquence that could be dictated from the Christian's heart. Even in rebuke, however, his words are not violent at any time: his language is polished and flowing, and his voice, weak and soft, falls in words of mildness on the ear. When he assumes the preacher he is a remarkable man; for calm religious feeling, beautiful flow of language, and a perfect command of all that learning can bring to bear on the elucidation of the Scriptures, we have never heard anything to equal the sermons of the Bishop of Exeter. It is on these occasions that we are made to wish that the powerful mind, the eloquence, and intellect that enforce admiration and compel respect might be ever linked with those humbler and sweeter qualities of the heart that can alone win the affections.

The Bishop of Exeter is rather short of stature; his countenance has a cold and unconciliating expression; we have seen him attempt to smile, but it was with the lip only—the feeling lit up no kindred expression in the eye. His paleness may speak either of study or ill health, probably of both, for we believe good health is not among the number of his earthly blessings. His actions, his words, his manners, all speak of gifts of mind united with a disposition that in a bygone age would have made him a great man, if not a happy one.

UNEXPECTED CLOSING OF COVENT-GARDEN THEATRE.—On Tuesday night the avenues of the theatre were thronged with visitors to the pit, gallery, and boxes, the pieces announced being the opera of "The Lady of the Lake," "Blue Beard," and "My Neighbour's Wife." The doors not opening at the usual time (half past six), much conjecture was afloat, when the undermentioned placard was posted at the various entrances:—"Theatre Royal Covent-garden, Tuesday, March 14, 1843. The public is respectfully informed that the following certificate has been received from the medical adviser of Miss Rainforth: 'I hereby certify that Miss Rainforth is labouring under a severe cold, with sore throat and hoarseness, which will render it impossible for her to sing this evening. GEORGE BEAMAN, Surgeon, 32, King street, Covent-Garden.' And that in consequence of the impossibility, at so short a notice, of arranging other entertainments, there can be no performance this evening." The great exertion required of Miss Rainforth on Monday evening, in the character of Reiza, in Weber's opera of "Oberon," on the occasion of Mr. Bann's benefit, unfortunately led to her unexpected illness. Up to half past seven a long line of carriages continued to arrive at the theatre.

The Dublin Correspondent of the Morning Advertiser communicates the following piece of intelligence as a prevailing rumour in well-informed circles at the Vice-Regal Court. "A difference has occurred between her Majesty and Sir Robert Peel and the Duke of Wellington, respecting her Majesty's intended visit to Ireland. The rumour has it that Sir Robert and the duke were strongly opposed to it, but that her Majesty, with much warmth, declared that she would come to Ireland in the approaching summer, let her Ministers say against it as they will.

BELL-ROCK LIGHTHOUSE.

The monthly return from this establishment (says the Caledonian Mercury) for February takes notice of a heavy sea upon the rock, from the north-east, on the 14th and three following days, when the spray rose from 70 to 80 feet on the lighthouse tower. On each of these days, says the return, "we felt the building tremble but very little." Various of the travellers or boulder stones upon the rock have been shifted from "Arniston and Ulbster" ledges to the west end of "Hope's" Wharf. The boulders connected with the "Royal Burghs" have also been tossed about: one of them measures nine feet in length.

The Bell-rock Lighthouse is situated on the Inchcape Rock (in the German Ocean), about 11 miles south-west of the promontory called the Red-head, in Forfarshire, North Britain. The Scape Rock, as it is called in the olden charts, lies in the track of all vessels making for the estuaries of the Friths of Forth and Tay, from a foreign voyage, and, being a sunken rock, is extremely dangerous. It is about 430 feet in length, and 230 feet in breadth: at the ordinary height of spring tides it is about 12 feet under water. Tradition relates that the abbots of the ancient monastery of Aberbrothock, or Abroath, caused a bell to be so fixed upon the rock that it was rung by the motion of the waves, and thus warned the mariner of impending danger: it also adds, that a Dutch captain carried away the bell, and, as retribution for his offence, was afterwards lost upon the rock, with his ship and crew. This tradition, if we mistake not, forms the plot of a popular melodrama.

The necessity of erecting a lighthouse upon this rock was powerfully shown in the year 1799, when about seventy vessels were wrecked upon the coast of Scotland. "The Commissioners of the Northern Lighthouses" took up the matter, and, after many preliminary arrangements, Mr. Stevenson, the scientific engineer of the Lighthouse Board, erected the present edifice from his own design, but on the principle of the Eddystone Lighthouse, between the years 1807 and 1811. All the stones were shaped and prepared in the work-yard at Abroath; and the several courses having been dovetailed, and connected together by joggles of stone and oaken trenails, the whole building, when erected upon the rock, and properly fixed and cramped, was constituted into one solid mass, from the centre to the circumference.

This lighthouse is of circular form, and built of granite and sandstone; the former being used for the foundation and exterior casing, and the latter for the interior work. The masonry is 100 feet in height; and including the light-room, which is of cast-iron, the entire height is 115 feet. Its diameter at the base is 42 feet, and at the top 13 feet. The ascent from the rock to the entrance-door, which immediately surmounts the solid part of the building (30 feet in height), is by a trap-ladder; and thence to the first apartment, containing the water, fuel, &c., of the light-keepers, by a circular staircase. There are five apartments above the water-room; the light-room store, the kitchen, the bed-room, the library, and the light-room itself. All the windows have double sash-frames glazed with plate-glass, and protected by storm-shutters; for, although the light-room is full 88 feet above the medium level of the tide, and is defended by a projecting cornice, or balcony (with cast-iron net-work), yet the sea-spray, in gales of wind, is driven against the glass so forcibly, that it becomes necessary to close the whole of the dead-lights to windward.

The light-room is of octagonal form, 15 feet high, and 12 feet in diameter, and covered with a dome roof, surmounted with a ball. The framework is of cast iron; and the plate glass a quarter of an inch thick, and measuring 2 feet 6 inches by 2 feet 3 inches. The burners are Argand, placed in the focus of silver-plated reflectors, hollowed to the parabolic curve by the process of hammering, each reflector measuring 24 inches over the lips. These reflectors are ranged upon a frame with four faces, or sides, two of which are fitted with shades of red-stained plate-glass. The frame revolves upon a perpendicular axis, and thus exhibits, alternately, a red light and a bright natural light; and both kinds may be seen, in a clear atmosphere, at six or seven leagues distance. During storms, or in foggy weather, the reflector machinery is made to ring two large bells (each weighing about 12 cwt.), in order to warn the seaman of his danger, when too nearly approaching the rock. The cost of the whole pile, including the first year's stores, is understood to have amounted to nearly £60,000.

Sometimes the windows of the light-room are broken by sea-birds; thus, on February 9, 1842, about 10 P.M., a large herring-gull struck one of the south-east windows with such force, that two of the plates of glass were shivered to pieces and scattered over the floor, to the great alarm of the keeper on watch and the other two inmates of the house, who rushed instantly to the light-room. The gull measured five feet between the tips of the wings. In his gullet was found a large herring, and in his throat a piece of plate-glass an inch in length.

An album is kept at the lighthouse, wherein a distinguished poet wrote as follows:—

Pharos Loquitor.
For in the bosom of the deep,
O'er these wild shelves my watch I keep;
A ruddy gem of changeful light
Bound on the dusky brow of night;
The seaman bids my lustre hail,
And scorns to strike his tumorous sail.—WALTER SCOTT.

SPORTS OF ENGLAND.—No. V.

FLY-FISHING.

"No man should in honesty catch a trout till the middle of March," quoth the father of anglers, quaint, philosophical old Izaak Walton; and, in obedience to their master, all true brethren of the angle have by long usage fixed the 14th of March for fly-fishing to begin. The leaf-buds now give out the first evidences of returning spring. Around the village church the jackdaw comes again—the marsh titmouse begins to raise its note; and, of all nature's signs of spring the most watched for by the trout-fisher, various flies appear. The trolling-rod now gives place to its more pliant compeer, and floats, plummets, snaps, and gorge-hooks, are supplanted by hackles and flies. All the mysteries of a fly-fisher's wallet are now displayed with varied spoils of bird and beast lying ready to the angler's practised hand, as from their gaudy colours he contrives mimic resemblances of the insect tribes who flutter over rippling streams. And learnedly does the "Complete Angler" discuss these things, telling how to weave "the lower fur of a squirrel's tail with the wing of the grey feather of the drake—the hairs of Isabella: coloured mohair, and the wings of a bright mallard's feather"—and a hundred other such compounds for constructing "an admirable fly, and in great repute as a killer." Learned piscatorial disquisitions are indulged in, too, as to the flies best suited for each successive month; but here a golden rule presents itself. Let the angler watch the insects which hover over the stream where he seeks his sport—let him catch one and imitate its size, shape, and colour, and he has the best art which can the fish will rise most readily. The fly-rod, says good authority, should be about twelve feet three inches long, and about fourteen ounces in weight. It must not be top-heavy, nor must it have too much play in the lower part, but the play should be just in proportion to the gradual tapering, by which there will be very little spring, till after about the third foot of its length. A rod too pliable is as bad a fault as being too stiff; and, from being too small there, is, of course, more liable to be top-heavy, which nine rods in ten are; the consequence is, they tire the hand, and do not drop the fly so neatly. Colonel Hawker has best described the proper mode of practising the art. He says, "In throwing a fly, raise the arm well up, without labouring with your body, send the fly backwards by a sudden spring of the wrist. Do not draw the fly too near, or you lose your purchase for sending it back, and therefore require an extra sweep in the air before you can get it into play again. If, after sending it back, you make the counter spring a moment too soon, you will whip off your tail-fly, and if a moment too late, your line will fall in a sloyenly manner. The knack of catching this time is, therefore, the whole art of throwing well. The motion should be just sufficiently circular to avoid this; but if too circular, the spring receives too much check, and the gut will then most probably not drop before the silk line. In a word, allow the line no more time than just to unfold before you retreat the spring of the wrist; this must be done, or you will hear a crack, and find you have just whipped off your tail-fly. For this reason I should recommend beginners to learn at first with only a bob, or they will soon empty their own or their friend's fishing-box; and, at all events, to begin learning with a moderate length of line."

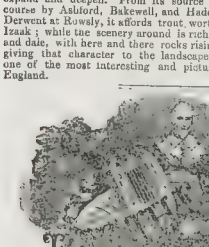
Thus much for the practice of fly-fishing, and now a word for our illustration of it. The angler here whips one of the best trout streams in England—the old baronial residence of the Vernons, the "Kings of the Peak," standing in picturesque stateliness upon a neighbouring eminence. The Wye flows at his feet—now all quiet and placid, floating a lucid mirror above its bright pebbly bed—anon dashing over some rocky impediment in tiny cascades, then coursing swiftly through a narrow, or streaming all impetuous down some sloping course, until again it floats placidly, as its waters expand and deepen. From its source near Buxton, through its course by Ashford, Bakewell, and Haddon, until it falls into the Derwent at Rowsly, it affords trout worthy of all the praises of old Izaak; while the scenery around is rich in variety of hill and slope and dale, with here and there rocks rising in bold prominence, and giving that character to the landscape which renders Derbyshire one of the most interesting and picturesque of the counties of England.



HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

This magnificent house opened on Saturday last with a brilliancy which never before marked the commencement of any season, and which shed its light equally over every department of the establishment.

> On things inanimate and breathing flow'rs,
> Making it one of Pleasure's favrite bow'rs—
> So rich in song, in grace, and muse-like presence!

The interior has undergone a most judicious change in the colouring—the ceiling has been fresh painted—the panels of the boxes are in dead white, richly set off by chaste but highly ornamental gilding; while the new crimson satin draperies impart a costly richness, which makes the ensemble gorgeous without partaking of "the tawdry" in the slightest degree. There is, moreover, an air of cheerfulness breathing throughout the whole, which pleasantly prepares the mind for the enjoyment promised on the rise of the curtain. Those who indulged in such promise had no reason to feel disappointment. The opera chosen for the occasion was Donizetti's "Adelia," expressly written for the display of Persiani's high culture and finished taste; and never, perhaps, did that great singer display her extraordinary art to more advantage or a composer exhibit greater genius and judgment in "writing up" to the versatile powers of that cantatrice, who "seems always to do best that which she is doing!" The commencing mo ement of the overture is replete with the beauty of song, and shows that the Maestro is not the flimsy contrapuntist which he is represented to be by "the simpleton sages and reasoning fools" who are content for ever to be "witler'd and stain'd by the dust of the schools!" If Donizetti were to write an oratorio, we are quite sure he would put forth powers adequate to display the noblest feelings it might be; but it is not to be expected that the composer of upwards of eighty operas should not, like the great Homer himself, sometimes "nod." though after all, that may be only to his familiar acquaintance! Some of the choruses in "Adelia" are magnificent, and many of the arias are in the highest order of joyful and often impassioned genius. Persiani in "Ah! non è, non è, tal nome," was almost superhuman in volition of limitless fancy and faithful obedience of science; and in the beautiful "Addio per poco" with Conti, she poured forth her cadenze with a power and purity which the whole new tenor was labouring under one of those welcoming hoarsenesses, which generally wait upon the natives of the sunny south on their first visit to our humid clime; but he is a singer not to be overcome by any such chance annoyance, for his natural physique and pure chaste style were too apparent and continuing, to allow any disability of the moment to mistake in the smallest degree against his undoubted merits. In the last act he seemed to quite recover himself, for he gave the aria "Mi batti il core" with great power and beauty. There is no doubt that he will ultimately prove an immense favourite. At the fall of the curtain Persiani and Conti were loudly called for to receive the congratulations of a delighted audience. Between the second and third acts of the opera a new divertissement, entitled "L'Aurore," was produced, to bring forward Mlle. Adèle Dumilâtre, for whom it was expressly composed by M. Perrot. The new danseuse is young (not 19 years old), extremely beautiful, and, though perhaps rather tall, so graceful and finished in her style that she bids fair to be a serious rival to even the most favourite handmaid of Terpsichore. We regret to state that during the divertissement M. Perrot strained a tendon, which incapacitated him to appear in the subsequent ballet of "La Tarentule." Apprehensions were entertained at first that it was the Achillean which was injured; but it has been since ascertained that such fears were groundless, and that we are sure shortly to see him again in all his accustomed grace and agility. The renowned Fanny Essler appeared once more in the ballet, and if possible danced with more elegance and finish than ever. She was most rapturously applauded. Several new dancers, second in position but very superior to many soi-disant first rates, appeared; amongst whom we must mention Mesdemoiselles Scheffre, Planquet, and Camille, who executed a pas à merveille, and were most enthusiastically received. We cannot conclude our notice of the opening night of Music's grand season gala without commending the vast improvement which has taken place in the version department of the libretto, which in Romani's original contains some pretty really poetical morceaux, to which something, for the first time, like justice has been rendered in the translation. The house was crowded by a most fashionable audience.

On Tuesday the divertissement of "L'Aurore," which was suddenly cut short on Saturday, by the accident which happened to M. Perrot, was brought to a satisfactory conclusion. This divertissement was played alone by the ladies. M. Perrot's character being omitted, he not having yet recovered from the effects of his' accident. Dumilâtre danced most exquisitely, and added to the favourable impression before formed of her. At the close she was called before the curtain, to receive the warm plaudits of a most gratified audience.

COVENT GARDEN THEATRE.

On Monday night the last work of the great Weber, the opera of "Oberon," after a lapse, we believe, of sixteen years, was revived at this theatre for the benefit of Mr. Bunn; but we regret to say with the principal parts much inferiorly filled than at its original production. The music of this foolish vehicle for sound requires singers of immense power and energy, in which class we cannot reckon Miss Rainforth or Mr. Harrison, against whom the recollection of Paton and Braham (or even Wood) must have militated severely. Miss Rainforth (without any invidious comparison) has neither the physical force nor the breadth and freedom of style which so distinguished her predecessor, and which nevertheless were put to their utmost exertion in "Ocean, thou mighty monster." In passages requiring less power Miss Rainforth was, as she always is, extremely pleasing and correct. Mr. Harrison is too confident in the possession of some vocal strength, and too indifferent to its cultivation. He reminds us of Shakspeare's description—

> Of one whom the music of his own vain tongue
> Doth ravish like enchanting harmony!

The scena, "Oh! 'tis a glorious sight," was not originally composed for the opera by Weber, but written in unwilling compliance with the love for howling which was the besetting sin of the greatest singer in the world, and which, not being the composer's happiest vein, derived all its success from the lungs, and not the style of the performer. The poetry (!) of this scena indulges in some amusing cockney rhymes; such as "red leaves afar," "scattering the night of the forest," and "we should like to see a bar (sy, bah) put to such jingles. Miss Poole, as Fatima, was excellent, and most deservedly encored in "A lovely Arab maid," and "Oh! Araby, dear Arabi" which lost nothing by a comparison with the former execution of the same songs by the favourite and fascinating Vestris. Altogether we do not think the revival will add much for the treasury; we long to see a genuine opera, in libretto as well as music, in which we may have the pleasure of hearing Mrs. A. Shaw, who is the operatic tower of strength to the establishment, and the omission of whose name from any production, revived or otherwise, casts a disappointment and regret not easily to be stayed for. In the course of the evening Mlle. Fanny Elssler appeared (no doubt, in some small amende for having broken her engagement with Mr. Bunn), and was most enthusiastically applauded for her most exquisite dancing.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—Since our last statement the arrivals of English wheat up to Mark lane have been on a moderate scale, and of fair average quality. As most of the large dealers have purchased with extreme caution, the supply has proved more than adequate to meet their wants, insomuch, in order to effect sales, we have suffered a decline of from 1s to 2s per quarter, and large quantities have remained over for next week. The demand for foreign wheat, free of duty, has ruled inactive, and the quotations have fallen 1s per quarter, while the value of bonded parcels has remained almost nominal. In barley and malt we have no variation to notice. Good sound oats have sold at late rates, but the out of condition sorts have fallen 6d per quarter. Beans, peas, and flour have had a dowrard tendency, with very little passing in those articles.

English.—Wheat, 44ss and 45ss fine, 42s to 43s; ditto white, 46s to 48s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 44s to 47s; ditto, white, 48s to 51s; rye, 32s to 33s; grinding barley, 27s to 28s; malting ditto, 30s to 32s; Chevalier, 32s to 34s; Suffolk and Norfolk malt, 56s to 60s; brown ditto, 52s to 54s; Kingston and Ware, 56s to 57s; Chevalier, 63s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 22s to 24s; potato ditto, 25s to 26s; Yoxghal and Cork, black, 17s to 18s, ditto white, 19s to 20s; tick beans, 30s to 32s; ditto, 30s, 34s to 38s; grey peas, 35s to 38s; maple, 33s to 34s; white, 30s to 33s; boilers, 35s to 37s per quarter. Irish.—Oats, 15s to 16s; Suffolk, 44s to 45s; Scotch, 22s to 24s; Yoxghal and Cork, black, 17s to 18s, ditto white, 19s to 20s; tick beans, 30s to 32s; ditto, 30s, 34s to 38s; grey peas, 35s to 38s; maple, 33s to 34s; white, 30s to 33s; boilers, 35s to 37s per quarter. Foreign.—Free wheat, 40s to 48s. In Bond.—Barley, 23s, oats, new, 15s to 17s; beans feed, 14s to 16s; beans, 23s to 27s per quarter. Flour, American, 21s to 24s; Baltic, 22s per barrel.

The Seed Market.—We have had a large arrival of clover seed, but the demand for that article rules very slow. All other kinds of seeds move off heavily, at nearly late rates.

The following are the present rates: Linseed, English, sowing, 48s to 52, Baltic, crushing, 42s to 45s, Mediterranean, 44s to 46s; hempseed, 36s to 40s per quarter; coriander, 10s to 18s per cwt; brown mustard seed, 10s to 11s; white ditto, 10s to 10s 6d; tares, 5s to 5s 6d per bushel; English rapeseed, new, £20 to £21 per last of ten quarters, 24 new cakes, £8 5s to £8 per ton.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread are from 7d to 7½d, of household ditto, 5½d to 6½d for the 4lb. loaf.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 48s 1d; barley, 27s 7d; oats, 17s 2d; rye, 32s 6d; beans, 32s 6d; peas, 32s 4d.

Imperial Average of Corn in Mark-lane for the Week ending July. Wheat, 48s 0d; barley, 27s 2d, oats, 17s 0d, rye, 32s 6d, beans, 32s 6d, peas, 32s 4d.

Duty on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 20s 0d; barley, 9s 0d; oats, 6s 0d; rye, 13s 6d; beans 11s 6d; peas, 11s 6d.

Tea.—On Tuesday a public sale of about 25,000 packages was held. Although there was a good attendance in the room, only about 3000 packages were sold at a reduction of about 1½d per lb. The imports continue large; while, by private contract, next to nothing is doing. The stocks of tea at Liverpool are now 1,276,895 lbs., and at Bristol 683,462 lbs. For Tuesday next about 27,000 packages are already declared.

Sugar.—In consequence of the earthquake in the West Indies having destroyed most of the mills, at the present time the sugar-making land and engineering parties here are anticipating a great falling off in the crop. Some are holding for an advance of from 1s to 1s 6d per cwt. for most kinds of sugar, and which has been noted in many instances. The arrivals from the East Indies are shewn, viz., about [illegible]

Coffee. [illegible]

Rice. We have a fair demand for rice, at an advance of 5s. per cwt.

Cotton.—There is an inquiry for the common qualities of Surat, and the few parcels that have changed hands have brought full prices.

Cochineal.—The sales are on fair terms, and the late advance in prices is readily maintained.

Indigo.—The approaching quarterly sales are attracting much of the attention of the trade. They will comprise about 30,000 packages.

Oils.—This market is very dull, and prices are with difficulty supported.

Tallow.—We have a very inactive demand for Tallow, and prices are drooping. P.Y.C., on the spot, is quoted at 42s 3d to 42s 6d; and New, for autumn delivery, 42s 6d to 42s 9d per cwt.

Provisions. A good business is doing in all descriptions of Irish butter at the late and next public sales. Foreign butter is in fair request, and prices are firmly supported. Bacon moves steadily, remains very dull, 52s to 56s being the extreme prices of prime singed sides. Lard is in a most quiet way with buyers and sellers. Tow transactions in all kinds of hops, provisions continue to be extremely limited, in many instances, are merely nominal.

Hops. The hop trade rules very dull, but prices remain about stationary.

Wool.—About 1500 packages of wool have been imported this week. Privately, scarcely anything is doing.

Potatoes.—The arrivals of potatoes from Scotland and various parts of England are good, but the sale for them is slow at present figures.

Coals.—New Lambton, 19s; Hetton, 17s; Wat Wylam, 18s 6d; Hilda, 16s 6d; Braddyll's Hetton, 18s 3d; Cassops, 18s 3d; South Durham, 17s; Lambton, 18s 6d; Stewart's, 19s per ton. Ships arrived, 44

Smithfield.—Our market has been well supplied with each kind of stock this week, but the demand has ruled heavy at drooping figures. Beef from 3s to 4s; Mutton, 3s to 4s, Lamb, 4s to 5s 2d; Veal, 3s 10d to 4s 10d, and Pork, 3s to 4s per 8 lbs, to sink the offals.

Newgate and Leadenhall.—Nearly 3000 carcases of meat have been received here this week which have had a supporting influence upon the trade, and prices are rather higher. Beef, from 2s 8d to 3s 6d; Mutton, 2s 8d to 3s 8d; Lamb, 4s to 5s; Veal, 3s 4d to 4s; and Pork, 3s to 3s 10d per 8 lb. by the carcase.

BETTS'S FAMILY ATLAS

To be Completed in FOURTEEN MONTHLY PARTS, each containing Four Single or Two Double Maps, and forming a Complete and Handsome Volume of the KNOWN WORLD.

The Proprietor has much satisfaction in appearing before the public with a NEW EDITION of a work which has already reached the high number of 20,000 copies, and which has been found so much affording the means to many families of enjoying the opportunity of supplying themselves with a valuable work at a very reasonable price, and on a plan which is found most convenient by a large portion of the community.

The present edition will possess the advantage of the introduction of several new and very important Maps, the whole of which have undergone a thorough revision, every new and important discovery and settlement will be found carefully introduced. The Maps of ENGLAND, WALES, SCOTLAND, and IRELAND are on an unusually large scale, accurately showing the various lines of RAILROAD, the Temple and Principal Cross Roads, Rivers, Canals, &c. (that of England and Wales alone embracing no fewer than 3500 names). The Maps of the BRITISH COLONIES are also on a large scale, and, as a whole, the Proprietor feels satisfied that the work will be found fully to support the character it has obtained, and he confidently solicits orders from a larger share of patronage than on its first appearance. Extracts from a few literary notices of the former edition are subjoined:—

"It is work as correctly described in its title—it is a good Family Atlas, compiled with care, executed with great beauty, and sold at a moderate price, and we observe that credulous confusion has been made to bring down the information to the latest moment."—Athenæum.

"This is a very elegant and faithful book of maps, the whole of which appear to have been got up with great care, and to be correct, as far as we can judge, as they are printed from steel plates, and are remarkably clear. * * * Mr. Betts deserves the thanks of the public for the manner in which he has executed his labours."—Times

"* * * Independently of these claims to notice, the cheapness of the work, and its elegance of appearance, must ensure its popularity."—Morning Herald

"* * * In this, the expense of the old and elaborate, as well as the errors of the hasty and superficial, are happily avoided, and the Family Atlas is worthy of its name."—Atlas

"* * * To the work is a valuable one: we have tested its accuracy in districts as familiar to us as the face of a country possibly can be, and we feel ourselves quite secure in recommending it to all who wish to supply themselves with a first-rate atlas."—Conservative Journal

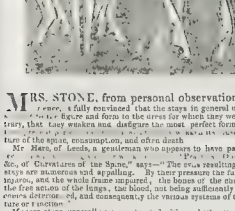
TONE, SOLE MANUFACTURER OF THE IMPROVED FRENCH SHAPE STAYS.



MRS. STONE, from personal observation and after long experience, is fully convinced that the stays in general use are ill adapted to give that graceful figure and form to the dress for which they were intended, but, on the contrary, that they weaken and disfigure the most perfect form. By compressing the chest they cause the shoulders to project, and the bosom to appear flat, producing a distortion of the spine, consumption, and often death.
Mr Hart, of Leeds, a gentleman who appears to have paid great attention to this subject, &c., of Curvatures of the Spine," says—"The ease resulting from the pressure of modern stays are numerous and appalling. By their pressure the functions of the vital organs are so much impeded, that disease is generated, the forms of the female are destroyed, and consequently the various systems of the body suffer either in structure or function."
Modern stays generally are constructed with so little attention to the form of the body that we need hardly be surprised that the female figure is so frequently and so shamefully deformed. Nature ought to be made accustomed that so many, under such untoward circumstances, escape the consequences. After twelve years' practice, experience, perhaps the most extensive ever enjoyed by one individual, Mrs. Stone has succeeded in constructing a stay that will obviate these evils. The great objects she has had in view are to give grace to the person, at the same time to allow the utmost freedom of motion, the pressure on every part being very slight, to admit of necessary intercourse, pliability, and most exquisite to the figure. Combining business upon ready-money principles, and looking to extensive sales as her sole remuneration, and not to large profits, her stays will be found from 20 to 30 per cent. cheaper than other houses with any pretension to experience. She respectfully solicits a trial, being confident of giving entire satisfaction.
Mrs Stone's Stays are to be obtained at the following establishments only:—9, Middleton Bishops, 1, Hanway-street, Oxford-street, 93, St. John-street-road, near the Angel; and 32, North street, Brighton.

MONUMENT TO SIR WALTER SCOTT.
EDINBURGH.

The spark of life is like a spark of fire—
It flasheth forth its beauty and is gone!
So dies the minstrel, leaving Fancy's lyre
Bereft of heart and chords and song and tone—
Silent, because it cannot sing alone.
Meanwhile, all those who loved it mourn and weep
For loss of him with whom it could not sleep.

Yet leaves he pearls behind!—A glorious name
That time would fear to kill—so passeth by!
A dearly-cherished memory—a fame
Forbid by immortality to die!
The crown for which a world of poets sigh:
A fairy tree, which none could find
From whence he pluck'd the bay-leaves of the mind.

So perished Scott!—and grand the legacy
He left unto a world of grieving love!
The blow that set his mighty spirit free
Left it no wings to fly—except above.
No other way than Heavenward could he rove
Who to new virtue still with mind gave birth,
And sought in soul a Paradise on earth.

'Tis almost vain to talk of monuments
Perpetuating fame to such as Scott!
Ages that gather in their roll of rents
Will laugh to see the sculpture fall and rot—
Crumbling to what we call our common lot.
But mid her plunder of earth, seas, and skies,
Eternity will deem his name a prize.

Most bountiful to him had Genius been,
Who fondly chose him for her second child
As Shakspere was her first; and both I ween
Among her homes had taken wanderings wild
To gather treasures that a world beguiled;
Draining the deeps of thought to find and fling
Gems round the throne where Learning reign'd a king!

Honoured of Gods—proud Intellect! E'en thou,
Feeding with oil the bright lamps of the brain,
Filling the springs from whence all thought doth flow,
And turning laggard Dulness back again—
Didst never deem the flattering homage vain,
To leave thy home—and wend a pilgrim forth,
To bow before the Wizard of the North?

Oh, many a night, in Abbotsford's old hall,
The sprites will sing his ballads to the moon;
And, as the spirit-voices rise and fall,
His knights and heroines will greet the tune,
And dance like faries on a night in June;
Or tilt their lances for a dreamy while
In tournaments around the ancient pile.

Or some, perhaps, will revel and carouse,
As he hath told in many a merrie tale;
The thousand crown'd and coronetted brows,
Whom once his muse pursued o'er hill and dale,
May shine again in helm and coat of mail:
'Till visions fly—as Sol updraws the dew,
And Teviot's stream receives the spirit-crew!

Then comes the day, and with it living men,
To view the mansion where a Scott was born,
To praise his mighty genius once again,
And once again to grieve that he is gone—
Or, near the spot this sculpture shall adorn,
Pay reverence to the genius all revere—
Whose greatness wears its mortal record here.

Or they will seek his other home—the tomb,
The shrine of past mortality alone.
Earth holds the glory, and a grave the gloom,
While his form moulders 'neath the marble stone
Where the world's tears have writ "The Great Unknown!"
Though only erst unknown—for Wisdom's wand
Dispell'd the mystery to enchant the land!

Synonymous with Honour—now his name
Doth share with her the pinnacle of light;
Illumining the very domes of Fame,
And flinging radiance from its golden height
To dazzle all the world, and yet delight!
Half worshipp'd by the good, by none forgot,
Lived—died—is mourned—Imperishable Scott!

SCENE FROM THE OPERA OF "ADELIA."

THE OPERA.

Never did the Opera open more brilliantly than on Saturday last. The fashionable world opened its season on the same spot where it has so often commenced it before. Fair faces thronged the boxes, adorned as beauty only knows how to adorn itself; and black eyes were wandering round them in search of friends, or gazing fixedly on the syren Persiani, who was pouring from her throat the linked notes of her marvellous music with a passion and poetry which almost seemed as if the gift of song had that hour been born anew within her, and was then and there revelling in its own irresistible and flooding sweetness.

The plot of the opera was slight, as Donizetti's plots generally are; but the slender story was abundantly compensated by the plenteous poetry and passion with which Madame Persiani invested the creation of the heroine. The execution of the mad scena, "Ah! mi lasciate," was inspired by the very muse of operatic melody; and he is to be pitied through whose soul the living notes did not thrill till the tear all but rose to the tremulous passion of the voice. Conti, the new tenor—at least new to this country—made his appearance in Olivier. He possesses a rich, mellow voice, and sings with passionate feeling. The flexibility of his organ is first-rate, and although he was evidently suffering from a severe cold, he made the audience acknowledge by their applause that he was a master in his art. But the début of Conti was not the only début of the evening. One of the sweetest dancers who ever trod upon the boards of her Majesty's Theatre made her first appearance before an English audience in a divertissement, arranged by that unrivalled artiste Perrot, called "L'Aurore." Adèle Dumilâtre is scarcely more than eighteen, tall, yet perfectly proportioned, and gifted with an innate grace which is seldom accorded in so vast a degree to the danseuse. She appears to swim through the dance, and scarcely touch the earth, so deliciously unobvious is the mechanical motive of her action. Her mode is perfect, and her style of execution pure. As a model of grace it would be impossible to surpass her. If she becomes not a permanent and high favourite among the frequenters of the Opera, it will be as eternal a disgrace to their appreciation of the excellent as to their love of the beautiful. Unfortunately the ballet was brought to a premature conclusion by a severe accident which happened to the admirable Perrot, which has since been announced as the giving way of some of the fibres of one of the minor muscles about the ancle.

Mr Lumley was compelled to come before the curtain, and appease the restless anxiety of the audience by informing them that the requisite medical attendance was with M. Perrot, ere the performances were suffered to proceed. After the conclusion of the opera, an old favourite, Elssler—Fanny Elssler—made her appearance in "La Tarentule," a ballet which she first rendered famous all over the Continent, and subsequently carried amongst the savages who live upon the other side of the Atlantic. Were we to say that Time has not stricken a single charm from her we should say no more than the truth. He has not touched her. Buoyant as ever, she ravishes a heart with every step, and wins admiration with every gesture. As a pantomimist she was always wonderful, and if possible she is now more singularly perfect than ever. The performance of the maddened dance, the sudden trembling, the passionate bound, the rapid step, and the haggard look, with that quiet and provoking smile which curved her lip as she gazed sideways from time to time at il omeopatico, were finely artistic. Her execution was like a delicious glass of champagne—all spirit and animation. Never were an audience more unanimous in their rapture. M. Sylvain, who supported her, is a thoroughly accomplished and clever dancer. His manner is pure, vigorous, and full of taste, and as a mere executional artist he is only inferior to the inimitable Perrot. At the fall of the curtain Fanny Elssler was loudly called for, and with her appearance before it the evening closed.

As a concluding remark we may mention that for the first time during our remembrance the translation of the libretto has been made by a poet, and, that our readers may see in how satisfactory a manner he has performed so tedious a task, we shall subjoin an extract:—

ROMANCE OF OLIVIER.

What destiny shall now be mine?
My world of happiness was bright;
I felt its halo round me shine,
And reel'd upon its dizziest height.
My spirit seem'd of purest bliss,
As bath'd in an eternal glow.
Alas! one moment, brief as this,
Crushed all in hopeless ruin low.
Why, at that sacred threshold, where
I seem'd as on love's sweetest brink,
Did I behold, in pale despair,
Thy trembling beauty fainting sink?
Why, from thy lips, when his control—
Thy father's—wild'd we should be wed,
Fled thy fond promise, like a soul
Dying, and leaving thee as dead?
Deceived! The hope that Love, indeed,
In Adele's heart had crown'd me king,
Rush'd by me with the fiery speed
Of lightning on its fleetest wing.
The star that guided me has set
Its radiant light in sorrow's wave;
And life is all one grief, that yet
Will soon be silenced in the grave.

This is an innovation as agreeable in its form as it is well meant upon the part of the lessee.

CARRICKFERGUS.—Wm. Leper, sen., Wm. Leper, and Thomas Leper were sentenced to be executed for the murder of John Lamont. Mr. Justice Crampton said he would intercede with the Lord Lieutenant to have their sentences commuted to transportation for life.

NOTTINGHAM ELECTION.—The select committee appointed to try the merits of the petitions presented against the return of Mr. Walter assembled on Wednesday (Mr. Horsman, chairman). Mr. Kinglake and Mr. Hoobby appeared as counsel in support of the petitions; Mr. Austen and Mr. Hildyard for the sitting member. The chairman, before the proceedings commenced, announced several resolutions to which the committee had agreed, the principal of which was one founded on the act of last session, requiring, in cases of treating, that counsel should state the times and places where such treating was alleged to have taken place. Several witnesses were examined, and the committee adjourned at four o'clock.

Two schools for practical engineering, as far as the science is connected with the management of locomotive engines, and the machinery of steam-engines in ships, and water craft, have, within a week or two, been opened at the Polytechnic Institution in Regent-street, where instruction, and the illustration that can be derived from the use of an immense apparatus and numerous models, and from experiments, are given by practically scientific men. The most important of these schools, at least the one from which the great bulk of the community will derive the greatest advantage, is the school for teaching the drivers of locomotive engines on railroads the proper manner in which to manage the engine so as to prevent accidents, and yet obtain from the power under their direction the full force and efficacy which it possesses. For this purpose, the men are taught the real nature and properties of steam, its uses, and the danger of abusing it; the manner in which it operates as a propeller, the proper mode of availing themselves of its energies, and the proper mode of ascertaining how far they may go with it, and at what moment to relax. They are, when sufficiently instructed in this branch of their education, made practical engineers, by being taken to the Croydon Railroad, where, under the practical instruction of drivers and engineers, they are enabled to reduce what they have learnt to practice, by the use of a real locomotive engine, of which the directors of the Croydon Railroad, very much to their credit, and in a most public-spirited manner, have granted the use. The men are thus made steady, experienced, and well-taught drivers, and the public guaranteed against the ignorance and foolhardiness of persons incompetent, and reckless of the consequences of their inefficiency. The men, when fully competent to take the command of an engine, have a certificate given them, setting forth their acquirements and character. The other school is for the instruction of commanders and officers in the navy in the management of steam-engines on board steamers; so that any officer in her Majesty's service, suddenly removed from a man-of-war to a steamer may make himself acquainted, in a very short time, at the Institution, by means of apparatus and models, accompanied by oral instruction, with the nature of the steam-power and its application to steam navigation, and then go aboard a steamer with a competent knowledge of his new duties.

TO THE

ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS OF MARCH 18, 1843.

FINE ARTS.

We have devoted our Supplement of this week to the Fine Arts, not so much for the purpose of criticising, or giving a dissertation on art generally, as to bring before the reader the present stage at which art has arrived in its progress, as exhibited by the latest productions in sculpture, in painting, and illustrated literature. Part of our subject possesses a national and public, as well as an artistic interest; and comes, in fact, under the department of News; in treating it we are but describing the progress towards completion of works whose erection will be public events of general and enduring interest. In the domain of art, we are anticipating what will become news—and that the description of news which of all others the best admits of illustration. This we need scarcely say is the portion of the present sheet which describes the progress of the different public and national monuments, now in course of preparation by their different artists, and which comes under the head of sculpture. In the portions given to painting, art stands more exclusively by itself; we have divided Foreign productions from the works of one of the greatest of modern British artists—more for the sake of convenience, than from any wish to divide what is so closely connected in its nature; another division of our paper takes up art as united with literature, in those illustrated works which form one of the characteristics of the present day.*

BRITISH FINE ARTS.

SCULPTURE.

There is much activity at present in the British school of sculpture. There has always been more attention paid to it than to painting, for it furnishes the only means of expressing the national esteem for eminence in any pursuit, either in the arts of war or peace. The bust and the monument, even the column, require the sculptor to produce, or assist in producing them, and, as a nation, we have not been unproductive of those to whom such tributes are due:—

> Great men have been among us—hands that penned
> And tongues that uttered wisdom better none.

And though the trophy has more frequently been raised to the warrior than to the sage, perhaps to the encouragement of a military spirit in an undue proportion to that given to the peaceful pursuits of science and art, yet it is to be hoped that the attention paid to one description of greatness may kindle an emulation in those who admire the other, and that we may be enabled to throw off the reproach of Johnson, that we are among the nations who

> Slowly wise, and meanly just,
> To buried merit raise the tardy bust.

It is to monumental sculpture the government of this country has always given the little encouragement it ever did bestow upon art of any kind. That patronage has not been always well regulated, nor the effect produced invariably commensurate with the expense incurred. On this subject we shall avail ourselves of the remarks of an accomplished critic, who, after dwelling on the merits of Flaxman as a sculptor, thus mentions him in connexion with the question of public monuments and government patronage:—

"At the latter end of his career the royal favour promised him a wider field of exertion, and a nobler foundation for his well-earned fame; but the nation and the government, as bodies, were alike indifferent to his talents or the glory of encouraging them; and the people possess none of his works, except his monuments in the churches. Among these, the most remarkable are the monuments of Nelson, Howe, and Sir Joshua Reynolds, in St. Paul's; of Lord Mansfield and John Kemble, in Westminster Abbey. Had England possessed a Pericles, she might in her Flaxman have found a Phidias: but George III. had no idea of sculpture; and his successor, though well-inclined towards the arts, from his munificent and somewhat fastidious spirit, was miserably devoid of taste. The reign much was done and spent, and had equal pains been taken to do well and lay out wisely, architecture and sculpture would have advanced indeed. To work for St. Paul's, in memory of the heroes of his country, was now the privilege of the English sculptor; but patronage and inspiration were controlled by narrow views and limited means: few works possessing a character of true greatness are found within those walls. The real cause of this failure was, perhaps, the absence of all foresight and confidence on the part of those at whose disposal were the national monuments. Had such a man as Flaxman been engaged to form a grand plan which should be gradually carried out, for the adornment of St. Paul's, and the commemoration of the war and our victories, the pettiness and absurdities which degrade both might have been avoided. Had not the Cappella Sistina been placed at the disposal of Michael Angelo, that boast of modern art would never have existed: but example is lost upon us. The absence of any sedile power—the want, perhaps, of a minister of public works in England, prevents, in great measure, the development of any grand idea. What we resolve to do is done at once by individual means: and the steady pursuit—for long years, and under changing governments—of one established plan, either in architecture or the sister arts, is barely known. Lately, a better spirit has arisen in street architecture, which will doubtless have its effect on sculpture; but, to insure the accomplishment of any great work, the supremacy of one directing mind must never be disputed. Had Sir Christopher Wren been allowed to carry out his plan of improvements in the city,—and, still more, had he lived later with that power, every year adding its portion to the pre-arranged work, and every new erection happily subordinate to the general effect,—the many pleasing parts would have tended to one magnificent whole, which would now have been developing its beauty. So, in the sculptures of St. Paul's, the want of pre-arrangement and general design has reduced the monument to a multitude of unconnected statues and incongruous ideas, instead of each illustrating the other, and all blending in one great and harmonious design. The relieves, dedicated in portions to the recital of certain parts of the history respectively; the groups assigned to their appropriate places, and connecting links established between statue and statue; a distinct portion reserved for the eminent in the arts of peace; and the naval separated from the military, of those whose glory was in deeds of war; a settled and consistent costume; established and expressive symbols; the studied instancation of inscriptions; and the observance of that order, which, without forcing sameness or uniformity on the separate statues, or in any way binding down the spirit of the individual artist, would have secured an harmonious whole, and made each part powerfully to aid the general effect:—such were the precautions, the neglect of which has destroyed capabilities unrivalled in Europe. This waste of the means of greatness is unreasonably visited on the artist, but it is due to the indifference of government and the opposition of churchmen, who, in other countries the patrons of the arts, were here unfortunately opposed, on principle, to their progress. The erection of a national monument in architecture, with an express view to the disposal of sculpture, to contain statues, &c., of the heroes by sea and land who, during the last war, raised the name of England high among the nations, was contemplated at the right time, but the government preferred to spend as much money on fireworks and Chinese pagodas as would by this time have gone far towards the expenses of such an erection. Had that monument been erected, the interior of St. Paul's might have been dedicated to more appropriate memories than those of battle. A Howard, a Johnson, a Reynolds, and the pious Heber, are the monuments of this class. Jenner, Watt, Wilberforce (as embodying an ideal), Newton, the educators, humanisers, peacemakers, and benefactors of the country and mankind, should be remembered in marble, within the metropolitan church, at the expense of the nation.

"The opportunity of establishing these national monuments was certainly at the close of the war, and Flaxman was well qualified to have designed them. His was a happy period for the foundation of a great work, and for the commencement of a school which ought to carry English sculpture to its desired place. The originality and vigour of his mind, which rose in proportion to the demands on them, only required scope and stimulus. Such a field would have fired with a noble enthusiasm, and have elevated his soul to the noblest heights. The immediate commerce with foreign countries by the most distinguished men of our own bad created a taste for sculpture which began to be better understood. Banks had shown that English genius was not uncultivable; Flaxman had proved himself equal to his contemporaries on the Continent—equal in hand and eye, and superior in power and sentiment. Canova then, and Thorwaldsen since, could alone compete with Flaxman; for, with some splendid exceptions, mediocrity is the mark of our time rather than of our country: a fact the more remarkable, as this may be considered the peculiar period of science, not only in research but in diffusion."

With much of the following remarks, also, we agree:—

"Our squares and public places are not without their monuments of kings, and warriors, and statesmen. But do the modern instances excel the old? Mr. Wyatt's literal George III., on his ideal horse, in Cockspur-street, and the plaster figure of George IV., over the station-house, at King's Cross, are the last metropolitan erections in honour of royalty. The Dukes of Kent and York are remembered as generals; and the latter is, by way of triumph, perched in bronze at the top of a tall, severe, and naked column of granite, as if to suffer punishment rather than receive honour. The portrait-statues of Pitt and Canning, in Hanover-square and Palace-yard, on their pyramidal pedestals, are harsh, heavy, and terminal; and to Nelson and Wellington no monument is yet erected, except the Achilles in the park, which includes the latter among the brave men to whom their countrywomen dedicated that unmeaning and inappropriate colossus. These certainly are no proofs of the advance of art. Our monumental sculptures are better, and our busts are best. But this is not the legitimate effect of the Elgin Marbles. The imaginative and the ideal are wanting, and no one devotes himself to art in the abstract. The Duke of Northumberland, Earl Grey, and other noblemen and gentlemen, have lately ordered works of a higher class; but the instances are few where sculpture is loved for its own sake. Private patronage is chiefly turned to busts and monuments, and the country does nothing. Even Mr. Barry's design for the new houses of Parliament is denuded of its enrichments and all its intended sculptures. But there are means to reconcile vanity and art, and to confer a favour at once on history and sculpture in that design. Let the tracery of the interior of both houses spring from heads in relievo, and let these heads be portraits of the members of each house at the time of erection. Some 800 recollections of our day would thus be handed down to posterity. Busts of the distinguished men who already belong to history might be thus given at the expense of the country; and every peer or M.P., who wished to be immortalised without establishing a claim on the country, might add his own urbe, with his own bust, to the adornment of the chambers of legislation, and to the illustration of his period."

Leaving the last suggestion to the committee under which the decorations of the new houses are understood to be placed, we return to the immediate question of our public monuments. The desire to perpetuate the memory of our great men is, at present, awakening into praiseworthy activity. It will be remembered that during the last session of Parliament a sum of money was voted for the erection of three monuments,—to Sir Sydney Smith, to Lord de Saumarez, and to Lord Exmouth, three of our greatest modern naval commanders. The execution of the monument of Sir Sydney Smith has been entrusted by Sir R. Peel to Mr. Thomas Kirk, of Dublin, that of Lord de Saumarez to Mr. John Steel, of Edinburgh; and Mr. P. Macdowell, an artist residing in London, has the execution of the monument of Lord Exmouth. These works are, at the present time, in a state of active progress. They will form the subject of future remark and illustration.

There are other works of the same kind more advanced, in fact, completed, or on the eve of completion, and we feel much pleasure in being authorised to give an exact statement of the stage of their progress, accompanied by authentic engravings of them.

There are two equestrian statues of the Duke of Wellington in preparation; one is raised by a subscription of the nobility, to be erected in the "West-end," the execution of which is entrusted to Wyatt; the other may be called the opposition statue, as it is to be erected in the east, on the open space in front of the Mansion-house; it was entrusted to the late Sir Francis Chantrey, but will be completed by Mr. Weekes. The horse is in a very advanced stage.

There are several busts of eminent characters in preparation, of which we hope to be able, in a short time, to present engravings to our readers. Among them is one of Dwarkanauth Tagore, who has lately returned to India from a visit to this country; another is a bust of the late Marquis of Wellesley, the brother of the Duke of Wellington.

NIXON'S STATUE OF WILLIAM IV.

One of the statues of which we this week give sketches is that of his late Majesty William IV., which is to be placed at the end of King William Street, at the city end of London Bridge, towards which the front of the statue will be directly placed. The execution of this work was entrusted to Mr. Nixon by the Common Council, who voted £1,600 towards the expense of the statue; to this the Commissioner of Sewers added £600 more. The whole credit of originating the statue is due to the citizens of London. The material of the statue is granite, and in that respect it will be unique: the art of working this difficult material to a fine surface may be said to have been rediscovered by Mr. Nixon; and the excellence to which he has brought it is such that it equals the specimens of the Egyptian method of working it, of which the finest examples may be found in Lord Prudhoe's lions in the British Museum. So determined was Mr. Nixon to spare neither time, trouble, nor expense in producing a work worthy of the city, that he first made a model of the statue of the full size, then from that model he carved the statue in Portland stone, and from this last model he produced the statue itself. His success has been equal to his zeal and application; the likeness of the late monarch is admirably caught and preserved; the costume of the figure is that which the king most affected—the uniform of an English admiral, with the addition of a cloak, the well-arranged folds of which give a fullness and dignity to the whole. The pedestal, designed by Mr. Kelsey, the architect, is simple in its design, without being meagre or unsatisfactory; it bears a general resemblance, not pushed so closely, however, as to become eccentric, to the capstan of a ship, and it rests on a plinth, representing a coil of rope. It is at present expected that the statue will be completely finished and thrown open on next lord mayor's day.

We have given a view of the intended site of the statue, and a separate engraving of the statue itself, for which we refer the reader to our tableau of sculpture.—(See p. 195.)

BAILEY'S STATUE OF NELSON.

This statue of Nelson is intended for the Nelson pillar in Trafalgar-square, on the merits of which there has been so much controversy; it is executed by Bailey, who has produced some of the finest pieces of ideal sculpture the country can boast of; it appears to us that this style of work is not suited to him; it is a mere portrait statue, with no attempt to raise the subject above a literal fidelity of figure and costume. The material is a fine compact limestone, and it is throughout an admirable specimen of "working."—(P. 195.)

WEEKES'S STATUE OF THE BISHOP OF MADRAS.

Dr. Corrie, the first Bishop of Madras, was chaplain to Bishop Heber, and seems to have possessed many of the estimable qualities of that most amiable of bishops, who makes frequent mention of him in his Journal. He was universally esteemed for his plain and unaffected piety, and his unwearied exertions in establishing the means of education for the native youth of India. The statue executed by Weekes is to be erected in St. George's Church at Madras, and is at present on its voyage to its destination. The statue is of white marble, and is simply beautiful in its design. It represents the good bishop in his robes, supporting an open book with one hand, while the other rests on the shoulder of a native boy, who is looking to the benevolent countenance bent upon him with the utmost respect and affection. The figure of the youth is very graceful, his naked limbs contrasting strongly with the full flowing drapery of the bishop's robes. Altogether it is a work that does credit to the school of English sculpture.—(P. 195.)

FOREIGN ART.

PAINTING.

We are not about to plunge into all the difficulties and differences of the various Continental "schools" of painting; it is better to admire than dispute; there is such a thing as the bigotry of art—a feeling which individuals, nations, and journals, should alike endeavour to avoid. There are, besides some points connected with the subject, which the fiercest partisans can hardly venture to dispute. No one can deny to Italy the merit of being the first nation that revived the arts after the days of darkness that settled down on Europe, and she was equally the inspirer of other nations to follow in her course. Let us add, too, the tribute so justly her due, the concession of her eminent superiority. The world has not yet seen the artist nor the productions of art that can dispute the palm of excellence with the paintings of the Italian school, with its fervour of imagination, and the artistic skill that can successfully embody what was imagined. Not only has the world not seen the rivals or equals of a Titian or a Raphael, but it can hardly hope to see them; their names stand forth like those of Homer and Shakspeare, unapproached and, by ordinary modes of study, unapproachable. This may be the result of causes in some respects similar. The greatest of poets were created by the peculiar circumstances of their age and time, acting on those intellectual qualities which enabled them

> To get the start of the majestic world,
> And bear the palm alone.

We doubt if such a conjunction of causes can again arise like that which helped to develop the genius of Italy in the domain of art. A people with fine perceptions of the beautiful, of passion, and enthusiasm. Rulers sharing the national character, and possessed of the wealth that enabled them to reward those who devoted their lives to the embodyment of the beautiful. A church, that so far from looking with suspicion on the efforts of art, sought an alliance with it, and made it one of the most magnificent instruments by which it addressed itself to the minds and hearts of a race peculiarly fitted to be so appealed to. How are all these conditions to be recalled? Where is the power that could bring another Lorenzo de' Medici to the sovereignty of Florence, or instal another Leo the Tenth (also one of that noble race) in the Vatican? The greatness of Italy, as the land of art, lies more in the past than the present; but what a past how rich are the memories she possesses! There they are for the world to admire, envy, to emulate, but scarcely to surpass. Let us turn from Italy, and see what is being accomplished in other countries. Germany is now rising into deserved celebrity as a school of art; her people have deep feeling, if not enthusiasm; they are persevering and laborious in the pursuit of an end. Here are the qualities that go far to fit men for the long study necessary to the attainment of excellence. Then their history is full of incident; their country is rich in historical associations; it is still strewn with the relics of feudal and baronial power; it is not yet absorbed by that feverish devotion to commercial pursuits and political contests that absorbs all the old, and the greater portion of the young energies and intellect of this nation. From Germany much may yet be expected, more and better than she has yet produced, though some of her artists have furnished works worthy of all admiration. Two of these we have given in p. 198: it is a copy of "Les Vendanges à Naples," by Winterhalter. We have taken two other pictures from the French school,—one, the "Princes of Baden," by Genalt von Goh Grund (p. 199); the other, "The Madonna," of Paul De la Roche (p. 202),—but we have not here the necessary space to go into an examination of their merits and defects. In comparison with the German, it is less freed from the trammels of that correct, but somewhat cold style, contracted by a perhaps too exclusive study of classic models. It has not yet so decidedly broken into the more free domain of the romantic; but the artists of France, like its authors, are in the transition state between the two worlds. In entering the last, we hope they will not leave behind them the good qualities they have acquired in the first. Of the state of painting among ourselves, we shall speak in another place.

WINTERHALTER'S VENDEMMIA, OR VINTAGE OF NAPLES.

The Vendemmia, or Vintage, is a sort of rustic carnival or Saturnalia holiday, in which, from time immorial, the peasants of Italy have been accustomed to allow themselves, and to be allowed by their masters and superiors, a degree of liberty as large as obtained among the common people of ancient Rome, when they commemorated the freedom and equality which prevailed on earth in the golden reign of Saturn. When the wine is all trodden out in the wine-press—trodden out by the naked feet of jumping, frolicking swains—the prime part of the festival commences, consisting generally of a classical procession, and of a good repast at the end of it. On most occasions a nice attention to detail may be observed, and certain delicate distinctions which are scarcely to be expected from an ignorant, unread peasantry. A procession, described by a recent traveller, was really admirable. Bacchus, instead of being represented in the manner of our vulgar signpainters, by a fat, paunchy, red-faced, drunken boy, was personified by the tallest, handsomest, and most graceful young man of the party; his head was crowned with a wreath of ivy and vine leaves, mixed with bunches of the purple grape, which hung down the sides and the back of his neck; in his right hand he carried a lance tipped with a cone of pine or fir-apple, and the shaft was entwined with ivy and vine leaves, and some wild autumnal flowers, the thing thus being, as nearly as might be, the classical thyrsus, one of the most ancient attributes of the god and his followers; a clean sheep's skin, spotted with the red juice of the grape, in imitation of the skin of the panther or spotted pard, which Bacchus is represented as wearing when he went on his expeditions, was thrown gracefully over his shoulders; he was followed by some silen, sedate women, carrying on their heads baskets filled with grapes; by little boys carrying in their hands large bunches of the same fruit; by Bacchants of both sexes, who carried sticks entwined with vine leaves; by two or three carts, which had been used to convey the ripe fruit to the wine-press, each drawn by a pair of tall cream-coloured oxen, with those large, dark, incisive eyes to which Homer thought it no disparagement to compare the eyes of the wife of Jupiter. The Bacchante bounded, danced, frolicked, and laughed uproariously; but Bacchus preserved the decorum and dignity of the true classical character of the god who was as graceful as Apollo, who shared with that divinity the dominion of Parnassus, and the faculty and glory of inspiring poets with immortal verse. The joyous shouts of Viva le Vendemmia! were mingled with the beat and jingle of two or three tambourines, with the rural sound of cow-horns, and occa sionally with the blasts of a cracked but antique-looking trumpet, and with the clapping of hands and shoutings of all the men and women, boys and girls of the district. The hills, which bore the fruit productive of the generous wine, echoed and re-echoed with the joyous sounds, for the scene of the festivity was at the foot of those hills on whose sunny slopes the vines had ripened which furnished this happy vintage.—(See p. 198.)

Winterhalter, so favourably known in this country as the painter of the "Decameron," has taken a scene from this grateful custom, as the subject of the picture before us. In its treatment he has overtaken the gentlest flights of the sister art of poetry. The performers in this lovely festival are perfect men and women: their forms are beautiful; the expression of their affections simple and sincere; and their dramatic actions, while they perfectly tell the painter's story, and are full of "sweet majesty and love," are nevertheless those of modest and unaffected rusticity. How gracefully, how touchingly, is the affection of a mother revealed in the foreground figure. The poor peasant woman offering a glorious bunch of grapes to her half-awakened child serves also as an introduction to the design of the entire composition. The fruits of the earth have been gathered, and the people rejoice in the works of their Maker's hands. And with what a graceful mastery of the poetic resources of his art has the painter hinted to his readers, that in a scene so fair, and amid creatures so blissfully endowed, love should find its proper residence. The amiable encounter of lovers' eyes, which forms the great incident of the picture, is told in the downcast looks of a maiden who receives for the first time the admiring glance of a captivated swain. The elegance, simplicity, and truth of these figures are, we believe, unparalleled on canvas. Shakspere has given them to our "mind's eye," but it has been reserved to Winterhalter to give them a bodily incarnation. The accessories of the picture are all accessories to the story. A fine spirit of harmony pervades the minutest details; the drawing—the academic drawing—is severely correct, and the chiaro-scuro condensed and striking.

The print of this beautiful picture has just been published by Messrs. Hering and Remington, 153, Regent-street, and by their kind permission we have been able to prepare a vignette from it, for the gratification of our readers. We recommend the print as a fine ornament of the drawing-room. The influence of such a picture is directly civilizing in its tendencies. It tells us of a refinement of which the commonest natures are capable, but of which the toiling sons of Britain are yet comparatively destitute.

PAINTING.

The next division of our subject brings us to the sister art of sculpture —Painting—which Rousseau well described as "silent music"—a happy phrase which comes well from him, whose prose is the most vivid of painting. But we are here precluded from any general notice of the subject, even if we had the space for it, for our illustrations in this portion of our supplement are taken exclusively from the British School of Art. The controversy on the merits and defects of our national art and artists is loud and fierce, as all controversies are, where the contending parties are those most interested in the question, but while artists are caballing and plotting, soon looking with envy on those above them, and disdaining those below them in station, it not in talent, with contempt—it would be well if those who can see things impartially should occasionally remind them that that great body, the public, regard all disputes, excepting always those of politics, with surprising indifference. They look more at results than anything else; and at these they often look but unwisely, with little either of judgment or appreciation. The aim of all who wish well to art should be to win the attention of the people to art itself, stripped of all personal and disturbing influences. The worst enemy of artists is public indifference; and the squabbles of coteries and academies—the jealousies and conspiracies of the excluding and the excluded—are not likely to win them from their state of careless quietude. It will be well if such disputes do not have the effect of turning simple indifference, which is bad enough, into positive disgust, which is infinitely worse. Nor is there any want of material to which to call the attention of the public with the probability of the happiest effect. England's art is not deficient in names that may stand beside those of any of the schools of the Continent, if we except the great masters of Italy, whose genius kindled by religious fervour, and fed by all the encouraging influences that a wealthy church and powerful princes could bring to bear upon it, produced works that stand alone and unapproachable—the wonders of their own age and the despair of all succeeding it. The British school of painting has reached its present eminence under circumstances altogether discouraging to works partaking of the grandest and most elevated style. Our church has feared to accept the aid of art as an influence on the human mind, and has, with a care amounting to suspicion, stripped her edifices of all that can appeal to the imagination through the eye; even when art has proffered her aid it has been rejected. Had a second Michael Angelo arisen among us he would have found no Sistine Chapel to receive the creations of a genius almost awful in the daring sublimity of its conceptions. The aversion of the church has been well seconded by the utter indifference of the State, at least for the last two centuries. The Stuarts were the last royal patrons of the arts; with them faded the last few and faint gleams of light which gilded the English crown with a pale reflex of that halo of refinement and munificence shed around the sway of the Medici. It almost seems as if royal taste and royal despotism fell together. Art was left to appeal to the people only, and therefore it is not surprising that it produced only what the people could admire, appreciate, and last, though not least, what the people could purchase. What kind of painting most flourishes among us? Portraiture, which addresses itself to the admiration of the people for those who attain distinction, or to the amiable affections of social life; landscape may perhaps come next; and if we add that description of imaginative painting which does not create, but reproduces the conceptions of the popular poet or novelist, we shall have enumerated nearly all the styles to which the English school of art can point as properly its own.

But, within its own domain, our school has produced artists and works second to none, who have attempted the same description of works. We need not run over a list of names which must be familiar to every one; we will come to one of the last and greatest, who, in his peculiar walk, was inimitable. Our illustrations are taken from the last productions of the pencil of Wilkie.

SIR DAVID WILKIE'S SKETCHES IN TURKEY, SYRIA, AND EGYPT. Part I. Graves and Warmsley, Pall Mall.

The noble histories and simple parables of the Sacred Scriptures have never been illustrated in a truthful spirit. The painters of the Greek and Roman churches have, it is true, given to the sentiment of their heavenly-minded narratives, but their costumes, their localities, architecture, and national and tribal characteristics, have always been those of more modern countries, while in too many cases they have been mixed with superstitious fables and "lying imaginations." Thus it has happened that while truth has been the aim of less holy or even trivial and unimportant subjects of illustration, the Bible has stood alone and pre-eminent for the falsehood of its pictures. The Virgin of Raffaelle is not the Virgin of the Gospels; neither is the Monk or the fair Benedictines who usually find a place in the Holy Families, their fit and true associates. But we live in better times. Our own travellers and painters, the camera lucida and the Daguerreotype, are pouring in upon us a flood of light upon these neglected and much abused subjects, which will ere long enable us to accompany David in his perils, or the Saviour in his journeys of mercy, without having, in the one case our sense of propriety disturbed by the presence of Roman architecture, arms, and scenery, or in the other, our faith and veneration shocked by the company of men whom the Lord never knew, and a turmoil of pride and ostentation which it was part of his mission to rebuke. Foremost in the ranks of these pictorial crusaders stand David Roberts, whose drawings of Palestine must be seen by every person who would wish to acquire an accurate knowledge of the physical features of the Holy Land. But, latest—and to our minds the most Oriental, the most Scriptural—is our lamented countryman, the late Sir David Wilkie, who, as our readers will recollect, died on board the Oriental steam-ship, on his passage from Egypt to London on the 1st of June, 1841. Roberts has given us the land; but Wilkie has given the life of Palestine. The landscapes of the former, and the figures of the latter, are indispensable to each other, and should be conjointly possessed by all Biblical students. Together they form an admirable commentary on Scripture, clearing up many doubtful points in difficult texts, and illuminating the more obvious passages with a clearness and truth which captivates while it convinces the mind of the reader.

It would seem to have been the intention of Sir David to have finished his distinguished life as a painter of Scripture histories, as we have in his Oriental sketches the material with which he would have worked in the composition of his pictures; and it may most reasonably be inferred that, as a painter of sacred history, he would have been once more original, and perhaps more emphatically so in religious painting than any painter who ever preceded him, since, as we have stated, none have worked in a kindred spirit for their fulfilment. Wilkie was so impressed with a veneration for truth, that he considered it necessary to endue Scriptural subjects with Oriental character, and in realizing his object the sketches furnish unanswerable evidence that he would have given a new aspect to Scriptural painting, for he was perfectly correct in assuming that the personal characteristics of the nations of Sacred History are to be approached only through those of their modern representatives. While on his tour he commenced some subjects in oil, and laboured most industriously in making sketches for numerous pictures to be painted at home; his portfolio became therefore rich, notwithstanding Moslem prejudices and superstitions. The original sketches, from which the work under consideration was derived, were bought by Messrs. Graves and Warmsley, the publishers, for a sum of not less than fourteen hundred pounds.

The first part contains:—1. "Portrait of Mehemet Ali," of whom the author of the text says, "His character, with all its energy and cunning, is read in his eye, and his features generally bespeak his humble origin.

2. "The Letter-writer—Constantinople;" furnishing an admirable study for an ancient Jewish scribe.

3. "Abdul Medjid, Sultan of the Ottoman Empire."

4. "Mr. Cartwright, the British Consul-General at Constantinople, and Mustapha his Janissary."

5. "Walker Bey." This officer, now Sir Baldwin Wake Walker, holds a high and responsible appointment in the Turkish navy. In the beginning of the year 1833, the Turkish Ambassador, in the name of his Sovereign, requested from the British Government effective aid for the reorganization of the Turkish navy. In accordance with this request, Captain Walker, at that time of H.M.S. Vanguard, was named for the duty, and he proceeded to Constantinople and commenced the introduction of a new line of discipline, as well as circumstances would permit. His efforts have been of much service in effecting many valuable changes, although he has met with serious obstacles in the opposition of those who, by a new system, had much to lose and nothing to gain. The advantages of his accession to the command of the Turkish navy were apparent during the late operations on the coast of Syria, since which time his valuable services have been prominently conspicuous in bringing about, as far as is practicable, a new and better order of things. We have been permitted to copy this portrait. The dress is altogether European, with the exception of the fez, or red Turkish cap with the blue silk tassel.—(See p. 199.)

6. "Daughter of Walker Bey in a Turkish dress." This sketch is remarkable for its breadth and finish, as well as for the delightful simplicity and beauty of the child. We never saw any thing so intensely feminine and innocent as the expression of her half startled half confiding features. Wilkie has evidently loved his subject.

7. "Kalakso Mirza, the Persian Prince." This extraordinary head is destined to effect a revolution in the arts. It is the study made by Wilkie for the head of the Saviour in one of his contemplated works. The subject of the sketch is uncle of the reigning Schah of Persia, and is living at Constantinople on a pension allowed him by the Turkish Government. Having been active in political intrigue, his return to his native country would be unwelcome to the existing power, and dangerous to himself. The Turks admit the superior personal beauty of the Persians, and it is a saying current among them, that a Persian youth and an Arabian horse are the most beautiful creatures in the world. It is matter of surprise that the inquiring habits of artists should so long have permitted them to model the features of the Saviour after the Greek contour, in which they have followed each other as if painting from an authentic source. Although it may be shewn that the personal attributes of Christ should differ from those of all men in a manner that, perhaps, no painting can reach, yet there is no tenable argument in favour of painting his impersonation entirely Greek, instead of Judæan. It may be asked, that since the ancients have endowed their works with the utmost excellence of form and character, why should the Saviour be represented otherwise? To which it may be answered, that the mythology afforded no such characters, and that, in whatever they painted, a tomyris or an heroic quality could not be omitted. Had the most famous Greek sculptors lived after the Christian era, and been members of that faith, it is probable that they would have represented Christ in a human image, not less successfully than they sculptured their own deities. Wilkie, in seeking an impersonation of the Saviour from the region of his birth, was much more consistent than the greatest masters, who have never gone beyond accepted localities, from which the features of his sketch differ widely, as being individually indigenous to the Holy Land, and, under certain modifications, more susceptible than the classic remains of an expression of divine attribute.

8. "Group in a Café at Constantinople."

9. "Travelling Tatar to the Queen's Messenger." A noble portrait of the man who brought to Constantinople the news of the fall of Acre.

10. "Nubian Servant—Pera." A capital study for an ancient Egyptian. In the early works of Egypt, particularly in the tablets of Abydos, which are of the Abrahamic period, his prototypes may be commonly distinguished.

11. "Three Greek Sisters at Therapia."

12. "Satiri, principal Albanian to the Consulate at Bucharest."

13. "Mrs. Moore, Wife of the British Consul at Beyrout." This lady is dressed in Arab costume, and would make a fine study for a Sarah, a Hagar, or a Rebecca.

14, 15. "Dragomen—Turkish Secretaries of British Consuls."

16. "Study of Camels."

17. "A Sheik, who accompanied Sir David Wilkie and party to the Red Sea and the Jordan." A famous model for a Philistine; Goliath of Gath grasped not his ponderous "beam" with more complacent fierceness than does this terrific son of Ishmael. A noble creature in ruins.

18. "Hebrew Woman and Child, Jerusalem." This sketch addresses us with all the force of a visible fulfilment of prophecy. There is the poor dejected mother, "who, being desolate, sitteth upon the ground," divested of the "bravery of her tinkling ornaments," and troubled with that "failing of eyes," that unsteady look, characteristic of her race—Her family outcast, and her child a slave.

19. "Sketch for the Nativity." In this unprejudiced composition the Virgin appears as a maiden of the hill country, gazing with all the tenderness of a mother on her wondrous babe. We have no halos, no globe, no serpent beneath her feet, no majestic attitudes or queen-like state. She is a perfect mother, "blessed" in her offspring, but nothing more.

20. "An Arab Family." The bitter bondage of female life in Arabia is finely depicted in the expression of the principal woman of the group. Nothing can be more worn, dried, and degraded.

21. "Christ before Pilate." This is a sketch for a picture, evidently to have been composed of such elements as Wilkie should find most fitted for his subject:—"When Pilate saw that he could prevail nothing, but that rather a tumult was made, he took water, and washed his hands before the multitude, saying, 'I am innocent of the blood of this just person: see ye to it.'" This drawing is clearly made under the impressions which Sir David Wilkie entertained of religious painting. We find him who was "not Cæsar's friend," Pontius Pilate, generally painted with features markedly Roman; but as he was a native of Idumea, he is drawn here, much more consistently, with Arabian features. Indeed the figure seems to be given from the life, without the slightest qualification. The background is a view of the remains of the house of Pilate and a portion of Jerusalem; on the right of Pilate, are the two Marys, and on his left a Nubian slave bringing the water.

22. "Sheik of Lebanon," convertible into an admirable Canaanite.

23. "Dragoman of the Austrian Consul at Alexandria."

24. "Madame Giuseppina," the beautiful and accomplished landlady of the hotel in which Sir David Wilkie resided at Pera.

25. "Tatar relating the News of the Capture of Acre." In the main composition and general detail of this drawing much labour and nicety are evinced. Few beside Wilkie could throw such a stirring interest into a picture. The news of the fall of the renowned stronghold seems to have fallen among the party like a shell with a burning fuse. The Tatar is the only composed figure of the group—and how effectively this is managed! He is the centre to which all eyes are directed. The drawing has need of no title, for it is seen at once that he is communicating some intelligence that has produced extraordinary excitement, and which is received by some with surprise and distrust—by some with contemptuous disbelief—and by others with quiet satisfaction. Such faces as these could not be conceived—a characteristic model has sat for each; and yet, the figures have about them all the ease of nature, and none of the stiffness of a set position. Such faces are only to be found on living shoulders, and none but Wilkie could have so successfully dealt with them. The interior is a café, where the group have assembled for the enjoyment of the potent solace derived from coffee and a pipe, both of which are temporarily forgotten in the important announcement of the Tatar, which is received by the surrounding loungers without manifestation of surprise by violent action. By the liberal permission of the publishers, we have the pleasure of presenting our readers with a reduced sketch of this remarkable drawing.—(See p. 198.)

26. "Hebrew Women Reading the Scriptures." The natural composition and pure sentiment of this drawing far exceed every thing effected by elaborate effort: its excellence is of that kind which an artist, even during a long life, could not many times repeat, even in a lengthened series of works. The pose of each figure is that of perfect ease; and every line of the sketch shows the attention fixed upon the sacred volume. Into the faces are thrown much earnest tranquility, such as the promise in Jeremiah might impart: "And I will gather the remnant of my flock out of all countries whither I have driven them, and I will bring them again to their folds, and they shall be fruitful and increase." In their girlhood, the Jewish women generally take great pride in the adornment of their hair, but from the time of marriage it is commonly hidden, and for its better concealment, a second handkerchief is attached to the turban, behind which it descends very low, and covers the whole more effectually than the simpler headdress.

We have thus completed a critical analysis of a work which, under every point of view, we consider to be the most remarkable, most talented, and generally interesting book of the season. The drawings are executed in lithography by Mr. Joseph Nash, printed with a tint, and the high lights picked out with white, and they are esteemed to be very perfect fac similes of the originals.

MAC IAN'S "HIGHLAND FEUD."

In our last number we gave some illustrations of the inventive principle in art, and of the graphic power with which the most ordinary subjects of every-day life may be invested by the painter. We opposed these to the oft-repeated subjects of those artists who seem to consider the path of excellence to be the narrow road of precedent, of fashion, or of mouthwering, unoriginating mediocrity. There is, however, another and a large class, who, strongly and healthily imbued with a desire for the acquisition of new ideas, think it necessary to go abroad to collect the elements of originality. "We must go to Rome—to Berlin," say they—"Great Britain is exhausted." This is the language of ignorance; and once let it be entertained by any man, farewell to the abundant beauties of his native land. Our advice is, stay at home. Nowhere else are subjects for the pencil in greater plenty. Who has ever painted the peasantry of England—the local sons of her varying soil? Are Italian bandits and Rhine boatmen for ever to supplant them? What artist has ventured to touch the pathetic soul-subduing tragedies of domestic life in our great manufacturing districts? Where are the illustrators of the glorious lives of our immense aristocracies? Who has ever drawn a line of the sublime scenery of Western Ireland? We need not repeat inquiries; they will suggest themselves to every one in infinite succession, and the final answer to them all will be, that Great Britain is still, comparatively, untrodden ground.

We are happy in having it in our power to give force to these remarks by a sketch from Mr. M'Ian's novel and striking picture of the "Highland Feud," now exhibiting in the British Institution. In this picture a hardy Highlander is represented in the act of descending, by a rope, one of the steep faces of his native granite mountains, to plunder an eagle's nest of its callow brood, and its more dainty accompaniments of hare and moorcock. At the moment of his fearful poise, he is suddenly attacked by the parent birds, one of whom clutches his throat, while the other prepares to rend the lower portions of his body, or break his legs by strokes of the wing. In this desperate extremity the brave man draws his dirk, and attempts, by reiterated stabs, to rid himself of his affectionate opponents. A subject of so violent character is one very likely to have betrayed an ordinary painter into the use of equally violent composition to express his purpose; but Mr M'Ian, thoroughly master of the natural action and circumstances of his scene, has succeeded in avoiding all melo-dramatic extravagance, and has rendered a terrible subject in an energetic, but no-wise repulsive, manner. The drawing of the birds, and the position of the man, are admirable; both are equally determined; war to the death is evidently their common impulse. The birds, however, are at ease; they float without effort upon their ample wings; but poor "Sandy" is at the mercy of the rope, and liable at every plunge to overset his equilibrium. His crouching attitude, crossed legs, and grasping toes, powerfully manifest his extreme peril.

We have, then, in this picture a class of home subjects indicated which are unique, powerful, and, what is important to young artists, likely, by a quick sale, to bring them the means as well as the honours of study.

We shall close this notice by an extract from James Wilson's recent "Voyage round the Coasts of Scotland and the Isles," descriptive of the manner in which the Highlanders perform their perilous rope flights, and of the playful purposes to which they sometimes put them. Speaking of the egg-gatherers of St. Kilda, he says:—"We ascertained that there is never more than a single man above, supporting the weight of the one below. Each of these couples has, as it were, two ropes between them. The rope which the upper man holds in his hands is fastened round the body and beneath the arms of him who descends, while another rope is pressed by the foot of the upper man, and is held in the hand of the lower. One would think that this kind of cross-working would be apt to pull the upper partner from the top of the cliff, and that both would be speedily dashed to pieces, or drowned, among the rocks below; but it is said that scarcely more than one or two accidents have happened within the memory of the present generation. We were told it once occurred that two men had descended close together, suspended by the same rope, when, suddenly, the higher of the two perceived that several strands above his head had given way, and that the rope was rapidly rending from the unaccustomed weight. Believing the death of both to be inevitable if he delayed an instant, and with but small hope even of his own life, under existing circumstances, he cut the cord close beneath his own body, and, consigning his companion to immediate death, was himself drawn to the crest of the precipice just in time to be seized by the neck as the rope gave way."

During a coasting trip, on an occasion of festivity, he was witness of the following courageous pastimes:—"We stood still upon our oars, and the minister rose and waved his hat. Suddenly we could hear in the air above us a faint huzzaing sound, and at the same instant three or four men, from different parts of the cliff, threw themselves into the air, and darted with great distance downwards, just as spiders drop from the top of a wall. They then swung and capered along the face of the precipice, bounding off at intervals by striking their feet against it, and springing from side to side with as much fearless ease and agility as if they were so many schoolboys exercising in a swing a few feet over a soft and balmy clover-field. Now, they were probably not less than seven hundred feet above the sea, and the cliff was not only perfectly perpendicular in its upper portion, but as it descended it curved backwards, as it were, forming a huge rugged hollow portion, eaten into by the angry lashing of the almost ceaseless waves. In this manner, shouting and dancing, they descended a long way towards us, though still suspended at a vast height in the air, for it would probably have taken all their cordage joined together to have reached the sea. A great mass of the central portion of the precipice was smoother than the wall of a well-built house, and it was this portion especially, which was not only perpendicular, but had its basement arched inwards into an enormous wave-worn grotto so that any one falling from the summit would drop at once sheer into the sea—it was on this, the smoother portion of the perpendicular mountain, that the men of the orgeones chiefly displayed their extraordinary powers, because, as there was nothing to interrupt either the rapid descent of the rope, or its lateral movement, or their own outward bounds, we could see them sometimes swinging to and fro, after the manner of a pendulum, or dancing in the air with a convulsive motion of the legs and arms (presenting a painful resemblance to men hanging in the agonies of death), or tripping a more light and free step, by means of a vigorous and vigorous action of the feet against the perpendicular surface of the rock. These men merely capered for our amusement, but caught no birds for such was, in fact, the adamantine smoothness of the surface, that not even a winged inhabitant of the air could have found rest for the sole of its foot. But on either side the precipice, though equally steep, was more rugged, and there we could perceive that the cragsmen, having reached the spot looped the rope down, and, rested occasionally upon their toes, or even crawled, with a spider-like motion, along projecting ledges, and ever and anon we could see them waving a small white fluttering object, which we might have taken for a pocket-handkerchief, had we not been told it was a feathery talmar. They twisted their necks, and then looped their heads into a little noose or bight of the rope above them, and, by the time the men were drawn again to the top of the rock, each carried up a good bundle of birds along with him."

CORONERS' INQUESTS.

On Tuesday Mr. Gell held an inquest at Charing-cross Hospital on the body of Mrs. Anne Canby, aged 62, a fruiterer, of the Grand Colonnade, Covent garden Market. It appeared in evidence that the deceased, for the last fortnight, had laboured under the delusion that she was indebted to her landlady in the sum of £20; that the calls for payment were urgent; and that having no money to settle the demand, she must go into Whitecross-street Prison. On Friday night deceased gave a very unsatisfactory excuse for leaving home, and as she did not appear to be in her right state of mind, she was followed and overtaken whilst going to leap into the river from Blackfriars-bridge. At two o'clock the next morning she arose, and having placed £5 in her son's pocket, that he might, she said, return it to the person from whom she had borrowed it, went direct to Hungerford-market, where she threw herself into the water, and was drowned. Verdict, "Temporary insanity."

[illegible] on Wednesday evening an inquest was held by Mr. Payne at St. Bartholomew's Hospital, on the body of James Harris, [illegible], a publisher. Maria Harris, of 6, Printing-house-yard, Moorgate-street, said [illegible] deceased was her husband. [illegible] night about twenty minutes past six, she went out, by his wish, to procure him half a quartern of wine, as he complained of feeling unwell. She returned in a few minutes, and then found him with his throat cut, the razor with which he had done it lying on the floor. She called assistance, and Mr. Vose, a surgeon, of Lodger, and the police came. A surgeon was sent for, and he was removed to the hospital. For some time past he had complained that he was afraid his heart would burst his body; and he had been labouring under the delusion that he would never be able to pay it, and that he would lose his goods. He had been a soldier, and, whilst acting in that capacity, received a severe wound in his left breast. The effects of which he often suffered. Verdict, "Temporary insanity."

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

CHANGE OF WIND—ARRIVAL OF VESSELS AT LIVERPOOL.—The arrivals on Sunday and Monday last were more numerous than on any former occasion within the same period. On the former day upwards of 50 square-rigged vessels ships or barques came up, the greater part from the United States, exclusive of coasters, and on Monday the arrivals of the same class of vessels [illegible] ds of 80, making within the two days upwards of 130. There [illegible] [illegible] A great number of them have not yet got into dock. The great arrival (which will doubtless be increased for some time to come) will, we trust, give a new impulse to the long depressed commerce of the town, while the more desirable [illegible] to many vessels will give profitable employment to the dock labourers, who have suffered many privations during the winter. TOTAL LOSS OF THE SHIP CORNELIA.—By the Acadia steamer, which arrived from New York on Tuesday, we have already overpowering the total wreck of the splendid first-class packet ship the Cornelia, Commander Mr. W. Bell, belonging to Liverpool, during a heavy gale of wind, while on her outward passage to the United States. This passenger, after leaving Liverpool, appears to have been exceedingly severe, the ship encountering a series of terrific gales and hurricanes, more [illegible] the Atlantic, nearly crushed to pieces by immense [illegible] and [illegible] one occasion the crew were in high hope of gaining their destination [illegible] to its misery. But, alas! a dreadful calamity awaited the ship. At about two o'clock [illegible] morning of the 11th of February it became a wreck, about seventeen miles west of Annaleens Lighthouse. Directly the ship struck, the crew exerted every nerve to get her off, but the sea had wind, which were tremendous at the time prevented them, and she soon commenced to break up. The commander, Mr. Bell, remained on board as long as he possibly could. He had previously had the ship's boats hoisted outboards, and, finding there was no hope of preventing the destruction of the vessel, he left her to the mercy of the tempest. In making for the shore, the boat which he was in capsized, and the whole of those in her would have inevitably perished but for the promptness displayed by the rest of the ship's crew in the other boats. By this time they were picked up they were almost exhausted. Upon the Messrs. Consul Lee's appeal of the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Majesty's steam-vessel Arab was proceed to the wreck, in order, if possible, to save a portion of the materials; but on its arrival, such was the position in which the ship lay, that it was dangerous to go near her. Since then, it is said, the vessel has gone to pieces and disappeared. Her cargo was a most valuable one, consisting of provisions and goods of every description, and is stated to have been worth from £12,000 to £16,000. Mr. Bell, the commander, arrived at Liverpool by the Acadia on Tuesday. The total loss is not far short of £20,000. The ship and cargo are reported to be fully insured.

COMMERCE AND MONEY.

Commercial prospects continue to brighten, in so far as we have again the satisfaction to state, that, during this week, the improvement generally in manufactures, to which, for several months past, we have directed the attention of that portion of our readers who feel interested in matters of this description, has again made considerable progress, and that an appearance, at all events, exists, at the present moment, of a speedy restoration of prosperity in this great department of our national industry. To the opening prospects in China, and to the revival of trade generally, in our East India possessions, and in our colonies in the great Southern Ocean, we are principally indebted for the improvements at the Clinton trade. In Glasgow, and in Lancashire, large and valuable shipments have been recently made to the different places with which the late treaty with China now enables us to trade, and still larger orders have been given, and are now in the course of execution, for the same quarter. During this week we have again to report that the supplies of grain, in all the great markets of consumption throughout the United Kingdom, have been greater than the demand required, and gradually declining prices have been the natural consequence.

Consols have been forced up by the abundance of unemployed money to 97¾, and the exquisitely disposed denizens of Capel-court are reporting 100 as probable. Exchequer Bills command the high premium of 75s. to 76s., and the Three-and-a-Halfs have been sold at 102¾. The bonds of the two kingdoms in the Peninsula continue to be the great objects of attraction. In Colombian, Brazilian, and Mexican Bonds a gradual improvement is occurring. The railway railway associations are also becoming more valuable, by the war which is occurring in the shares of them, and those of minor standing are in a certain degree reaping benefits also, from the great abundance of unemployed money to be found at present in the money markets throughout England. The Greek loan, we perhaps dare hereafter to speak of from this quarter, and find employment for it in channels wherein productive employment may be increased amongst the British people.

BRITISH COLLEGE OF HEALTH, HAMILTON-PLACE, NEW ROAD, LONDON.

TO THE PEOPLE OF ENGLAND! —Fellow Countrymen!

We, the undersigned, and all the honorary members of the BRITISH COLLEGE OF HEALTH, deeply regretted to say, after nearly forty years practical experience, the following for your serious consideration; namely, the [illegible] dance of treatment between Doctors and Hygeists as to you all, from the highest to the lowest, a question of life or death. Bear in mind that we are charging with innocent vegetable substances, such as MORISON'S Medicines, now never do harm, but the omission of it is a sure mere act of a long case of death. We expect that your blood is the life, and that the unnatural practice of bleeding should be immediately put a stop to. Look into the question for yourselves, it can easily be understood by all. The parasites cured by doctors are bad or ineffectual, many of them undergoing a chronical process in 1838 Sir B. Hall, the present member for Marylebone, presented to Parliament a petition, from us and 10,000 other Englishmen, for an inquiry into the foregoing allegations; but doctors, from interested motives, would not meet the question in that way On them, therefore, as a moral point of view, the consequence must rest. Remedy it if has its cause in the stone, and can be cured by the Vegetable Universal Medicines.

Signed, MORISON and NOAT, Hygeists.

Day's stable, by Emilius, out of Pettitt's little mare, Kate Kearney. The pace was capital, the ground infamous; and as the Oaks filly was unlucky, it was not so despicable a defeat as it seems on paper. Of the other races at the meeting, nothing need be said more than that they proved locally attractive, and the object of the committee was thus attained.

For the business division, the only attraction was of course the betting on the events in progress, and those in the public market; these latter were confined to the Derby and Chester Cup, the Oaks being a dead letter. On the first, some little was done to the advantage of A British Yeoman. He was evidently in high favour—no doubt because he was out on Middleham Moor on Monday, and had a gallop, though he was said to look thin, and like one just off the doctor's list. Aristides was also going on that day, and full of vigour, though not a single three-year-old in training at Middleham has had a sweat since Christmas! What a contrast to the style of things at Newmarket, Melton, and Stockbridge! The Chester Cup seemed, like Macbeth's "Amen," to stick in the throats of all who named it. The Reaction "do" was liberally canvassed, as also the inquiry, did she or the Corsair win—where the money was to come from to pay the losings? It is notorious that many of the Manchester party are up to their ears on the Chester Handicap, beyond all hopes of hedging, save so that the remedy would be nearly as bad as the disease. The gallant captain already spoken of, when taking 1500 to 200 from T. W. about Reaction, thus delivered his opinion upon the latter point—"When one gets one's hand into the lion's mouth, one should endeavour to withdraw it with as little risk as possible."

DIEULACRES ABBEY.

The above is a sketch of the interesting site of the Abbey of Dieulacres or Dieulénores, which stood in the vale of the river Charnet, about a mile from Leek in Staffordshire, but nothing of which now remains standing except part of the shafts of the chapel columns. Randle Blundevill, Earl of Chester, in 1214, translated the Cistercian monks of the abbey of Poulton, near Chester, to this place, and endowed it with the church of Leek. The following legend is recorded in White's "History of Staffordshire," as immediately connected with the name and foundation of this abbey. The earl dreamt that the ghost of his grandfather appeared to him and bade him go to Cholpesdale, near Leek, and found an abbey of white monks, near to a chapel there, dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, "for by it," said the ghost, "there shall be joy to thee and many others who shall be saved thereby; of this it shall be a sign when the pope doth interdict England. But do thou, in the meantime, go to the monks of Poulton, and be a partaker of the sacrament of the Lord's supper; and, in the seventh year of that interdict, thou shalt translate those monks to the place I have appointed." Randulph having had this vision, related it to his wife, who, hearing it, said, in French, "Deuiencres! God increase!" whereupon the earl, pleased with the expression, said it should be the name of the abbey, which he speedily founded, and furnished with monks of the Cistercian order from Poulton.

About thirty years ago the ruins of the abbey, which had been so completely buried in the earth that cattle grazed over them, were dug up, and most of the materials used in erecting barns and stables for the use of the ancient farmhouse which stands near the spot; and the external walls of the latter buildings were decorated with many fragments of arches and capitals, and in one of them is a stone coffin, with a crosier and sword carved upon it.

After the dissolution of the monasteries in England by Henry VIII. the site of this abbey, with the manor, rectory, and advowson of the vicarage of Leek and the annexed chapels of Horton, Cheddleton, and Ipstones, and all the tithes of those places, and all other property "to the said monastery of Delacres formerly belonging," were granted by letters patent, in the second year of Queen Elizabeth's reign, to Sir Ralph Bagenall, Knight, in fee, in consideration of his true, faithful, and acceptable services theretofore done "to us" in Ireland. Most of that property descended from him to Sir Nicholas Bagenall, and from him to his son, Sir Henry Bagenall, who, with Dame Eleanor his wife, by indenture, dated 31st March, 1597, conveyed it to Thomas Rudyerde, of Rudyerde, Esq., under whom it has been derived or come to the present proprietors.

ILLUSTRATED LITERATURE.

SCRIPTURE ILLUSTRATED by Engravings designed from Existing Authorities.

"The object of the present work is to present to the eye and to the mind of the reader a correct description of Scripture facts, derived from the best authorities." No one can have examined a collection of paintings or engravings of Scriptural subjects, by or after what may now be termed old masters, without being struck with the manifest inaccuracies of detail, particularly of costume, by which many otherwise powerful pieces of art are disfigured. Some of the most glaring errors in this respect are to be found, perhaps, in the productions of the Flemish or Dutch school, but even the elevated style of the Italians has not totally escaped them. Our better and more familiar acquaintance with the East, and more improved knowledge of its customs and usages, have enabled us to do much towards explaining the sacred text, aided by accounts of Eastern travellers—adopting their details of the modes of life, climate, soil, and natural productions of the Holy Land. The present work is an attempt to rid pictorial embellishment of the errors that have frequently crept into it, by drawing the scenes and accessories of the subjects from existing authorities of acknowledged authenticity. Thus, many of the engravings of the parts before us are not only beautiful in themselves, but are invested with the higher beauty of truth. An engraving transferred from the work,—(see p. 199)—and an extract from the accompanying letter-press, will give a distinct idea both of the plan of the work and the style in which it is executed: the subject is—

THE INFANT MOSES FOUND BY PHARAOH'S DAUGHTER.

"In works of art it has been the practice to place these occurrences in the centre of a pond, and to give the characters an Italian costume, while the child is represented stretching its naked limbs on a vessel similar to a needlewoman's fancy basket. Such is the celebrated picture of Vandyke; and, to carry out his Sarcopian ideas to the utmost, he has represented the princess and a single attendant reaching over a bed of flags, such as are seen on the margin of our own rivers, as though they were in the act of searching for some lost treasure, while tame water-fowl of the family of the Anatinæ stand gazing and cackling at the intruders.

"In opposition to these travesties, it has been the artist's aim, in the accompanying drawing, to give a faithful description of the Scripture narrative. In doing so, however, he has been compelled to infer the presence of the various objects which constitute the action and locality of the picture. Still, in these arrangements, he has been guided by the analogies furnished in the contemporary monuments of Egypt, which pour a flood of light on ancient usages. Thus, he has determined that when the daughter of Pharaoh went down to wash herself at the river,' she went not down into the open stream. Had she done this, she would have been exposed to the inconveniences of a scorching sun, to the dangers of a rapid current, and to the devouring jaws of the crocodile. According to Oriental and classical, to ancient and modern usages, the cool chambers of a bath are employed for such a purpose. Hence it is, that the princess is supposed, in the drawing, to be walking on the terrace of such a bath, where she becomes a witness to the safe arrival of the little stranger at its portal. Hence, it is also supposed, that the affectionate care of the mother would prompt her to close the ark, and give it a form capable of floating. The narrative intimates, indeed, that when the maid had "opened" the ark the princess "saw the child:" and it was common in Egypt, in the days of the ancients, to make little barks of the cyperus papyrus, to float upon the Nile at the period of its inundation. Such vessels were also used, with slight variation, on the rivers of Mesopotamia; and Lucan describes such in connexion with our own forefathers.

> 'The bending willows into barks they twine,
> Then line the work with skins of slaughtered kine;
> Such are the floats Venetian fishers know,
> Where in dull marshes stands the settling lo;
> Or such to neighbouring Gaul, a lure by man,
> The bolder Britons cross the swelling main.
> Like these, when fruitful Egypt has afloat,
> The Memphian artist builds his reedy boat."—ROWE'S Lucan.

Our next selection illustrates a usage entirely Oriental, to which frequent reference is made in Scripture—the "Treading in the Wine-press:"—

NEHEMIAH AND THE SABBATH-BREAKERS OF JUDAH.

"Among the Jews, these solemn compacts appear too frequently to have been made only to be broken. While Nehemiah remained at Jerusalem they kept the covenant into which they had entered, but when, at the expiration of his twelfth year of office, B.C. 432, he resumed his station at the Persian court, it was, together with all his salutary regulations, gradually infringed and violated.

"Thus baffled in his pious designs, Nehemiah obtained permission to return to Judæa, B.C. 424, and on his arrival he applied himself most vigorously to the correction of the evils which had gained ground during his absence. One of these was the profanation of the Sabbath. Seeing the people tread the wine-presses on that holy day, and bring in their various burdens from the harvest-field, and the fish-market of Tyre, with all manner of merchandize, he not only testified against them, but commanded the Levites that they should cleanse themselves, 'and keep the gates, to sanctify the Sabbath day.'

"It is to this desecration of the Sabbath that the annexed engraving has reference. It represents a harvest scene in the fruitful 'divisions' of Judah, in which Jacob, in his dying moments, prophesied of the person of its first founder, with particular reference to his posterity, that he should bind 'his foal unto the vine, and his ass's colt unto the choice vine,' and, likewise, 'wash his garments in wine, and his clothes in the blood of grapes.' Gen. xlix. 11. The domain of Judah was celebrated as a vine-clad country, and so it continued through all the desolations of the captivity; for on the return of Nehemiah from the Persian court, he is said to have stood in the midst of Judah while he uttered his lamentation over the profanation of the Sabbath, by the treading of wine-presses, bringing in sheaves, loading asses, and other secular employments.

"In the engraving the artist has attempted to exhibit the abundance and beauty of the land of Judah, in connexion with the Sabbath desecration by the people. In the centre stands a vineyard, as they are seen to this day; to the right, the form of a wine-press, such as is trodden alone; and, in the foreground, the ordinary operation of loading sheaves. The figure of Nehemiah has been copied from a Babylonian seal of the age in which the events in connexion with the engraving occurred."—(See p. 202.)

The work is cheap and beautifully got up both in type and engravings; when complete, it will form a most interesting volume.

WILLIAM SHAKSPERE; a Biography. By CHARLES KNIGHT.

We have had many lives of Shakspere—so many that we had thought it impossible, certainly unnecessary, that another should be written. The mere materials of the chronicler had long since been exhausted; every succeeding biographer had reiterated the complaints of his predecessor over the paucity of authentic information as to the life of the great dramatist. Like many other lamentations, it was all the deeper because it was obviously and utterly in vain; the pall of oblivion had been cast upon the poet's hearse, and the dust of ages had gathered over his tomb, before the enthusiasm of a gifted actor led him to gather such fragments of his history as were then floating on the stream of tradition, and to furnish the world with nearly all that we really know of the life of Shakspere. For a long period the world was satisfied with this meagre account; but later search in strange and forgotten corners, among mouldy papers and records of all kinds and descriptions—some the furthest removed from anything like poetry—turned up scattered hints, which, if they did not furnish new facts, at least tended to correct old errors. And now we have this Biography, embodying all that research has produced, or seems likely to produce us, and presenting it in a framework of the imagination which connects what is separated, blends what is incongruous, and lightens up what is obscure, and all so successfully, that we now do really and truly believe the life of Shakspere is written. Many of our readers have doubtless acquainted—and if not, they ought to be—with the "Imaginary Conversations" of Landor: in the same manner, though not to the same extent, may this be called an imaginary biography; it is not, however, so totally independent of fact. There is enough of reality in the matters of names, places, and dates, to make the speculations at least possible. Nor is it the life of Shakspere alone that is treated: the whole face of society as it existed during his day is surveyed, in a pleasant and kindly spirit, something of the rosy colouring of the enthusiast on the subject being perceptible, but the picture on the whole is not perhaps the worse for it. Let us take a specimen, which will exhibit the manner of the book better than the same space occupied with our description; it is the christening of the infant, in that very font which now, broken and neglected, lies overgrown with weeds and grass, but full of interest still. Judge, reader, if that broken fragment of carved stone is not worth gazing on! (See p. 202.)

Even from the font to the description of the christening—what is there in it that may not have happened?

Let us make a leap from his infancy to his boyhood; to the time of that festival at Kenilworth castle given by Leicester to Queen Elizabeth; it gathered all the country round to see its pageantry, and why not the boy Shakspere with the rest? Marry! we can hardly tell what Sir Andrew Agnew would say to such a Sunday exhibition; but as yet the Puritans had not arisen.

Many a bridal procession had gone forth from the happy cottages of Kenilworth to the porch of that old parish church, amidst song and music, with garlands of rosemary and wheat-ears, parents blessing, sisters smiling in tears; and then the great lord—the heartless lord, as the peasants might whisper, whose innocent wife perished untimely—is to make sport of their homely joys before their Queen. There was, perhaps, one in the crowd on that Sunday afternoon who was to see the very heaven of poetry in such simple rites who was to picture the shepherd thus addressing his mistress in the solemnity of the troth-plight:—

> 'I take thy hand: this hand
> As soft as dove's down, and as white as it;
> Or Ethiopian's tooth, or the fann'd snow
> That's bolted by the northern blasts twice o'er.'

"If would agree not with Master Laneham—'By my troth 't was a lively pastime: I believe it would have moved a man to a right merry mood, though it had been told him that his wife lay dying.' Leicester, as we have seen, had procured abundance of the occasional rhymes of flattery to propitiate Elizabeth. This was enough. Poor Gascoigne had prepared an elaborate masque, in two acts, of Diana and her Nymphs, which for the time is a remarkable production. 'This show,' says the poet, 'was devised and penned by Master Gascoigne, and being prepared and ready (every actor in his garment) two or three days together, yet never came to execution. The cause whereof I cannot attribute to any other thing than to lack of opportunity and seasonable weather.' It is easy to understand that there was some other cause of Gascoigne's disappointment. Leicester, perhaps, scarcely dared to set the puppets moving who were to conclude the masque with these lines:—

> 'A world of wealth at will
> You henceforth shall enjoy
> In wedded state, and twinwithal
> He d up from great annoy
> The staff of your estate
> O queen, O worthy queen,
> Yet never wight felt perfect bliss
> But such as wedded been.'

"But when the Queen laughed at the word marriage, the wily courtier had his impromptu device of the mock bridal. The marriages of the poor were the marriages to be made fun of. But there was a device of marriage at which Diana would weep, and all the other Gods rejoice, when her Majesty should give the word. Alas, for that crowning show there was 'lack of opportunity and seasonable weather.'"—(See p. 202.)

We give one more of the quaint exhibitions of that day, which are introduced not without purpose in a biography of the poet; all that is not impossible must be granted by those who read this work in a right spirit; cavillers and starters of objections had better not read it at all. We again ask, "why may not" Shakspere have seen this "mystery" play at Coventry? And if so may not some of the first springs of that wondrous genius have been touched by the rude, but perhaps not altogether unimpressive performance? Here is the description and cut,—and with this quotation we must close our notice of Mr. Knight's book, which every lover of Shakspere ought to have beside his works, and on the same shelf with them. Is it possible to bespeak for it a wider circulation?

"The morning of Corpus Christi comes, and soon after sunrise there is stir in the streets of Coventry. The old ordinances for this solemnity require that the Guilds should be at their posts at five o'clock. There is to be a solemn procession—formerly, indeed, after the performance of the pageant—and then, with hundreds of torches burning around the figures of our Lady and St. John, candlesticks and chalices of silver, banners of velvet and canopies of silk, and the members of the Trinity Guild and the Corpus Christi Guild bearing their crucifixes and candlesticks, with personations of the angel Gabriel lifting up the lily, the twelve apostles, and renowned virgins, especially St. Catherine and St. Margaret. The Reformation has, of course, destroyed much of this ceremonial; and, indeed, the spirit of it has in great part evaporated. But now, issuing from the many ways that lead to the Cross, there is heard the melody of harpers and the voice of minstrelsy; trumpets sound, banners wave, riding-men come thick from their several halls; the mayor and aldermen in their robes, the city servants in proper liveries, St. George and the Dragon, and Herod on horseback. The bells ring, boughs are strewed in the streets, tapestry is hung out of the windows, officers in scarlet coats struggle in the crowd while the procession is marshalling. The crafts are getting into their ancient order, each craft with its streamer and its men in harness. There are 'Fysshers and Cokes,—Baxters and Milners,—Bochers,—Whittawers and Glovers,—Pynners, Tylers, and Wrightes, Skynners,—Barkers,—Corvysers,—Smythes,—Wevers,—Wirdrawers,—Cardemakers, Sadelers, Peyntours, and Masons,—Gurdelers,—Taylours, Walkers, and Sherman,—Deysters,—Drapers,—Mercers. At length the procession is arranged. It parades through the principal lines of the city, from Bishopgate on the north to the Grey Friars' Gate on the south, and from Broadgate on the west to Gosford Gate on the east. The crowd is thronging to the wide area on the north of Trinity Church and St. Michael's, for there is the pageant to be first performed. There was a high house or carriage which stood upon six wheels; it was divided into two rooms, one above the other. In the lower room were the performers: the upper was the stage. This ponderous vehicle was painted and gilt, surmounted with burnished vanes and streamers, and decorated with imagery; it was hung round with curtains, and a painted cloth presented a picture of the subject that was to be performed. This simple stage had its machinery, too; it was fitted for the representation of an earthquake or a storm; and the pageant in most cases was concluded in the noise and flame of fireworks. It is the pageant of the company of Shearmen and Tailors which is now to be performed,—the subject the Birth of Christ and Offering of the Magi, with the Flight into Egypt and Murder of the Innocents. The eager multitudes are permitted to crowd within a reasonable distance of the car. There is a moveable scaffold erected for the more distinguished spectators. The men of the Guilds sit firm on their horses. Amidst the sound of harp and trumpet the curtains are withdrawn, and Isaiah appears, prophesying the blessing which is to come upon the earth. Gabriel announces to Mary the embassage upon which he is sent from Heaven. Then a dialogue between Mary and Joseph, and the scene changes to the field where shepherds are abiding in the darkness of the night—a night so dark that they know not where their sheep may be; they are cold and in great heaviness. Then the star shines, and they hear the song of 'Gloria in excelsis Deo.' A soft melody of concealed music hushes even the whispers of the Coventry audience; and three songs are sung, such as may abide in the remembrance of the people, and be repeated by them at their Christmas festivals."

PERSONALITY IN PUBLIC AFFAIRS.

EXAMINATION into the public journals of the week, and into their topics of ordinary news—leader, commentary, or parliamentary debate,—has forced upon us some grave and, we believe, wholesome reflections upon the growing evil of personality in public affairs, which we shall at once intrude without apology upon our readers; content with the consciousness, on our own part, that they have taken their rise from earnest anxiety to see upheld, with a broader degree of dignity and decorum, the character of the legislature and of public men; and the grave importance of questions affecting national happiness and the true interests of the people, superseding that pitiful trifling over points of individual controversy and pique, which has so deformed the commencement of the present session, and crept into channels by which, of all others, it should be despised, discarded, and abhorred. We are convinced that the question is rapidly becoming of more consequence than its littleness might seem at first to assume, and that the press will not gain dishonour by directing a stern and steady battery of censure against that spirit of contemptible and vanity-begotten personality, which is so sure to poison the purer springs of reason, philosophy, and justice, and destroy the enlightenment of public discussion upon topics of every degree.

We declare that it is with positive humiliation, with a deep sense of shame reflected upon the community, that we have found forced upon us, by the contents of the daily journals, the reflections which we feel it our duty to record. We know that the destinies of this country are in a sort of crisis from the effects of poverty-pressure, of the New Poor-law, of over-population, and perhaps over-agitation—and that there has been so broad, powerful, and pervading a tone of wretchedness and depression over-flooding the land, as almost to have threatened the community with some of the worst troubles of discontent. We know, also, that the calm, good sense of our poorer countrymen preferred all the horrors of endurance, to even the faintest encouragement of that lurking sulkiness which broods revolt; we saw them look with hope to the then approaching session of Parliament, and rejoiced that they were alleviating present sorrows with a belief in future redress from its true legal and constitutional source. We expected to see the English Legislature opening the gates of wisdom, and enacting laws of practical philosophy and benevolence for the benefit of the English people—of the long-suffering English poor. We saw broad questions spread themselves before the gaze of the senate, courting discussion and examination, and involving their domestic happiness in every phase and form—their education—their treatment in the localities of their employ—in factories—in collieries—in districts of manufactures and agriculture—under instruction, under misfortune, under crime—in schools, in workhouses, in jails! The field of legislation was well widened, and it was time for the labourers to work; but no—with the exception of a few episodes of industry and active exercise, the tilling has made little progress, and reflecting men may well look on in indignation and despair when they find the arena broken up into fighting spots of brawl and quarrel, and the vice and bitterness of personality occupying a ground that should be held sacred to the promotion of the nation's good.

Yet it is hardly too sweeping a charge against Parliament to assume boldly that so it is. Have not votes of censure or supplies (the latter advanced with almost unexampled rapidity, as though the members intended to get over only the unavoidable business of the session, in order to return to their own pleasure with as little possible delay) been the main topics they have taken in hand? There has been some weary coquetting with the question of corn; but the great education scheme has been hardly propounded, and for the improvement of the Poor-laws there has been literally nothing done! No device for general relief has given evidence of the wisdom of either party, but of general litigation there is abundance indeed. Lord Ellenborough is to be censured to-day, Lord Abinger to-morrow, Lord Auckland to follow, Lord Ashburton to follow him! Party must spit its spite—the madness of many for the gain of a few—no matter how the country may be writhing under the infliction of personal discord instead of national relief; or else dignity must pout at some offending scorn, and privilege figure upon its stilts, while pauperism lies groaning in the wretched hovel or the grinding bastile!

But the crowning evidence of this worthless wasting of the nation's time is to be found in a perusal of those journals of the week whose contents have elicited the present remarks. The legislator seems to labour in vain for a great question—he confines his eloquence to privilege and the Ashburton treaty—in long voluminous debates. The public journalist seems equally at a loss. He mixes in the corn agitation, it is true, but he devotes the rest of his energies to privilege and personality. The public appetite is whetted by, the public interests are merged in, the keen encounters of a round half dozen of cases of individual variance and abuse. There is Lord Brougham quarrelling with Mr. Cobden, then with Mr. Bright, the Quaker, then with Mr. Hamer Stansfield, then with Lord Lynedoch, then with a Scotch newspaper, and then there is a question of privilege! Next Sir Thomas Wilde abuses Lord Denman, then the Morning Chronicle prints the abuse, then Lord Denman belabours the Morning Chronicle, and then again there is a question of privilege! Now these quarrels and questions of privilege have occupied no end of valuable time in both houses of Parliament; they have elicited long, agitated, and not quite temperate speeches from men whose character should make gravity, forbearance, and dignity almost essential to honourable existence; they have given rise to acrimonious struggles of party, and a flood of angry or sarcastic newspaper commentary; they have, in a word, surfeited society with personality, to the exclusion of valuable considerations of questions of domestic policy and interest; but they have not effected one atom of public good, relieved one misery, raised one hope, or contributed in the slightest degree to the comfort, the happiness, or the instruction of any one branch of the community.

Depend upon it we shall do well, whether in the press, in Parliament, or in the external world, to expel this vice of personality from our management of public affairs. It is infinitely degrading and undignified; it draws the mind from lofty purposes, and fixes public attention upon trifles unworthy of its meanest regard; it intrudes upon the business of the nation, and robs the people of that time which they are entitled to see their servants bestow with diligence, decorum, and temper—so that passion take not the place of principle, and personality level in acrimony what wisdom would maintain with pride.

HAMPTON RACES.

The bill of fare for the one day to which the spring meetings on Moulsey Hurst are now confined, if not exactly plethoric, proved good enough to draw an assemblage that, at any season, would have been profitable to the lessees; it was decidedly the largest ever seen at any corresponding period, and included a good proportion of fashion, civil and military. Cavalcades of coaches, enough to astonish all Hyde-park on a Sunday evening in May—dames in cashmeres, birds of paradise, plumes, and silks that would preserve a perpendicular of their own accords, and cavaliers—none of your exceptionables, but fellows of the regular tip-top entire division, equipaging with four-in-hands, and lunching off Fortnum and Mason, French wines and German liqueurs, to give them appetites for their dinners à quatre services.

The first race decided was between thorough-bred horses for the Barrack Stakes of 5 Sov. each, free for all horses, with a purse added: three yrs, 7st. 5lb.; four, 8st. 5lb.; five, 9st. 3lb.; six and aged, 9st. 7lb.; mares and geldings allowed 3lbs.; winner to be sold for £100. Heats, 1 mile. (8 Subs)

Sir W. W Wynn's br. g. Remnant, aged ..... (Mann) 1 1
Mr. Goodman's Chummy, 4 yrs..... 2 2

To go into details of sport, that however amusing at the moment, cannot possibly excite any interest beyond it, would be ridiculous; sufficient for the purpose is it to state, that in the first race some of the horses appeared very short of condition, and two of their riders uncommonly short of clothing, Robin's jock having, in the first heat, exhibited without a jacket, and Jim Crow's sans jacket and cap, their places being supplied by a shirt (not of the whitest) and a "blue bird's eye." Decision, who appeared wretchedly out of form, was ridden with an almost equal disregard of appearances. It is to be hoped that, as the season advances, their masters will enable them to muster the customary "appliances" of professional jockeyship.

The Military Hurdle race, the Derby of the day (so to call the cynosure of all interest), brought out four knights all worthy of their spurs. The course was little less than four miles: there were eight flights of rattling hurdles, and the encounter was altogether one of some danger. It was won by Lord Drumlanrig, on his own horse, Cardinal—who made all the running—(and small blame to him, for there were constellations of diamond eyes bent on his devoir)—and without mishap finished off his adversaries beautifully.

Lord Drumlanrig's The Cardinal, aged, h. b. ..... (Owner) 1
Mr. Ricardo's Jim-along-Josey .. .. (Owner) 2
Lord Templemore's Ralph ..... (Lord Paget) 0
Captain Bailey's Hussar, h. b. .....(Mr. Beauchamp) 0

The result was, that the Cardinal won in a canter. Jim-along-Josey's fencing was also perfect, but too wide a sweep at the top turn, and want of condition, deprived him of all chance of winning. Hussar, after refusing every attempt to get him over a hurdle before starting, took them all in tolerable form to the last in the first round, but, failing at that, was put hors de combat. Lord Paget lost a stirrup-leather in the first round, and pulled up.

Two hours after the amateur contest there was a race over the flat, won, after a capital set-to, by Chummy, who ran up to Remnant, in both the heats, for the Barrack Stakes. Thus the sports ended, and they were equal to the best ever seen at a similar anniversary.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.—The Paris papers of Sunday contained scarcely any news of the slightest interest on this side the Channel. A petition had been presented to the Chamber, praying that the head of Napoleon might be again placed on the cross of the legion of honour. Ministers did not oppose it, and the course they had adopted in the matter had given satisfaction.

FRANCE.—PARIS, March 21, 1843.—(From our own Correspondent.)—Many reports are daily circulated, both in England and France, as to the stability of the Guizot Administration, and the probable success of the Peace or War party; but I think I am not hazarding too much in saying that Guizot will remain in power at least twelve months longer.

Public attention is here divided between the Spanish Empress, or, as the French call it, Tarte, and a new comet. The friendship of the Queen of the Otaheitan islands is considered of much importance, that some of our first statesmen are intriguing to be sent out as Ambassador. There is objection, however, that appearance would not inspire the Queen or her subjects with a high opinion of "La grande Nation." Salvandy, of Spanish etiquette notoriety, refuses to go, unless accompanied by a master of the ceremonies. In short, there is a great difficulty in finding a proper person to fill so important a post; and Guizot, perplexed and bewildered, runs some risk of being turned out, in obliging one and creating a host of enemies. But, to be serious, I do not we permit the French to be meddling and tampering with independent chiefs and queens? Let Lord Aberdeen be on his guard. I can positively state that secret instructions have been sent to Admiral Hugon, and Admiral Lalande will sail from Brest ere long on a secret mission! A fiery comet, or something like one, has been seen in different parts of France, particularly towards the south. M. Arago has undertaken to enlighten us on this subject in a few days: you shall have the result of his labour, if it be worth anything.

Although the French are desirous for peace, part of the English residents in Paris are taking a warlike attitude; and this feeling is the more dangerous coming from persons accustomed to wield a deadly weapon "the ci devant"—the medical world is up in arms—Paris remains in the quiet and dull, and will not tend to increase the popularity of M. Halevy. There are some happy movements, but the tout ensemble is bad; the decorations are insufficient and got up at a great expense. In a few days Mr. Balfe's opera will be brought out at the Opera Comique. I cannot give you its name; it has already been changed several times; the last was "Geraldine." Mr. Balfe, quoique Anglais, is held in high estimation in the best salons of France.

A most brilliant concert will be given next week at the Hôtel de Ville for the sufferers of Guadaloupe. All the first musical talent is engaged.

The Italian opera will close in a few days, when Mario, Grisi, Lablache, and the remainder of the company will leave for England.

The annual masqued ball at the Opera Comique on Saturday last, for the benefit of unfortunate artists, produced 2500 francs. Strange! Strange! The melo-dramatic tragedy, "Les Burgraves," by Victor Hugo, and brought out at the Comédie Française, is a decided failure.

QUARTER PAST FOUR O'CLOCK.

The debate in the Chamber of Peers on the Secret Service Money continues. I can give you as certain that Ministers will have a large majority.

I have received letters from Madrid to the 13th. The elections had nearly terminated and were against the Minister.

The Madrid papers of the 14th instant are as barren of news as they have been for some days past; private letters of such are more interesting. Reports of a change, at least partial, in the Cabinet continued to circulate, owing to the unfavorable opinion the Government entertained of the result of the elections, which, to be sure, resulted in a majority in favour. The curiosity was felt as to the part the Infante Don Francisco would enact in the Cortes. His constituents of Saragossa were preparing a grand serenade for him. Considerable excitement in the best salons of Madrid, on account of Prince Napoleon Buonaparte, who had just had a private audience of the young Queen.

SOUTH AMERICA.—ADVANCE OF THE BUENOS AYREANS ON MONTE VIDEO.—Very important news from the river Plate was received at Liverpool, on Monday, by the William Pitt, from Monte Video, coming down to the 7th of January. The enemy, under the command of the Governor in chief of Buenos Ayres, had crossed the river Uruguay, and, at the date of the last accounts, was said to be within two or three days' march of Monte Video. The Buenos Ayrean force was reported to consist of seven thousand cavalry, three thousand infantry, and a great number of guns; and, though the Monte Videan army, under Riviera, consisting of six thousand cavalry, was still in the field, and a large force had been got together within the walls of the city, yet it was greatly feared that they would not be able to make head against the invaders. In anticipation of the capture of the city, all the English merchant-vessels had been ordered to prepare to receive British subjects on the advance of the enemy. The arrival of four Buenos Ayrean vessels of war off Monte Video, and the resignation of General Paz, the commander of the army of reserve, and of General Nunez, had increased the panic. This advance of Oribe is in direct variance with the demand of English and French Ambassadors, and a deputation had been sent from Monte Video to ascertain what they really intended to take measures for enforcing a suspension of hostilities. There is great reason to fear that the next arrivals from the river Plate will bring accounts of the capture of Monte Video; though we believe that neither England nor France will allow it to be held permanently by the Buenos [illegible].

WEST INDIES.—ARRIVAL OF THE [illegible] West India mail, per the Royal Mail Company's steamer Tay, Lieut. Fenwick, R.N., arrived at Falmouth on Sunday. The steamer is from Jamaica, Feb. 14; Havannah, 21; Nassau, 23, Bermuda, March 4; and Fayal, 13. She has on freight three boxes of gold dust and two barrels of cochara, valued at £700, and 1000 oz. of specie. Among the passengers are Mr. Christophe and lady, from St. Domingo.

[illegible]ence brought by the Tay adds little or nothing to the recent information received from the West Indies, and is only accounted for, when we take her peculiar route into consideration, and her early arrival after the last steamer (Acteon). It is most gratifying, however, to find that the outbreak, which was so serious in the occupation of the chief by one of the other islands, had not visited Jamaica. The Tay does not appear to be the bearer of more recent accounts from Guadaloupe than have already reached us via France, nor of anything new from Cuba since the conflagration at Port au-Prince, on the 9th of January.

[illegible]ordinary phenomenon had been observed from the Tay to the W. [illegible], during the homeward passage on the 6th, 7th, 8th, 9th, 10th, 14th, 15th, and 17th instant. In appearance it was like a bright sunbeam, resembling in shape a comet's tail, but more parallel, the altitude of the same being about 22 degrees, and remaining downward about eight degrees above the horizon in an oblique direction; it was generally visible from half-past 6 o'clock until 9 o'clock in the evening. This is, no doubt, the comet to which the letter of a correspondent in another column alludes.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The LORD CHANCELLOR took his seat on the woolsack at five o'clock.—The Duke of ARGYLL, having presented several petitions on the subject of the Scotch Church question, in a speech of considerable length, in which he contended that he had been intrusted with one by the General Assembly, which, however, he did not intend to present immediately. He added, that in the course of the session he might possibly present it.—An interesting and animated discussion was originated by Lord DENMAN, who called the attention of their lordships to a paragraph which he had read in the Morning Chronicle of Thursday last, in what professed to be the report of a speech delivered the preceding evening by Sir Thomas Wilde in the House of Commons. In that speech he, the learned Chief Justice of England, found himself the object of having declared from the Bench "that the learned Lord prodigate writings, and their use by prisoners, had nothing to do with prison discipline." He could not lose a moment in vindication of his own character, and of the administration of justice, giving in such an accusation the most unqualified contradiction. He had never uttered, nor entertained a single sentiment that bore the least affinity to what had been ascribed to him. His judgment, delivered in the case of Stockdale v. Hansard, was evidently that alone to which such an accusation could point; but in that case the words used by him, as reported by Adolphus and Ellis, were, "that whether the book found in the defendant's possession was a libel or not, was one which no decent could have no influence in determining how prisons could best be regulated." The noble and learned lord made no motion on the subject, but contented himself with this refutation of the calumnious report.—Lord BROUGHAM produced a letter from Sir T. Wilde, in which he distinctly disclaimed the expressions attributed to him in the report; but declined to enter upon the question which the judgment delivered by Lord Denman involved, except by reiterating his cordial acquiescence and approval.—Lord CAMPBELL rejoiced in the disavowal by Sir T. Wilde of the charge against Lord Denman which the report had imputed to him, but agreed entirely in his opinion that the judgment which had occasioned so much controversy rested on a foundation wholly erroneous and contrary to law. It had been condemned by the most eminent lawyers on both sides; and, for himself, he gloried in having been a member of the House of Commons during the struggle in support of its privileges.—Lord ABINGER thought that the unanimity of opinion among lawyers which Lord Campbell had claimed had been in accordance with, rather than in opposition to, Lord Denman's judgment, and had so far coincided with the general feeling of the country.—Lord DENMAN said he thought it was hardly necessary for his noble and learned friend (Lord Campbell) to go back to the arguments to show that the judges were wrong in the judgment they had delivered. He believed that the feeling was universal at the time the Act was passed, that the House of Commons had abandoned their privileges by bringing in this bill, for they could only publish such documents as were considered fit and proper for the performance of the functions of the House; and he was delighted that this act had passed, because this discrimination had been previously shamefully neglected. There was one instance which he considered a disgrace to the House of Commons: he meant a petition which had been presented against his learned friend the Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas ("hear, hear," from Lord Brougham), which was a disgrace also to those who wrote and those who presented it. He altogether disclaimed any intention, on the part of the Court of Queen's Bench, to interfere with the privileges of the House of Commons; but there were some cases in which the House of Commons could not maintain its proper liberty. For instance, if the House of Commons declared that it was necessary for it to have the power of fining any man to any extent, the Court of Queen's Bench would be bound to say that it had no such power; and, notwithstanding all that had been said by his noble and learned friend, he had no hesitation in declaring that the balance of evidence and reason was against indiscriminate publication. He would not then go into the arguments that had been used; and his only apology for trespassing on the time of the house was, that he could not go on in the performance of his duties, or have faced the public opinion of the county of Sussex to-morrow, if he silenced the matter to pass in silence. He was glad to hear that his hon. friend (Sir T. Wilde) had disclaimed the sentiments attributed to him in another place.—Lord BROUGHAM said he had no wish to add anything to the authority of the judges than another, it was precisely the testimony and opinion of such as his noble and learned friend, who had been the advocate in the cases, and had been defeated and condemned by the unanimous judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench. ("Hear, hear," and a laugh.) He had only to add that he understood that the Master of the Rolls had given his support to the bill on the ground that it was not inconsistent with the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench. (Hear, hear.)—The Duke of WELLINGTON said he would make only one observation in reference to what had fallen from the noble and learned lord, that the act of Parliament was contradictory to, and inconsistent with, the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench; and that was, that it was the speech of the Lord Chief Justice himself that induced him (the Duke of Wellington) to vote for the bill, because it was not contradictory to the judgment of the court.—Lord CAMPBELL would repeat that it was the opinion of the eminent lawyers on both sides of politics that the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench had been erroneous. With regard to the petition against the Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas he deplored the circumstance that it had been considered necessary to present such a petition; but the House of Lords was no proof of its impropriety. His hon. and learned friend (Sir Thomas Wilde) was the common friend of them all, was the last man in the house who would dream of disclaiming any of the judges, for he was his noble and learned friend (Lord Denman).—Lord BROUGHAM and his noble and learned friend had not improved his case by what he had just added. Lord CANNELLO: How often are you going to speak? Lord BROUGHAM: How often did you speak? (A laugh, and "hear, hear.") He understood, with regard to the eminent lawyers alluded to by his noble and learned friend, that there was one Solicitor-General, and he was not present; but Mr. Pemberton, who had written a pamphlet on the subject.—The matter then dropped.—The Earl of WICKLOW, at the suggestion of the Duke of Wellington, postponed the discussion on the state of the Irish church until all the papers connected with the subject were before the house.—On the motion of Lord REDESDALE the Copyhold Commutation Act was read a first time.—In answer to a few observations from the Earl of CARNARVON, relative to the Commission of Inquiry appointed to report on the operation of the Poor-law in Scotland, the Duke of WELLINGTON said he could assure the noble earl that the commissioners had not yet made any report, but were still engaged in that should be satisfactory to the whole country. He said the attention had been paid to the internal affairs of Scotland, and by the best-informed persons, noblemen, and gentlemen, of every view of making a report Mr. Twineldon had also been sent into Scotland—to the large towns—to go into the cause of the distress. He was for a length of time in Paisley, distributing the relief raised. He her duties. He was made some very valuable reports, and he was sure, that, with his knowledge of the working of the Poor-laws in England, as well as what he had learned in Scotland, he would be of essential service to the commissioners who had been named, and which, he was sure, would satisfy every one who was interested in the subject.—Lord CAMPBELL bore testimony to the efficiency of the commission, as being the best possible that could have been selected.—He thought, however, it might have been improved by adding to them numbers of persons from the large towns. He, however, had perfect confidence in the commission, and the report which they would produce.—The Earl of HADDINGTON thought the interest of the great towns had been sufficiently attended to in the formation of the commission, the great beauty of which, he thought, consisted in its being formed of only seven members.—The Coroners' Inquest Bill went through committee, and was ordered to be reported on Thursday.—The house then adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

The Speaker took the chair at the usual hour.—Mr. Trelawney took the oaths and his seat for Tavistock.—The following bills were read a second time and ordered to be committed:—The Edinburgh and Glasgow Union Canal Bill; the Glasgow and Three-mile-house Road Bill; the Glasgow, Paisley, and Greenock Railway Bill; the St. Helen's Railway Bill; the Leeds Gas Bill; the Northampton Improvement Bill; the Newport Gas Bill; and the Hungerford and Lambeth Suspension Foot Bridge Bill.—Mr. THORNELEY presented a petition from Liverpool, praying for the repeal of the corn and provision laws. The petition was signed by 42,169 persons (many among whom were three persons who had filled the office of mayor of the borough, and a number of merchants and bankers).—A number of petitions were presented against the Ecclesiastical Courts Bill, and against the union of the sees of St. Asaph and Bangor.—Mr. S. CRAWFORD wished to ask the right hon. Secretary for the Home Department, on behalf of the common, accompanied by the police, had proceeded to certain lands within his bailiwick and dispossessed upwards of 225 families, and given possession of their lands to a new tenant? And why the police had accompanied them.—Lord ELIOT said, as the statement of the honourable member was founded on a newspaper report, he should read a subsequent paragraph in the same paper, which stated that the dispossessed parties had since been restored to the possession of the lands. No resistance had been made by the gentry and the parties immediately put into possession. The duty of the constabulary was to act, as they had done, at the requisition of the High Sheriff.—In reply to questions put by Mr. F. French, Lord ELIOT said, it was true that a party, armed with sticks, of upwards of 1000 men had entered Waterford with a view to offer resistance to the collection of Poor-rates; there was no violence committed. The Government, on hearing of those disturbances, had despatched to the spot an able officer from Dungarvan, who declared that if a proper force were placed at his disposal, he did not anticipate any renewal of the disturbance. He (Lord Eliot) had reason to think that the untrue that a collector of Poor-rates had been killed in another part of the country.—The house having resolved itself into committee of supply, a vote was taken for £18,000,000 to meet Exchequer bills not without some admonitions from Messrs. Hume, Bowring, and Williams that the interest on such securities ought no longer to exceed 1½d. per day.—The commissariat estimate Mr. HUME was strenuous in counselling an abatement of our colonial expenses. So long as the present large military establishment should be kept up in the colonies, the estimates were perhaps incapable of reduction; but his own conviction was, that those establishments were excessive and extravagant, and ought to be reduced in favour of the people at home, which were wanting £5,000,000 to expend a finance committee.—Sir R. PEEL said that, even if the people were in the most flourishing condition, he should object to any needless establishment in the colonies; but that, on the other hand, a necessary establishment was not to be reduced because the revenue at home was not in a flourishing state. A finance committee was not so competent to judge of colonial necessities as the responsible ministry, which had the aid, information, and advice of the colonial governors and authorities. It was not wise to break down the strength of our troops by curtailing the necessary relief to regiments which had been for many years on foreign service; nor could forces be always withdrawn as soon as the country occupied by them appeared to be pacified. The last news from China would illustrate that subject. Mr. HUME admitted that a force was requisite in China, and likewise at the Cape; but what did England want with 10,000 men in the Canadas, 3000 in Nova Scotia, and 350 in Newfoundland? Every colony ought to be its own protector.—Mr. F. BARING argued that it was sound economy to keep the commissariat establishment always in an efficient state.—After a few words from Mr. Goulburn and Lord J. Russell, Mr. HUME complained of the amount of half-pay, and objected to some other particular items in this estimate.—Mr. WILLIAMS thought that those who voted for such estimates as these could have no sympathy with the suffering people.—Mr. BERNAL vindicated himself, and those who thought with him, from the imputation of wanting sympathy with the people. If gentlemen could see the returns of sickness and mortality on foreign service, they would think the reliefs too large.—Sir G. CLERK moved the vote of £191,945 for the commissariat, in which there was a saving this year of £10,000. This sum, as likewise £47,945 for the Ordnance, after some discussion, agreed to, and the chairman reported progress.—The Consolidated Fund Bill passed through committee.—The Indemnity Bill was read a second time.—The Coast of Africa Bill was committed.—The Sugar Duties Drawback (Payment of Bounties) Resolution was received, and leave given to bring in a bill.—The Sudbury Disfranchisement Bill was read a third time and passed.—Returns relative to the retirement of R. S. Lamport from the Board of Auditing Public Accounts, and to the appointment of Sir Alexander C. Grant, Bart., as a commissioner, were ordered, on the motion of Mr. HUME.—A select committee to inquire into the laws affecting aliens was appointed, on the motion of Mr. HUTT.—A motion for returns connected with the Mint establishment, and which included the private emoluments of the officers, was pressed to a division by Mr. HUME, and rejected by 39 to 15.—The returns, excluding the private emoluments of the officers, were subsequently granted by the Government.—Adjourned at a quarter past eight.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

Lord MONTAGLE gave notice of his intention to call attention to the duties on the importation of cotton and wool.—Lord BROUGHAM adverted to the publication of what he termed a malignant misrepresentation of the nature of the correspondence between himself and Lord Lyndoch, the author of which he was endeavouring to discover, in order to see if the house has not the power of punishing him. He denied that Lord Lyndoch had seen him a long time previous to the meeting, but his letter had been full of kindly and friendly feeling, and merely requested him to correct the misrepresentation which had been made of his speech. These perversions of facts would be ridiculous, if they were not that this sort of interference with private life by the press was no longer to be endured. The Duke of WELLINGTON, in reply to Lord Beaumont, said that it was the intention of the Government to bring a bill to give effect to the act of the Canadian Legislature, with respect to the introduction of American grain, through Canada at a fixed duty of three shillings, and into this country as colonial produce.—Lord BROUGHAM said he wished, if it suited his noble and learned friend (Lord Campbell), that he would postpone his motion with respect to the disputes which agitated the church of Scotland, from Monday, the 27th of March, to Friday, the last, as he (Lord Brougham) would be unable to attend on that day.—Lord CAMPBELL said he believed, from information he received from Scotland lately, that some such motion was looked for with much anxiety. Although he and his noble friend did not agree upon some points, yet on this subject they had not one object in view, and he felt bound to agree to the wish of his noble and learned friend.—Their lordships then adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

A new writ was issued for the borough of Arlisse, in the room of Mr. D. Ferral, whose election has been declared null and void.—Sir T. WILDE afterwards drew attention to the discussion on the previous evening in the House of Lords, relative to his alleged reflections on Lord Denman. He admitted the importance of the character of the Lord Chief Justice of England; re-stated the facts connected with the case of "Stockdale v. Hansard," and the judgment of Lord Denman delivered in the passage in the report of the Prison Inspectors, in which the whole proceedings originated; acknowledged the high personal merits of Lord Denman, and argued that the report in the Morning Chronicle did not substantially convey the impression which had been received by the noble and learned lord. While he did not think that Lord Denman had himself been very guarded in his expressions, he (Sir T. Wilde) acknowledged that the terms he had used with reference to the noble and learned lord's judgment in Stockdale's case, containing little law and less common sense, were not such as he would have advised any friend to use. He had expressed the passage in the report of "order, order," and "chair, chair."—The SPEAKER reminded the house of the proceeding of the hon. member for Worcester arose from a complaint of a breach of the privilege of the house, of which he had considered that the hon. member would have concluded with a motion. The hon. member had made a speech without bringing forward a motion (cheers); it was most irregular in which he was not followed by a motion, and could not but be attended with great inconvenience. (Cheers.)—Sir W. WILDE begged pardon of the house, he had only been misled by the practice in the other house of the noble and learned lord (cheers).—Lord PALMERSTON then brought under the consideration of the house the American Boundary Treaty entered into with the United States by Lord Ashburton. He noble and learned lord's judgment in all the material features of the various lines of boundary contended for by this country and the United States. He stated that, both nations being unable to agree, the matter was referred to the arbitration of the Queen of the Netherlands, with whose award he representatives of the United States declared themselves dissatisfied, and England, in like manner, after some time, withdrew from the award. The late Government were not in office at the moment when it became certain whether the line demanded by England would fulfil the terms of the former treaty, and those commissioners reported that it would do so. When the late Government went out of office the new ministry had no means ascertain whether the line contended the negotiations in the ordinary way, by the ministers of the respective countries, or by a special mission. The latter course, which they had adopted, was liable to the most serious objections, and required more public attention, and would not, if unsuccessful, leave matters as it found them. He also thought that Lord Ashburton was not a fit individual to have been selected for the arbitrator, as he must have had a bias towards America, from his connexion with it; and that Sir Charles Vaughan (so long our Minister at Washington) or Lord Heytesbury (of the dignity of a title were required) would have been more suitable persons. Lord Ashburton, though he had "the first move," and might, as in chess, have derived great advantage therefrom, if it had been played with skill, had allowed England, through his inexperience, to be placed in a most disadvantageous position, which was most advantageous to America. He had allowed America to assume the position of having a right to the whole country, whereas although he had to have been placed in that position by our friendly treaty. Lord Ashburton had made two great mistakes: he had first thrown over all discussion of the merits of the claims set up by England and America, and he had next allowed the United States government to assume as a basis that the whole of the country belonged to America, and that all we could obtain was to be procured by concession on the part of America. Early in the negotiations he had yielded up many equivalents that England might otherwise have had in store to offer as compensation for grants from America. The great tract of country north of the St. John's was quite unnecessary and useless to America for any political purpose, but to terrify and annoy this country in case disputes arose. On that ground Lord Ashburton ought to have procured it for us, as he could have done, with proper management. The terms of the treaty by which the boundary was defined were a complete puzzle. In one important point we have lost ground—the abolition of slavery in not having the mutual right of search established, which was completely conceded by America in maintaining an efficient police upon the sea for its prevention. The instructions also contained, in a letter from the Foreign Office, with regard to the destruction of the barracoons on the slave coast of Africa, were calculated to encourage the trade. The claim set up by the American Government, that their ships carried all the rights, with regard to slave-owner ships of their own country, had been admitted by the late Government, and Lord Ashburton, and was, therefore, injurious to the efforts made to abolish slavery. The noble viscount then adverted to the cases of the Encomium and Comet, in which the slaves had been set free by proclamation, and compensation afterwards awarded, upon the ground that slavery was at the time recognised by British law; but the case of the Creole was different. slavery being prohibited by British laws. Lord Ashburton's conduct had led to a bill to take possession of the Oregon territory. The noble lord considered the treaty disadvantageous to the country; but he wished to throw a veil over the past. He did trust that the execution of the treaty would prove a source and good understanding between the two countries. He concluded by moving for correspondence relating to the treaty.—Sir R. PEEL censured the noble lord for having occupied two hours in an address to the throne that her Majesty's Government had acted with inconsistency in the selection of a representative to the United States for the purpose of bringing the boundary dispute to a termination. The noble lord had himself, on the papers in question, been separated in the arbitration of the Queen of the Netherlands, and had still remained, up to the moment that the present Government came into office, in the same position in which it had been sixty years ago—a position that had at length threatened to endanger the peace of this country and America. If any fault were to be attached to the late treaty with the United States, it was the Government which should be blamed, and not Lord Ashburton. Nothing could be more fallacious than to place reliance on the map recently discovered in the archives of the Foreign-office at Paris, for there was nothing whatever to show that this was the map referred to in the letter of Dr. Franklin; but, were it so, no blame could attach to Lord Ashburton, as it was discovered subsequent to his mission, and had been overlooked during the successive accessions of Mr. Canning, Lord Aberdeen, and Lord Palmerston. The noble lord who brought forward the motion was afraid to move a vote of censure, lest it might be met with a triumphant amendment; and as the Government adopted the acts and policy of Lord Ashburton, he did not consider it consistent with his duty, or the interests of the public, to produce the correspondence and papers moved for by the noble lord.—Mr. Macaulay, in taking part in the proceedings, assured the house that he was not actuated by any feelings of a personal kind, but by a sincere desire to serve as a public man. He considered that Lord Ashburton, by the course he had pursued, had compromised the national dignity and honour, by the humble, caressing, and wheedling tone which he had adopted during the negotiation. He contended that there never was a mode better adapted for bringing two great nations into collision than that of the Ashburton treaty. He complained that the great and important question touching the right of visit was understood in two different ways, here and in the United States, yet no explanation had been given by Lord Ashburton; and it really appeared that the noble lord had, in his usual cool and unpretending manner, given up the question to Mr. Webster.—Sir H. Douglas defended the course he thought it right to pursue when Governor of New Brunswick. Lord Sydenham was weak enough to make various concessions to the United States. He allowed their troops to take possession of the disputed territory. The result was, that they refused to give it up; and when the present Government came into power, they were obliged to send troops to maintain a contingency line being agreed to, or to go to war with America. He approved of every portion of the conduct of Lord Ashburton, and should do all he could to support the arrangement effected by his lordship.—On the motion of Sir C. Napier the debate was adjourned till Wednesday.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Wednesday.

The house did not sit.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Wednesday.

Mr. Smith, the Attorney-general for Ireland, took his seat for Ripon.—A variety of petitions were presented.—In reply to a question from Mr. Divett, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that the Custom-house authorities had not entered into any compromise with the parties implicated in the late smuggling transactions. Returns connected with the receipts and expenditure of the Isle of Man were ordered, on the motion of Dr. Bowring.—The report upon the Dogs Bill was brought up, after a division, in which there were 100 for and 84 against it; and the third reading was fixed for Thursday, after another division, upon an amendment for the postponement of there being for the amendment 36, against it 97.—The adjourned debate on Lord Palmerston's motion for the correspondence on the Ashburton treaty was resumed by Sir Charles Napier, who supported the motion.—Mr. Hume followed by Mr. D'Israeli, who opposed it.—Mr. Hawes then rose to continue the debate, but there not being 40 members present the house adjourned, and the motion consequently fell to the ground.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Thursday.

Their lordships met at five o'clock. Several bills were brought up from the Commons, and read a first time.—The Earl of Devon, on the part of Lord Kenyon, presented a petition from certain inhabitants of Sudbury praying to be heard at the bar of the house against the Sudbury disfranchisement bill.—Lord Redesdale presented a petition to the same effect, and proposed that a select committee be appointed, the same as that appointed upon the bill, in order to make some inquiry with respect to expenses to be allowed to witnesses examined upon the bill before the house.—The Earl of Clancarde agreed entirely with the noble lord with respect to the necessity of such a committee.—Lord Brougham thought the committee might be appointed then, with an understanding that it should not sit until after Easter.—The appointment of the committee was then agreed to.—Several bills were advanced a stage, and the house adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Thursday.

The Oxford Railway Bill was read a third time and passed.—The South-Eastern and London and Croydon Railways Bill was read a second time, and ordered to be committed.—The bill was brought into committee on the Birkenhead Improvement Bill. The clauses were agreed to, and the report brought up and received. The Manchester Corporation Bill was read a second time.—Mr. Hume asked the noble lord (Lord Palmerston) whether it was his intention to renew the motion which had been terminated last night by the counting out of the house? (Loud cheers from the Ministerial benches.)—Lord Palmerston: I am quite satisfied with the result of the discussion which had taken place (great laughter), and he did not intend to renew his motion.—Mr. Hume said, such being the intention of the noble lord, he should move an address to her majesty, praying that such a treaty of Washington, by which that question was settled, was alike honourable to both parties—to her Majesty's Ministers, and to the Government of America, and was deserving of the thanks of the country.—Mr. J. Graham gave notice that, on the order of the day being read next Monday, for bringing up the report on the Registration of Voters Bill, he should move that it be re-committed.—Mr. Pemberton Leigh moved that the Committee of the Nottingham election petition. The honourable gentleman said that the Committee had directed him to report that John Walter, Esq., was not duly elected a burgess to serve in the present Parliament for the borough of Nottingham; that the last election for the said borough was a void election. He was further directed by the Committee to report that they had come to the following resolution:—That object water, to convey the accused back to Westringwirth, at which place the adjourned inquiry would take place on Friday.—The Lord Mayor inquired if a warrant had been issued.—Inspector Blunden said that one had not been held when he left the country, and he was not prepared with a warrant.—The prisoner was then removed from the bar, and will be conveyed to Biggleswade, in custody, this evening.

Row-street.—A Foolish Freak.—On Monday John Edward Freak, aged 26, who appeared by his dress to be a seafaring man, was paced at the bar, charged with attempting to force his way into Buckingham Palace, he being in a state of insanity.—Constable 163 A stated that about half an hour before one o'clock on Sunday morning he observed the prisoner pacing up and down outside the palace gates, and having inquired of him whether he knew he had been there, they said about an hour. Witness immediately went to him, and hearing him use threatening and incoherent language, he took him into custody.—Mr. Hall (to the prisoner): What is your name?—Prisoner (sulkily): My name? Why, my name is John Edward Freak.—Mr. Hall: What part of the country do you come from?—Prisoner: What part of the country? Why, from Dunbar, in Scotland, to be sure.—Mr. Hall: Can you give me the name of any of your relations?—Prisoner: Why (here pounding to himself). All my relations are in myself; you'll see by my papers that such is the case.—Mr. Hall directed the master of St. Martin's workhouse to take charge of the prisoner.—Mr. Burnaby also received directions to write to the prisoner's friends, requesting their attendance as soon as the medical gentlemen were of opinion he was in a fit state of mind to undergo a final examination.

Charles Harper, alias Palmer, alias Henry Green, was brought up for final examination, charged with being a returned convict before the term of his sentence had expired.—Several policemen having deposed to the prisoner's trial, conviction, and sentence on a charge of highway robbery, Constable Abercrombie stated on Friday se'nnight he waited the arrival of the Emerald steamer from France. The vessel arrived about two o'clock at London-bridge, and presently the prisoner went on board and shook hands with one of the crew. After a short time he again came ashore, and when going through Old Gravel-lane he got some bottles and flasks filled with gin, and then witness apprehended him. Witness conveyed him to the luggage-room at the London-bridge, and being asked if his name was Harper, he said he would tell that to witness's superiors. He then proceeded to the witness which he declined to listen to, and, seeing the window open, the prisoner ran to it and jumped out on the quay, a height of about twenty feet. "Stop thief!" was instantly raised, and the prisoner was speedily secured by the persons on the quay. The prisoner gave a wrong address, and refused to personally address him as Harper. There being no defence, the several witnesses were bound over, and the prisoner committed.

Wright-street. William Alexander Grist, aged 20, a very good-looking young man, in naval undress, was committed from this office for stealing a quantity of plate from the house of Lady Playfair, in Graham's-place, Dalston, and a horse from Mr. Croft, a livery-stablekeeper, in Whitechapel.

Queen-square.—Outrage at the House of Lords. Thomas Allen, a respectable-looking man, between thirty and forty years of age, who described himself as an accountant and traveller, was brought up by Mr. Partridge, an inspector of the A division, who has charge of the police at the House of Lords, for having acted in a riotous and disorderly manner there.—Sergeant Mumford, 21 A, stated that whilst on duty in front of the House of Lords on Monday evening, about five o'clock, he saw the defendant standing there addressing all who were about him, and who occasions by gathered in numbers, in violent language. He swaggered his arms about, stamped his feet, and exclaimed in a loud voice, "D—n public opinion." One of the peers was passing at that time, to whom he thought defendant addressed himself, and having seen him act in the same violent and incoherent manner on a former occasion, he felt it his duty to take him into custody. When he saw the defendant on the occasion to which he alluded in the early part of last week, he heard him declare that Lord Brougham's property ought to be confiscated, and he would take care that it should be so. When taken into custody, he said that he was a staunch Tory, for Queen, Church, and State, and that his object was to prevent all rating. Witness at the time believed him to be insane, but he thought that his insanity might have been increased, if not produced, by his having been drinking. On being questioned as to his residence, he said that he lived at No. 18, Church-street, Kennington, and, on inquiry, it was found that that address was a correct one.—Mr. Hood inquired if defendant's belief in the statement made by the police against him was true.—Defendant, in a calm and collected tone, replied that it was to a certain extent, but the fact was that he had been drinking some strong ale with a few friends in the course of the day, and having had no dinner it took an effect upon him, but he hoped the magistrate would excuse him that time, and he would promise that it should never occur again.—After a desultory conversation, in which the magistrate and the inspector were both of opinion that defendant's madness was the effect of an indulgence in liquor rather than from any actual aberration of mind, Mr. Bond implored him as a friend to abstain from intemperate habits, and, on his promise to do so, defendant was liberated.

POLICE.

Guildhall.—The Last Morbid Delusion.—Charles Dowie, a journeyman shoemaker, who is labouring under the delusion that some passage in "Chambers' Edinburgh Journal," reflecting upon his grandfather, prevents the master shoemakers from giving him work, was put to the bar before Mr. Alderman Farebrother. The prisoner was remanded, in order that Mr. Macmurdo, the surgeon of the prison, might see him, on the expectation that he would give such a certificate as would justify treating the prisoner as a dangerous lunatic. A certificate was now put in, but it did not pronounce him insane. It stated that the surgeon had examined Dowie whilst he had been in that gaol, that he did not appear to be ill, and talked collectedly and intelligently on general subjects, but he appeared to have been much distressed by the want of employment, and the result had been apparently great excitement of mind on that subject.—Mr. Alderman Farebrother then questioned the prisoner, to see if he also could arrive at the conclusion that the prisoner is sane, but excited.—Mr. Alderman Farebrother asked him how Mr. Chambers had offended him?—The prisoner said he had taken such a name with the name of the family as ought not to be borne. He had called them idiots, and he should be an idiot if he put up with it.—The Alderman observed that if Mr. Chambers had done anything wrong towards him he had legal remedy.—The prisoner asked what legal remedy a poor man had?—The Alderman inquired why he was so anxious to see Mr. Chambers?—The prisoner said all he wanted was to find him out, to chastise him for his insolence.—Mr. Alderman Farebrother said it was a part of his duty to prevent breaches of the peace, and he must interfere as much for the good of the prisoner as the protection of Mr. Chambers.—The prisoner said Mr. Chambers was a nice sort of man to give advice to the working class, and at the same time call him and his father idiots. He had said his grandfather was an idiot.—The Alderman asked him if he had the paper?—The prisoner replied he had not seen the paper, but he had it from the best authority, that such a statement was published thirty years ago in the journal. His shopmates had seen it.—Mr. Alderman Farebrother said it might be a good job for Mr. Chambers if he never found him.—Mr. Alderman Farebrother desired the prisoner to be removed, and observed that there must be great danger to the public in letting such a man go about, as he might make some other person for Mr. Chambers. He sent for Mr. Macmurdo, who, in an under tone, appeared to argue that a man who was irrational upon only one subject was not to be deemed of unsound mind. While he spoke rationally upon things in general he was not to be deemed insane.—The clerk said if an apple had a speck, which affected the soundness of only a hundredth part of it, it would be deemed correct to say it was an unsound apple.—Mr. Alderman Farebrother, to show that the prisoner was a dangerous lunatic, repeated the questions, and received similar answers.—This satisfied Mr. Macmurdo's scruples, and he agreed to sign a certificate of insanity.—The prisoner was again remanded to the Compter, that preparations may be made for his removal.

Extraordinary Charge of Murders.—On the Lord Mayor taking his seat on Thursday morning, a young woman, named Sarah Dazley, was placed at the bar charged under the following extraordinary circumstances:

From the statement of Inspector Blunden, of the rural police, stationed at Biggleswade, it appears that the accused has resided for some length of time at Wrestlingworth, a small village about six miles from the former place, and was about to be married last week to her third husband, a young man named George Waldock.—the banns having been already twice published in the parish church; on the occasion, however, of an observation made by some person to Waldock, to the effect that the accused had already poisoned two husbands, and would very probably serve him in a similar manner, the young man demurred, and sought an interview with the clergyman of the village, to whom he communicated the circumstance. The matter soon got wind, and coming to the knowledge of the authorities, it was determined to disinter the body of the last husband, who died in October, 1842, and subject the remains to a medical examination. Finding this, the woman Dazley absconded from Wrestlingworth, as it was supposed, for London, whither, by direction of the coroner, Inspector Blunden followed her, and succeeded in effecting her capture at the house of a relation near Queenhithe Wharf, Thames-street, on Wednesday morning. A post mortem examination of the body had been made, and, in a letter received this morning, it was stated that large quantities of arsenic had been discovered in the deceased's stomach. It was further suspected that the accused had been concerned in the death of her first husband, and also a child of her own. The Lord Mayor inquired if a warrant had been issued.—Inspector Blunden said that one had not been held when he left the country, and he was not prepared with a warrant.—The prisoner was then removed from the bar, and will be conveyed to Biggleswade, in custody, this evening.

EVERY BODY'S COLUMN.

SONNET.

The jvied ruin mouldering to its fall,
The prostrate column from its basement thrown,
The moss which greenly mantles tree and stone,
The crumbling arches of each antique hall,
The overthrow of empires great and small,
The form of death which darkens every zone,
The finding continents as yet unknown,
The chains to forge which shall their sons enthrall,
The bitter cup on genius oft bestowed,
The cold neglect that virtue still must bear,
The hopes attain'd not wholized in irksome care,
The "fardels of the heart"—a weary load,
The future prospect hope or sorrow sees,—
These are thy works, oh Time! nor only these.—H. W. H.

We insert the following as the first effusion of a young man, from whom we hope to have better things.

A mother's grave, oh hallow'd spot,
The resting-place of one most dear,
Shall thy sad home be e'er forgot
For any worldly objects here.

That tiny sweet smile and tender care,
That oft was ta'd to greet her boy,
Be ne'er remember'd by me here
As scenes of past delight and joy.

Oh yes, how oft I ponder o'er
The love of her now pale in death,
And tears of sweet affection pour
For her from whom I first drew breath.

This sweet, tho' sad to linger near
The grave of one you dearly love,
But oh, how sweet the thought most dear
That we shall meet again above.

Tis this that cheers my youthful heart
Where'er I am on earth or wave,
For never from my soul shall part
That hallow'd spot, a mother's grave.

TO CAMILLE LEROUX.

(Ornament of Van Amburgh's Circus: season, 1843.)

Camille Leroux! Camille Leroux!
What feats prodigious we see you do!
All parts of your steed are alike to you:
You ride on his back, you ride on his neese,
To the laws of centrifugal force ever true.

Now you sink, now you swim; now you fly, now pursue,
With grace in each motion, Camille Leroux!
And charms in each posture you display, and new—
Like a moonbeam that pierces a stormy night through,
You gleam for a moment, then fade from our view.

Camille Leroux! Camille Leroux!
What have you got on the sole of your shoe?
Is it bird-lime, or pitch, or cement of Poolo—
Vancouver, or post-office gum—Indian glue,
Or carpenter's ditto? Camille Leroux!

Camille Leroux! Camille Leroux!
Is your dear life really not worth a sous
One would think on horseback you were born and grew—
No dowager seems more at ease in her pew
On a Sunday, than you on your steed, fair Leroux

* * * * * * * * *

But, since it is time to be bidding adieu,
May you soon come again to us, Camille Leroux.

INSANITY.

It appears that within the last twenty years the cases of the above dreadful malady have more than tripled. The total number of lunatics and idiots in England is as follows:—Lunatics 6,806, idiots 5,741; together, 12,547; but allowing for defective returns, the number may be taken at 41,000—an average of one to every thousand of the population. In Wales lunatics 133, idiots 753; total 886; and adding for parishes that have made no returns, they may be safely set down at a thousand—a proportion of one to eight hundred. Scotland has 3,653 insane persons, or one to about seven hundred. In Ireland the number of lunatics and idiots exceeds 8,000. In one thousand male patients, insanity has been supposed, by an eminent authority, to be traceable to the following causes relatively:—Drunkenness, 110; consequence of disease 100; epilepsy, 78; ambition, 73; excessive labour, 73; born idiots, 71; misfortunes, 69; old age, 69; chagrin, 54; love, 47; accidents, 39; religious enthusiasm, 37; political events, 28; poisonous effluvia, 17; ill-usuage, 12; crimes, remorse, and despair, 9; pretended insanity, 5; malconformation of the skull, 4; other and unknown causes, 115.

BANKING.

I shall point out to you some of the advantages of keeping a banker. In the first place your money will be lodged in a place of security from fire and from thieves. Your banker will also take care of your property, your plate, your deeds, your will, or the policy of insurance on your house. Another advantage is, that the banker's book will be a check upon your accounts. In choosing a banker, if you have no other grounds of preference, I advise you to open your account with the bank, or the branch bank, that is nearest to your own place of residence—let your banker be your neighbour. —Ten Minute's Advice about Keeping a Banker.

REMARKABLE PIKE.

In the year 1497, in a fountain which belongs to the town of Hallbrone, a pike was caught which was in length nineteen feet. and which weighed 340 lbs.; behind its ear there was a copper ring, upon which there was the following inscription in Greek:—"I was the first fish that ever was thrown into this pond, by the hands of Frederick II., monarch of the world, on the 5th of October, 1230." Hence it appears that this pike was 267 years old when it was taken out.

CORONERS' INQUESTS.

Suicide of Mr. Isaac Cohen.—On Tuesday, last an inquest, which had been adjourned from the previous Saturday, was held before Mr. Baker, the coroner, at the Plough Tavern, Blackwall, to investigate the circumstances attending the death of Mr. Cohen, proprietor of Holland House Academy, Hamilton-place, who was highly connected among the Jewish persuasion, and who committed self-destruction, at the above tavern, by hanging himself with a silk handkerchief, and swallowing a large quantity of laudanum. The principal witness examined was Sophia Green, who had been cook in the family twelve years, and who stated that his mind had been partially affected for the four previous years, when one of his pupils, a boy aged nine years, hung himself with a handkerchief. Deceased was in the habit of rising at o'clock at night, he suddenly entered the school-room and took leave of his wife and family. He in a few minutes after was heard in a room, stamping with his feet, and roaring as if he was out of his mind; and on the two following days he ordered as much meat of his butcher as was sufficient for 200 persons. Deceased has left 9 children.—Verdict, "Temporary insanity."

Fatal Accident to Mr. Baker, of the Junction Many Tavern.—On Monday an inquest was held at the Eagle Tavern, Snaresbrook, before Mr. Lewis, the Coroner for Essex, on the body of Mr. William Baker, of the Auction Mart Tavern, president of the Licensed Victuallers Asylum, at whose house it will be remembered the tragical occurrence between the post-boy and the bar-maid took place, some time since. Mr. W. Elston deposed that on Monday, the 13th instant, he was proceeding with the deceased and two other friends, in a four-wheeled chaise, to the Eagle Tavern at Snaresbrook, where they intended to dine. When the horse being suddenly checked by the deceased, began to rear and plunge, and threw him out on the road. The injuries were so great that deceased died soon after. Verdict, "Accidental death."

VIEW OF PORT WELLINGTON, NEW ZEALAND.

DEATH OF THE GOVERNOR OF NEW ZEALAND.

The Auckland Times announces the death of his Excellency Captain William Hobson, the first British governor of the islands of New Zealand. The event took place at Auckland, on Friday evening, the 9th of September, when the patient sank under a severe disease, in the 49th year of his age. The funeral of his Excellency took place on Tuesday, the 13th of September, at one o'clock. His mortal remains were deposited in a brick vault prepared in the new burial-ground, the service being impressively performed by the Rev. J. F. Churton. The Hon. the Colonial Secretary, Willoughby Shortland, Esq., followed as chief mourner, after whom walked in procession all the officers of Government, and nearly all the respectable inhabitants of Auckland. The body, covered by the union-jack, was carried by the sailors of her Majesty's brig Victoria, and military honours were performed over the grave by a party of the 80th Regiment in presence of the officers. The aborigines crowded into the town in great numbers early in the morning, and the ceremony of "Uhunga" was performed in every quarter, as if for one of their own most valued chiefs: this is a long-continued public demonstration of grief, during which they sit upon the ground and howl in chorus. Almost every male carried a musket, but, with intuitive politeness, they abstained from their explosions till the military salute had been fired. Most of the females had their hair fantastically ornamented with wreaths of the supple-jack—a very pretty native wild climbing plant, in full blossom at that time. Captain Hobson was serving as Lieutenant at Jamaica in the year 1823, when he was put in command of the Lion schooner, and sent in search of the pirates annoying our trade in those seas: he took several vessels, with their crews, and the most notorious chiefs, whom he brought to punishment. Subsequently he fell into the hands of those dangerous gentry, but he saved himself and his comrades from a violent death at the very moment it appeared inevitable. Some of the incidents of this transaction are stated to be recorded in "Tom Cringle's Log." A short time after, for his remarkable bravery, he was made a commander, and reappointed to the Ferrett, sent on the same service, when he was again very actively employed. In paying off the Scylla, to which vessel he had been removed, in 1828, he was promoted by the Lords of the Admiralty to the rank of post-captain. He afterwards commanded the Rattlesnake, detached from the East India station to New Zealand. Throughout the whole of his service he was considered a first-rate officer. Captain Hobson has left an amiable lady and young family. His death, unquestionably, places the colony in a critical position, which will present a fitting opportunity for introducing to our readers a series of engravings illustrative of the boundless natural resources of these islands, and the rapid advance of their civilisation.

VIEW OF TAHITI.

NEW CONQUEST BY FRANCE IN THE PACIFIC.

The following singular intelligence of the occupation of Tahiti by the French has just been received through two channels. First, in the New York Journal of Commerce, it is announced that letters from the American consul, to September 11th, state that the French admiral, Dupetit Thouars, arrived there on the 8th, and made a demand on the Tahitans of the sum of 10,000 dollars, in reparation for abuses, and as a guarantee for their future adherence to the treaties. It seems they immediately entered into negotiations for the surrender of the sovereignty of the island. Four of the chiefs, on the 9th, signed a paper to that effect, but the queen had refused to sign it. At the last date, the question of acknowledgment of the sovereignty of France was supposed to be settled, as all demonstrations of hostility had ceased, but the French flag was not yet hoisted.

The Mémorial Bordelais, received subsequently to the above, publishes a report from M. A. Maire, captain of the Melanie, announcing that Admiral Dupetit Thouars, on his return from the Marquesas Islands, touched at Otaheite, where he received from the queen a formal demand to place her possessions under the protection of France. A treaty was drawn up, and signed by the queen, and all the documents relative to this negotiation were forwarded to France by the Melanie. The admiral had established French authorities in the island with the consent of the queen. The English residents in the South Sea Islands had loudly exclaimed against what they called French usurpation. The Chilian journals had, however, expressed their satisfaction at the conduct of Admiral Dupetit Thouars.

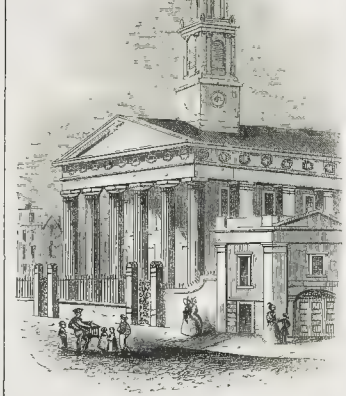
Tahiti, or more properly, O Tahiti, will be remembered as the Otaheite of our great circumnavigator Cook; and the annexed view is from a profusely-embellished edition of his celebrated Voyages, enriched with notes of geographical information to the present period; so as altogether to render the work one of the best specimens of popular illustration, literary as well as graphic. Tahiti is the largest of the Society Islands, and lies in the Pacific Ocean, about 1,200 leagues to the south-east of the Marquesas, recently taken possession of by the French. Its surface is estimated at 430 square miles, or equal to the county of Bedford. It is belted with a coral reef, which has several breaks, and affords many good anchorages. The island consists of two peninsulas, united by a close isthmus; the interior being occupied with mountain masses, which terminate in high and sharp peaks, the loftiest of which rises between 7000 and 8000 feet above the sea level. Except these peaks, the whole island is covered with thick woods; the valleys between the lower hills are watered by fine streams, on the banks of which, as well as on the seashore, are built the dwellings of the inhabitants. The frequent occurrence of lava, basalt, and pumice-stone indicates this, like all the elevated islands of the Pacific, to be of volcanic origin. It is, indeed, "the fairest isle in the South Sea;" the climate is very mild, and the temperature of winter and summer is nearly the same; and even during the heavy rains, between December and February, diseases are not frequent.

Tahiti was discovered in 1606, by the Spaniards; but, being imperfectly described, Captain Wallis, who visited the island in 1767, considered it as a new discovery, and named it King George's Island; and Bougainville, who visited it next year, named it the New Cythera. Cook visited it several times between 1769-78, and his interesting accounts of the island and its inhabitants will be remembered: he estimated the population at 200,000. These visitors to Tahiti were very favourably impressed with the appearance, manners, and cleanliness of the natives: in their motions they observed both vigour and ease; their walk was graceful, and their behaviour to strangers and each other affable and courteous. They appeared to be brave, open, and candid, without suspicion or treachery, cruelty or revenge. Cook mentions that both men and women washed their whole bodies in running water three times a day. Those who clothed themselves so as to avoid the sunbeams were but a shade or two darker than an European brunette; their eyes black and sparkling; their teeth white and even; their skin soft and delicate; their limbs finely turned; their hair jetty, perfumed, and ornamented with flowers. Such were these simple children of nature when first visited by Europeans. In 1788 Lieutenant Bligh arrived here in the Bounty, and collected bread-fruit and other plants in great number; and to his kind treatment here he ascribes the motives for the mutiny and piratical seizure of the Bounty. In 1797 missionaries were sent to convert the Tahitians, amongst whom they found infanticide and human sacrifices. There were also continual wars among them. For nineteen years the labours of the missionaries were fruitless, but, in 1816, the king of the island, Pomaree II., embraced Christianity, and introduced it among the natives. After his death in 1821 the missionaries acquired greater influence, and during the minority of his son even drew up a constitution and laws, which were however, entirely neglected; but infanticide and human sacrifices were abolished, and peace maintained. The son of Pomaree died before he manhood, and was succeeded by his sister, the queen Aimata. The government is a despotism; the sovereign possesses absolute power over the land, as does each chief. The missionaries assert, that several years ago the population did not exceed 5000 souls, and this decrease they attribute to vices introduced by Europeans, infanticide and civil wars. They belong to the Malay race. The missionaries claim the reformation of the people from drunkenness. Their indolence has ever been notorious, and has been, according to Captain Beechey, a greater bar to the success of the missionaries than their previous faith.

The Tahitians have made some progress in civilisation, as they show in their cloth, large boats, dwellings, and utensils; and many years ago a rude still was discovered on the island. From the summit of its mountains to the sea-shore its luxuriant vegetation produces choice food, and its woods materials for extensive traffic; but there is no currency. Besides the bread-fruit tree, the sugar-cane here is said to be superior to that of any other country; delicious kinds of apples grow wild; and sweet potatoes, yams, plantains, arrow-root, the custard-apple, mulberry, guava, orange, lime, citron, grape, Cape gooseberry, and water-melon are among its natural wealth. Pigs, goats, poultry, and horned cattle are numerous; and the pork is prized for its fine flavour among seamen. Timber, for house and ship building, is abundant, and includes a fine wood than mahogany. "It is, perhaps, of more importance to observe, that both the earth and the atmosphere are favourable to the growth of the vine, cotton, coffee, and sugar; the cultivation of which would afford a lucrative employment to the people, augmenting the small returns which they already derive from arrow-root and palm-oil," and cocoa-nut oil, now bartered for ribands, cloth, &c.

An English consul resides at Tahiti; and, according to a work just published ("Polynesia," by the Rev. Dr. Russell), industry is now supplied with a stimulus in the island, and they even imitate the dress, luxuries, and manners of the most enlightened people in the world. The master of a vessel lately on the station describes a church with a congregation of 5000, and the queen near the pulpit; the women wearing bonnets, and altogether dressed as near the English as they can copy. The accounts received from the missionaries are, however, very conflicting; one party states there to be a good code of laws—spirits to be entirely forbidden, and public offenders to be compelled to work on the public roads; another party represents the drunkenness as truly appalling, and a chief as begging "Britannia and America" to have mercy on the natives, "because these countries sent the poison amongst them.." In this equivocal state of things it is not likely that the occupation of Tahiti by the French will lead to any important results. British interests, whether of a religious or temporal kind, will, of course, be respected. The French are by no means the best colonists in Europe, though colonisation is at present their favourite topic. Tahiti, notwithstanding the passage above quoted, can scarcely be raised to importance as a commercial station. "As a mere harbour," observes the Times, "the chief benefit which the French can derive from it must be drawn from the merchant-vessels of other countries; and it would probably have been more convenient, as well as more rational, to have left the queen in the full enjoyment of her regal authority, without the protection of the tri-coloured flag."

THE CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS.—No. XXX.



ST. JOHN'S, WATERLOO-ROAD.

The want of church accommodation in the overgrown parish of Lambeth had long been acknowledged ere the above edifice was commenced. This want became especially evident after the completion of Waterloo-bridge in 1817, and the spacious approach thereto known as the Waterloo-bridge-road; and six years had elapsed ere the above deficiency was supplied, although, in the meantime, new streets had sprung up in every direction.

The site of the above church was well chosen, independent of the spiritual necessities of the district. The first stone was laid June 30th, 1823, by the Archbishop of Canterbury. The architect is Mr. Bedford. The design has few points for admiration, though it presents the average merit of the "temple" plan, so commonly adopted by the church architects of the period at which it was built. Twenty years have worked great changes in this respect: the rage for classic, or rather pagan, models has subsided, and our architects have shifted their choice to the Anglo-Norman and pointed styles. St. John's is neatly built with brick and stone; the body is of oblong plan, and the front, towards the Waterloo-road, has a portico of six Grecian Doric columns, supporting a neat pediment; and from the western end of the body of the church rises a neatly-proportioned tower, surmounted with a steeple. The church will accommodate 2000 persons. In the vaults, which are well arranged, are deposited the remains of Elliston, the comedian; and in the churchyard are a few altar-tombs, visible from the pavement, which may seem to say "Memento mori" to many a listless passenger.

"CORNER MEMORY THOMPSON'S" HOUSE AT HAMPSTEAD.

The architect of this strange pile died about a month since, at the advanced age of 86 years; and his eccentric success throughout this long life has accordingly become matter of public interest. He rejoiced in the somewhat plebeian names of John Thompson, and was a native of the equally plebeian locality of St. Giles's. His father was a greengrocer, and young John, on carrying a salad to the house of an undertaker in the neighbourhood, named Hubbard, excited attention by his sharp and ready manner, and the undertaker accordingly took him as errand-boy, afterwards his assistant; and he ultimately married Hubbard's daughter, by whom he acquired some property. This was his start in life, and enabled him to commence business as an auctioneer and brewer's valuer, in which he continued several years, amassing great wealth. As he advanced in life and fortune, he sought retirement at Frognal, just below Hampstead Church, where he built the above structure, which he styled "Frognal Priory." Like the great novelist and poet at Abbotsford, he was his own architect; Thompson had neither plan nor drawings, but directed the bricklayer, piece by piece, from some design he might possibly have conceived in his own mechanical mind; and thus he raised the above specimen of "castle-building." On its completion, he found that he possessed no right of road to the grotesque pile, save a narrow footpath; and it was not until after two or three years' exertion that he succeeded in purchasing, at a great price, sufficient ground to form a carriage-road. Thence he often went to town in his chariot, to visit his old haunts in St. Giles's; for, like the retiring tallow-chandler, who, on selling his business, bargained for his presence on a melting-day, Thompson loved the spot whence he started in Fortune's wheelbarrow. Here he might be seen, with "spectacles on nose," pottering among the old curiosity-shops; as Horace Walpole cheapened Dickey Bateman's chairs at half-a-crown apiece, for Strawberry Hill, so John Thompson collected the mesbles and "items of taste and vertu" for Frognal Priory. In these explorations he would leave his carriage at the corner of a bye-street, and sink into some obscure public-house, and there taking some bread and cold meat from his pocket, call for a pint of ale, and thus dine "like a man of property." In course of time he collected a countless assemblage of curiosities at the Priory, which he willingly showed to any persons who rung at his gate: but for some good reason he shut up the show-house a few years since; probably, the omnibus and "convenient distance" had increased his visitors to an inconvenient throng. He was designated "Corner Memory" from his having, for a bet, drawn a plan of St. Giles's parish from memory, at three sittings, specifying every coach-turning, stable-yard, and public pump, and likewise the corner shop in every street. He possessed a most mechanical memory; for he would take up a newspaper over-night, and be able next morning to repeat all he had read. He gained some notoriety, a short time since, by presenting to her Majesty a carved bedstead, reputed once to have belonged to Cardinal Wolsey; with this he sent some other antique furniture, and the whole is now, we believe, in an apartment of Windsor Castle. The bedstead, on his purchasing it, several years since, proved so large, that he was compelled to build a room purposely to contain it. Mrs. Thompson died many years since; of the disposal of "Corner Memory's" wealth we are not so cognizant.

AFFGHAN BEAR.

Among the numerous trophies obtained from the recent seat of war in the East, one of the most curious that has yet reached us is a bear (Ursus thibetanus), lately presented to the Surrey Zoological Gardens, by Captain Alexander. It was captured when quite a cub, by an officer of the 45th in the celebrated Kyber Pass, and has since shared with his captors in all the vicissitudes of war, imprisonment, and victory. The only other individual of this species that has been seen alive in this country was a tenant of the Tower menagerie, about 18 years ago, and was afterwards sent to the King of Holland. It is the rarest of the ursine family, and differs in many essential respects from its congeners, having a remarkably thick neck, flat head, and large ears. The claws are particularly weak, and not more than half the length of those of the other two species of bears known in India. The conformation of the body is of a heavy massive character, clothed with a thick close fur of a glossy jet black, in all parts, except a most singular white patch under the throat, exactly resembling in shape the letter Y (as shown in the engraving below). In India it is considered to be ferocious in its habits, but that description does not apply to this specimen, which was quite at liberty on board ship, and is very inoffensive and fond of play, after his rough fashion. He feeds on bread and fruits, and cannot be induced to touch meat either raw or cooked.

BETHLEM HOSPITAL.

BETHLEM HOSPITAL.

Recent events, of too painful a nature to require revival in the public mind, have rendered this magnificent foundation, and the administration of its affairs, subjects of paramount interest, which will, doubtless, be protracted by the inquiry instituted as to the state of the law relating to criminals labouring under partial insanity, or monomania. The social evil is frightful to contemplate; yet it is cheering to reflect that one of the noblest monuments of British philanthropy exists in the establishment to whose economy we are about to direct the reader's attention.

The hospital of St. Mary Bethlem, vulgarly called Bedlam, owed its name and original establishment to the piety of a citizen of London. In the year 1247, in the thirty-ninth of Edward III, Simon Fitzmary, who had been sheriff, influenced by the prevailing feeling of the age, was desirous to found a religious house. Accordingly he appropriated by a deed of gift, which is still extant, all his lands in the parish of St. Botolph without Bishopsgate, being the spot afterwards known by the name of Old Bethlem, now called Liverpool-street, to the foundation of a priory. The prior, canons, brethren, and sisters for whose maintenance he provided were to be distinguished by a star upon their mantles, and were especially directed to receive and entertain the bishop of St. Mary of Bethlem and the canons of that their mother church so often as they might come to England. Such was the original design of the foundation.

In the year 1675 the governors were enabled to lay the first stone of a splendid building in Moorfields. The site on which the new building was erected was granted to the hospital by the Corporation of London, on a lease for 999 years, at the annual rent of twelve pence.

From the first reception of lunatics into Bethlem their condition and treatment were wretched in the extreme. Up to 1770 the public were admitted to see the lunatics at 1d. each, by which the hospital derived at least £400 a-year. So late as 1814 the rooms resembled dog-kennels, and the patients were chained, handcuffed, or locked to the wall, till the case of one Norris, who had been thus "encaged and chained" for more than twelve years, led to a Parliamentary investigation and the adoption of a new mode of treatment.

In 1799 the old hospital was found to be so dilapidated that it was resolved to build a new one and change the site, though it was not until 1810 that the latter was determined on, viz., a ground-plot of nearly 12 acres in St. George's-fields, on part of which were the house and gardens of the notoriously infamous Dog and Duck, a relic of which, a dog carrying a duck sculptured in stone, is preserved in the present hospital front wall.

The first stone of the new hospital was laid in 1812, and the building for two hundred patients completed in 1815, at a cost of £122,572 8s. 5d., the exact sum raised for the purpose by grants and benefactions; two wings being built for criminals at the expense of the Government. The entire building occupies eight acres—the adjoining three acres being covered by the House of Vaccination, a branch of Bridewell Hospital. The Bethlem design, one of three for which prizes were awarded, and the composition of Mr. J. Lewis, consists of a centre, and two projecting wings, east and west. The centre, which projects from the main body, has a hexastyle Ionic portico and pediment, above which is an attic, surmounted with a cupola. It is three stories in height, and more than 600 feet in length. To the original wings have been added two others, after the designs of Mr. Sydney Smirke. The first stone was laid July 26, 1838, when a breakfast was given, at a cost of £464 8s. to the hospital, and a narrative of the proceedings printed, at an expense of £140 9s. to the same fund. In the spacious entrance-hall, under the portico, are placed Cibber's celebrated statues, screened by curtains, which are only withdrawn upon public occasions and when visitors desire to see them. For these matchless figures Louis XII. of France once offered 12,000 louis d'ors. They were restored in 1820 by Mr. Baston, and are in a fine state of preservation. Some of the irons formerly used are also shown as curiosities. Strangers are admitted to view the hospital by governors' orders; and foreigners and members of parliament, by writing to the president, treasurer, or Secretary of State: but the average yearly number of visitors has not lately exceeded 550. Still, few sights can be more gratifying than the present condition of the interior of Bethlem. The scrupulous cleanliness of the house, the decent attire of the patients, and the unexpectedly small number of those under restraint (sometimes not one person throughout the building), lead the visitor not unnaturally to conclude that the management of lunatics has here attained perfection; while the quiet and decent demeanour of the inmates might almost make him doubt that he is really in a "madhouse." Each wing, or rather extreme pavilion of the front, has been carried out sixty-four feet further, six windows more on each floor being added to it, so that the entire length of the façade is now extended to 697 feet. Two additional wings, one story high, have also been erected in the rear, at right angles with the main building, so as to enclose an inner court or garden upwards of 200 feet deep. The western one of these wings, or wards, is for noisy male patients; the eastern one, for noisy female patients. The cells vary in size from 10½ feet by 8 to 11½ by 9½; and the width of the galleries for in-door exercise is from 14½ feet to 10½. The roofs are wholly of iron and slate; and the ceilings of brick, and slate, and fire-stone, vaulted. Thus, every part of the new buildings is perfectly fire-proof. The main edifice is warmed by Howden's air-stoves, and the rear wings, by Price and Manby's hot-water apparatus. Ventilation is specially provided for, each of the new cells having a separate flue. Warm and cold water are amply supplied to each wing; the latter being pumped up by a three-horse power engine from wells sunk for the purpose. The cost of these additional wings is between £24,000 and £25,000.

The excellent internal arrangement of this hospital cannot fail to strike every visitor on his entering the wards, and it is not too much to suppose that the public generally have no idea of the extent to which a careful arrangement of the cases, and the judicious management of the unfortunate patients, has been carried by the present authorities.

We accompanied a party on Tuesday last, and passed through the criminals' exercising ground as the patients entered. Oxford was busily engaged, with three others, in playing at fives; and, as the recent regulation of the governors of the hospital precludes the keepers from pointing out any individual among the criminals, he was observed only by those who had a previous knowledge of his person. M'Naughten was also in the yard, but, probably from the novelty of his situation, he appeared ill at ease, and was seated alone, under a covered shed in the centre. As our party entered he purposely averted his face, seemingly anxious to avoid observation, and, fortunately, none were curious enough to intrude upon him, further.

The number of criminals at present in the hospital is 85. Most of them are confined for murder, committed or attempted. Lieut. Davis is one of the oldest prisoners—he having been confined in Bethlem more than twenty years. He was tried for shooting at Lord Palmerston, when that nobleman was Secretary at War, and acquitted on the ground of insanity. There are many others confined for political offences. James Hatfield, who died in Bethlem in 1841, had been confined there since 1802 for shooting at George III.: he was a gallant dragoon, and his face was seamed with scars got in battle before his crime. He employed himself with writing poetry on the death of his birds and cats, his only society in his long imprisonment.

The visiting days are two Mondays in each month. The Government pays 15s. a week for each criminal in this hospital. The average charge for the pauper lunatic in the county asylums is 7s. a week; and for idiots, or lunatics, in the workhouses, from 2s. 10d. to 3s. 6d. a week.

The income of Bethlem and Bridewell Hospitals amounts to £33,000 per annum, and, with the exception of £3000 voted by the city of London for the building of the new hospital, the whole is the accumulation of private benevolence!

The number of patients in the hospital at the present time is about 390, of whom 194 are supposed to be incurable, and 85 are criminals.

The medical officers are E. T. Monro, Esq., M.D.; Sir Alexander Morison, M.D.; and W. Lawrence, Esq., F.R.S.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MARCH 25, 1843.

On Tuesday Lord Palmerston attempted a re-opening, as it were, of the American Boundary Question—by moving for papers, which the Government peremptorily, and, we think, most fairly, resisted—the conflict of party extending over one night of tedious debate, and being, on the following day, brought to a most unseemly close, by the counting out of the house, without a division. We first disapprove of this technical termination of what appears, in any case, to have been a very impotent proceeding. Either the question mooted by Lord Palmerston, and debated for many hours with sharpness, vigour, and even passion, was of such moment to the country that the members of the Legislature were bound to be in their places in Parliament, to watch it to a legitimate conclusion—or it was in itself frivolous and of small import:—either the House of Commons neglected their duty upon the second day, or made wretched waste of the nation's time upon the first. With the alternative of either conclusion before us, the result is lamentable, and only too seriously confirms the desert and propriety of the censure which our first article has directed against these coquettish and miserable displays.

But, taking the question per se, and looking at the intrinsic value of Lord Palmerston's motion, we confess that our own weighing in the balance finds it wanting—and that it cannot stand as otherwise than worthless, if not mischievous, in our regard. We are not speaking as Conservative or Whig, or with even a tolerance of party predilections in our opinion—but, testing the discussion of Tuesday by the doctrine of common sense and political prudence, we cannot discover one germ of a reason why the vexata questio of the tiresome boundary topic, should be again made the means of irritation and counter-irritation between the people of two countries, whose hands the Ashburton treaty was regarded as having closed in peace. The violent and inflammatory folly of some members of American Congress, in reference to the Oregon question, was in itself sufficiently provoking, without an endeavour, from this side of the Atlantic, to fish out of the bosom of the British Parliament any responsive choler—any expressions of pique, indignation, or disgust which might whet the vanity of the insane war party of America into fresh flights of braggadocio and absurdity. We might have been content with knowing that the policy and governments of the two countries were agreed upon the inestimable value and blessing of peace to both; and that whatever minor upstartings of imaginary difference might have frothed forth bubbles of quarrel in Brother Jonathan's land, yet that neither Sir Robert Peel nor Mr. Webster were inclined to dispel his qualification of brotherhood, or to encourage fomentings of anger which might dissolve those relations of friendship which the Ashburton treaty was, and is, most satisfactorily, calculated to confirm.

The fact is that we regarded that treaty as the settlement of a dispute of more than half a century, which had kept open the question of war—which left the plea for war in abeyance—between Great Britain and the vast power which, although it discarded her maternity, descended from her life and strength. All the commercial sense of the country saw the prudence and the policy of abolishing that contingency of war; and, so long as the concessions were not dishonourable, England, to gain the tranquillity of concord, did not vex her spirit over their amount. She only required that they should be consistent with the national dignity and power, and then she was—most wisely, we think—content to yield them as the bond of peace.

We do not say that we approve of all the details of the Ashburton treaty; we might speak of some of them perhaps in harmony with Palmerstonian opinion; but we do entirely approve of the principle upon which it was concluded, and we cannot see the wisdom of disturbing it, and disturbing the public mind also, by untimely agitation now. It is a broad national question placed on a firm and settled basis, and we would as soon think of re-opening the questions of Catholic Emancipation or Parliamentary Reform as of plunging again into its wearying labyrinth of fifty years' dispute.

The great abilities of Lord Palmerston might be better directed in the Legislature than to this end; he is the last man who should either make an impotent motion or sustain an impotent defeat; and as one of the brightest leaders of the opposition, he has enough to watch, both in the foreign and domestic policy of the empire, without wasting his sagacity over the task of summoning back into existence the vanished elements of war.

We perceive that the working of the new Poor-law in Ireland is of most alarming and disastrous operation—that it is, in fact, taking the colour of calamity and the tinge of blood. In Tipperary it seems to have produced a dreadful accumulation of the worst order of crime; in Waterford it has maddened the people, and been crowned with actual revolt. We will not, however, affirm that these dire consequences are the result of the Poor-law alone. We know that the agrarian system, the middleman-influence, the rent-levy distress and ejectment power, have all their share in the evils under which the poor of Ireland groan; but we have strong proof before us that whatever is harsh and cruel in any other practice or potency of law is aggravated by the way in which the new Poor-law is, as it were, grooved in with every oppression, and works as a sort of aide-de-camp to every misery that is produced. How much more worthily might the attention of our Legislature be turned to this important subject than to a trick of party, a question of privilege, or a topic for the unsettlement of peace.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

The Queen and Prince Albert enjoyed their accustomed early walk on Saturday morning in the royal gardens of Buckingham Palace. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent visited the Queen, and remained to lunch with her Majesty and Prince Albert, at Buckingham Palace. After minutes before three o'clock on Saturday afternoon her Majesty and Prince Albert, accompanied by the Princess Royal, left town in a carriage and four, escorted by a party of hussars, for Claremont. The royal dinner party in the evening included the Countess of Charlemont, Dowager Lady Lyttelton, Viscount Sydney, Archdeacon Wilberforce, Hon. C. A. Murray, Colonel Buckley, Sir Edward Bowater, and Dr. Pretorius.

On Sunday morning her Majesty and Prince Albert, the royal suite, and the household, attended divine service at Claremont. Archdeacon Wilberforce officiated. Her Majesty the Queen Dowager and her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent attended divine service in the Chapel Royal, St. James's. The Bishop of Oxford preached the sermon, taking his text from St. John, chap. vi. verse 66. The prayers were read by the Rev. Mr. Hinde, the lessons by the Rev. Mr. Packman, and the communion service by the Bishop of London, the Rev. Dr. Sleath, and the Rev. Mr. Packman. The anthem was, "O Lord, give ear," Greene.

TUESDAY.—The Queen and Prince Albert left Claremont for an airing after lunch, in a pony carriage, the Prince driving; Colonel Buckley, Equerry in Waiting on her Majesty, and Major-General Sir Edward Bowater, Equerry in Waiting on his Royal Highness, attending on horseback. Her Majesty and her illustrious Consort returned to Claremont, from the drive, shortly before five o'clock.

WEDNESDAY.—Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent arrived at Claremont, at two o'clock, in a carriage and four, from town, to pay a visit to the Queen. Her Royal Highness partook of a déjeûner with her Majesty and Prince Albert.

The Queen and Prince Albert left Claremont in the afternoon, in a pony phaeton, for a drive; the Equerries in Waiting (Colonel Buckley and Sir Edward Bowater) attending her Majesty and his Royal Highness on horseback.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, took her departure from Claremont at a quarter past four o'clock, on her return to town.

Her Majesty and Prince Albert, attended by the royal suite, arrived in town on Thursday from Claremont, at Buckingham Palace. The Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal accompanied their august relatives to town.

ARRIVAL OF HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS PRINCE ADALBERT OF PRUSSIA.—The Peninsular Company's steam-packet Montrose, Capt. Lewis, Commander, arrived at Southampton on Sunday morning, having on board his Royal Highness Prince Adalbert of Prussia and suite. On Monday his Royal Highness paid a visit to the Queen and Prince Albert; and on Wednesday he embarked at the Custom-house for Hamburg, en route to Berlin.

The Earl and Countess of Haddington have issued cards for an entertainment at the former, on the 5th of next month, to meet her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester.

The Duke and Duchess of Bedford, who have been visiting Viscount Melbourne at Brocket Hall, Herts, come to town this week for the season.

Among the passengers landed at Southampton from the West India packet, the Tay, were two persons of colour, styling themselves the Prince and Princess Louis Napoleon Christopie, of St. Domingo.

We are authorised to state that, in consequence of the death of the Dowager Marchioness of Northampton, the soirée of the President of the Royal Society on Saturday next will not take place.

HER MAJESTY'S LEVEES.—LORD CHAMBERLAIN'S OFFICE, March 21.—Notice is hereby given, that His Royal Highness PRINCE ALBERT will, by the desire of her Majesty, hold levees at St. James's Palace on behalf of her Majesty, on Wednesday, the 29th instant, and on Wednesday, the 26th of April next, both days at two o'clock. It is her Majesty's pleasure that presentations to his Royal Highness at these levees shall be considered equivalent to presentations to the Queen. Addresses to the Queen may either be forwarded to her Majesty through the Secretary of State for the Home Department, or may be reserved until her Majesty shall hold a levee.

RUMOURED MARRIAGES IN HIGH LIFE.—A report is very current in distinguished circles that Mr. Coutts Lindsay is at length about to bestow her hand in marriage, and Lord Wilshire, the eldest son of the Marquis of Winchester, and Colonel of a dragoon regiment, is mentioned as the favoured suitor. Lord Charles Wellesley will, we also hear, shortly lead to the altar Lady Mary Cecil, the accomplished daughter of the Marquis of Salisbury.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

The quarterly general court of proprietors of East India stock was held on Wednesday, at their house in Leadenhall-street, when the members were occupied for a length of time in discussing a question relative to the manner of the Imperial legislature. A long discussion took place on a motion made by Mr. Montgomery Martin, with regard to the duties on Indian produce, which was ultimately withdrawn.

DRURY-LANE THEATRICAL FUND.—The members and friends of the Drury-lane Theatrical Fund Society celebrated their anniversary on Wednesday evening at the Freemasons' Tavern. His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge took the chair, in the absence of the Duke of Sussex, the president of the association, and performed the duties of the office with the accustomed heartiness of his kind and generous nature. At the close of the proceedings a list of subscriptions was read by Mr. Harley, amounting, in the whole, to about £800.

A second meeting of the Anti-Corn-law League was held at Drury-lane Theatre on Wednesday evening last, when the house was again crowded by thousands of persons, whose anxiety to hear the arguments on this interesting topic was doubtless increased by the newspaper controversy which has been going on during the past week between Lord Brougham and several distinguished members of the League. Several members of Parliament took part in the proceedings, which lasted until a late hour.

THE VESTRIES' ACT.—Meetings of the vestries of the parishes of St. Marylebone and St. Pancras were held on Wednesday, at which it was agreed that, with the exception of other parishes, and the assistance of the members for the borough of Marylebone and others, the bill for the repeal or amendment of Sir J. Hobhouse's Act should be watched in Parliament with a view to oppose the measure.

On Monday last the following gentlemen took the necessary oaths and qualified on their appointment as magistrates for the county of Surrey:—John Rans, Esq., Belvedere House, Lambeth; C. M. Rossiter, Esq., Borough; Edward Scard, Esq., Kew; T. Weeding, Esq., Mecklenburgh-square.

Considerable dissatisfaction appears to exist amongst the London trade relative to the low prices at which some houses are selling manufactured goods. Statements are now made, without any reserve, that adulteration has become very prevalent, and that the system is not affording proper protection to those who are determined to act in conformity to the present law.

ELECTION COMMITTEES.—It will be seen by our Parliamentary report, that in the case of the Athlone Election Petition, the sitting member was unseated. The Nottingham Committee continued its deliberations until Thursday, when Mr. Walter, the sitting member was unseated.

FIRE IN THE METROPOLIS.—FIRE AT THE HON. LADY MURRAY'S.—On Tuesday night, about half-past eight o'clock, the greatest alarm was occasioned amongst the inmates of No. 59, Wimpole-street, Cavendish-square, the town mansion belonging to the Hon. Lady Murray, in consequence of the extensive premises being on fire. A good supply of water was obtained, and the firemen exerted themselves to endeavour to extinguish the fire by means of buckets, but in that they were unsuccessful, and were obliged, by means of pole-axes, to rip up the flooring of the parlours, and cut away the wall impiately into the adjoining mansion, and it was not until nearly half-past eleven o'clock that the fire was completely extinguished.—On Wednesday morning about two o'clock, as police-constable Chetkley, 139 D, was on duty in Connaught terrace, Edgware-road, he heard a sound like the cracking of glass, and on looking round, discovered that the front parlour of the house, No. 73, the residence of ——— Chapel, Esq., was in a blaze. Instantly alarmed the inmates, who, in a state of great terror, escaped the front door with scarcely any other clothing than their nightdresses, as they took refuge in an adjacent dwelling. The conflagration was confined to the parlour in which it originated, but a considerable portion of the furniture therein was destroyed.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

THE COURT-MARTIAL ON THE HON. CAPTAIN ELIOT, OF HER MAJESTY'S SHIP SPARTAN, took place on board her Majesty's ship Imaum, at Port Royal, on Monday the 18th of February, when the whole plan was acquitted of the serious part of the charge, but found guilty of the remainder, and the court is of opinion that the authority and the rules and regulations of the service, will be sufficiently vindicated by a mere admonition to an infringement of them, such he fully understood and upheld by merely admonishing that the prisoner be severely reprimanded, he was reprimanded accordingly

A court-martial was lately held at Portsmouth, when admonished Captain Sir C. Sullivan, of the Formidae, whom can always be relied on to be careful in future in references to the use of and arms," was reprimanded the master, Mr. J. Tonkin, on the same grounds.

COUNTRY NEWS.

BRIGHTON.—On Sunday night two of the privates of the 4th Dragoons committed most unprovoked assault on one of the Brighton policemen. The two men fell upon the policeman in the most merciless manner. Fortunately one of the sergeants of the 4th Dragoons came to the assistance of Mr. Rae, if the two offenders were lodged at the Town-hall for the night, at the regist of Colonel Dawkins. They have been given up by the civil authorities be tried by a court-martial. The men have a bad example set them by the officers, as on last Saturday evening, about the same hour, several of the officers were driving through the town with four-in-hand, and numbers of private on the coaches, armed with stones, throwing at the lamps and windows, several of which were broken. Mr. Slight, the clerk of the commissioners, is in communication with the colonel on the subject, being determined to obtain redress for the wilful destruction of the town property.

CHELTENHAM.—The manor of Cheltenham has this week undergone a change of owners—Lord Sherbourne having "signed, sealed, and delivered" the conveyance of his manorial rights and immunities, with all the privileges and prerogatives thereunto appertaining, to James Agg Gardner, Esq., who has become the purchaser thereof, for the sum of £39,000. The manor of Cheltenham had been in possession of the Sherbourne family for 225 years —John Dutton, an ancestor of the present lord, having purchased it of Charles, First of Wales, in 1618, for the sum of £1,900.

ETON.—ROBBERIES AT THE COLLEGE Several robberies of books, pencil-cases, &c. have taken place lately within this college; and a great portion of thoroughly has been traced to a man named Alfred Towers, in the employ of Mr. Goddard, plumber, at Eton. Towers having been placed in custody, was taken before the magistrates on Saturday, and afterwards fully committed for trial. He was admitted to bail—himself in £200, and two sureties in £100 each. Some of the stolen property having been traced to the possession of Mrs. Towers (the mother of the prisoner), she was sent for, and said she had no knowledge how the books and other articles were placed in her house. Eventually Mrs. Towers was bound over, herself in £50, and one rety in £20, to appear and give evidence on any occasion to answer any charge that might be made against her.

RIPON ELECTION.—The election for this borough in the room of Mr. Fredk. Bertram Lascelles took place on Saturday last. Mr. Thomas Berry Cusack Smith, her Majesty's attorney-General for Ireland, was the only candidate, and he having been finally proposed and seconded, was declared duly elected by the Mayor. Mr. Smith addressed the electors upon the occasion, and briefly, at considerable length, and with great ability, the prominent political questions of the day the corn-laws, the question of scriptural education in connection with the church, and the union of the church with the state.

IRELAND.

A Dublin correspondent, to whom we are much indebted, sends a graphic account of the and ball at Dublin Castle on St. Patrick's night, for which we regret we cant find room. We are in possession of the most convincing testimony the truth of his assurance that the historical and facetious narrative of Shandy—day which appeared in the last number of the ILLUSTRATED NEWS has achieved for that paper a character in Ireland which will ere long have effect of redoubling its already extensive circulation in the emerald isle

DISMISSAL OF MAGISTRATES.—The clerk of the peace, county of Clare, has received from the Lord Chancellor a supersedeas for Major O'Connell, M.P., Francis M'Namara, George M'Namara, and Randal Borough, Esqrs., magistrates of that county The cause of their removal arose out of the exercise of magisterial authority in cases of private quarrels, which the country peoplumed the privilege of gathering sea-weed for manure.

We regret exceedingly to perceive that the operation of Sir R. Peel's spirit duties bill has been a very powerful tendency to revive the monstrous delusion which the influence of Father Mathew, and the spread of teetotalism, had to a great extent succeded in destroying. This measure, by raising the duty, has given a stimus to smuggling, which has ever been regarded as the bane and curse of Ireland, since even in its demoralizing influence than party spirit. Frost urns recently moved for in the House of Commons by that prominent benefactor and assiduous representative of his county (whose no noisy declaime Sir Robert Ferguson, and which have been lately laid before Parliament appears—that the detections for the quarter ending 5th January, 1842, sw the enormous increase of 847; while the gaol returns in 1841 show only prisoners, and in 1842 only 53. In the present year they have increased to 2; and, at the present moment, when the total number of prisoners in the gol one of the largest counties in Ireland amounts to 76, we find by refens to returns which have been laid before Parliament, that 62 of the numb are confined for breaches of the revenue laws. It is really too bad that paltry consideration of revenue should be allowed to work all this mischief, which turns out, after all, to be wholly inoperative for the purpose for which it was intended, for it has only tended to diminish the revenue instead of to increase it.

Baron Lefroy arrived in Kilkenny on Saturday, and at once proceeded to open the commission in the city. He said he had to express his regret at the want of respect and courtesy shown to him as the bearer of her Majesty's commission. He was not attended by any of the authorities who were bound to attend him, and was left to grope his way at the discretion of his post-boys, through the city of Kilkenny, to his lodging. He should express his dissatisfaction at the conduct of the sheriffs of the city, and fine them £50. On entering the county court, the Baron made similar observations upon the county sheriff, and fined him £50.

On Saturday, James Hoskins was executed at Wicklow for the murder of John Pugh. There was a vast assemblage of the peasantry present. The wretched felon made a full confession of his guilt.

He had received several Russian, Turkish, and Egyptian orders, and was a member of several learned societies.

Towards seven o'clock on Thursday se'nnight an immense comet appeared suddenly in the horizon, and was visible at Paris. The tail, which was wide spread and perfectly marked, extended over a space of more than 60 degrees. Leaving Orion, which it crossed under an angle of 40 degrees, this magnificent tail gradually became invisible in the horizon, which was under the influence of twilight.

By a parliamentary paper just published, it appears that the amount authorised to be raised, charged in the supplies of 1843, was £18,293,000; from which deduct £165,200 paid off in money in 1842, and £25,700 old outstanding bills, leaving £18,182,300 to be provided for in the present year.——A government contract has just been announced for 100,000 gallons of rum, for the use of her Majesty's navy, one half to be West Indian. POSTSCRIPT.

Saturday Evening.

OPENING OF THE THAMES TUNNEL.—This afternoon, precisely at four o'clock, Sir I. Brunel and a party of gentlemen, preceded by a military band, performed the ceremony of opening the above magnificent, national, and truly wonderful undertaking. The tunnel was, on the occasion, filled with ladies and gentlemen, admitted by tickets, and the scene was altogether most enlivening and gratifying. Sir I. Brunel was received by the company present with every mark of approbation and admiration for his great talent and perseverance in bringing this modern wonder of the world to completion.—Our artist attended the opening, and we have confidence in stating that the illustrations of the scene will be first-rate in our next week's paper.

The Queen and Prince Albert, accompanied by the Princess Royal, arrived in town at ten minutes past five, on Thursday afternoon, from Claremont. His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales and Lady Lyttelton were in another carriage; the Countess of Charlemont and Viscount Sydney in another

On Friday her Royal Highness the Princess Sophia Matilda visited the Queen at Buckingham Palace. Her Royal Highness also visited the Duchess of Kent at her residence, Clarence House, St. James's. His Royal Highness Prince Albert presided, in the afternoon, at a meeting of the Commissioners promoting and encouraging the Fine Arts in the re-building of the Houses of Parliament; the Marquis of Lansdowne, Viscount Palmerston, Lord Ashburton, Mr. Rogers, and other commissioners attended.

His Royal Highness arrived at Gwydyr House at a quarter before three o'clock, attended by Major-General Sir Edward Bowater, Equerry in Waiting. The royal dinner party at Buckingham Palace included her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, Lady Fanny Howard, the Earl Delawarr, and Sir George Couper.

By a letter lately received from our correspondent at Rome, we learn that the sport afforded by Lord Chesterfield's fox-hounds has created a wonderful sensation there. They have had some admirable runs in the Campania: there almost all the aristocracy of Rome were assembled, either to witness or join in the chase. Lord Chesterfield has, with his usual munificence, presented the pack to the society there, and we understand that a large subscription has been raised to keep it up.

SOUTH SEA HOUSE.—On Thursday a quarterly Court of Proprietors of South Sea Stock was held at the Company's House, in Threadneedle-street, Charles Franks, Esq., the sub-governor, in the chair. The minutes of the last meeting were read and confirmed. The chairman acquainted the court that the amount of the Company's bond debt was £259,358 2s. 3d., Three per Cent.

DEAL, March 24.—The good folks of Deal and Walmer are high in hopes that the Queen and royal party will pay another visit to the Kentish coast in the summer. This hope is strengthened by the circumstance of the castle being now under the hands of numerous workmen. June is mentioned as the probable period of her Majesty's visit.

To morrow is the birth-day of Prince George of Cambridge, who completes his 9th year.

Mr. Osborne, in compliance with the wishes of the Liberal electors of Nottingham, has agreed to offer himself as a candidate for the representation of that borough.

John Pease, Esq., of Darlington, an eminent preacher in the Society of Friends, is about to visit North America on a religious mission.

SUDDEN DEATH OF AN EAST INDIA DIRECTOR.—On Friday an inquest was held before Mr. Wakley, M.P., and a jury of gentlemen, at the house, No. 1, Clarence-terrace, Regent's-park, the town mansion of the late Alexander Grimt, Esq., who died on the preceding day of the disease of the heart. Mr. Grimt was a Director of the East India House, and formerly for many years filled a high official appointment at Madras. It appeared that the deceased gentleman had recently married a lady of great personal attractions, 25 years of age, and with whom he lived on terms of the greatest affection. He continued in a good state of health up to Monday last, when he was seized with a fit, and became speedily insensible. Medical aid was promptly procured, and every effort to restore animation resorted to, but without effect. Application was made to the registrar for a certificate to bury the body, but was refused on the ground that the surgeon had certified the death to have been caused from apoplexy. The jury returned a verdict of "Natural death," from apoplexy. It is stated that the deceased has left property to the amount of £30,000.

MELANCHOLY DEATH.—It is our painful duty to record the premature death, by drowning, of Lieutenant George Frederick de Carteret, of the 30th regt., quartered at Galway. The deceased was on board Her Majesty's cutter the Raven, accompanied by some of his brother officers, and on his return by the verge of the docks, between eight and nine o'clock, he unfortunately being now under the ice broke, and, having lost his balance, tumbled over.

THAMES TUNNEL.—We have authority for stating that a paragraph, which has gone the round by the papers announcing that his Grace the Duke of Wellington would attend at the ceremony of opening the Thames Tunnel on (to morrow) Saturday next, is incorrect; as, although his Grace was invited by the directors, he declined, stating that, owing to public business, he should be prevented. We understand that the interesting ceremony will take place at four o'clock precisely on Saturday, and that afterwards, at six, the public generally will be admitted on paying a penny toll.

COACH ACCIDENT.—Late on Wednesday afternoon a most deplorable occurrence unfortunately took place near the Eastern Counties Railway station at East Brentwood, by the upsetting of the day Norwich coach, whereby the driver, Mr. James Drung (who is also a proprietor), lost his life, and the passengers who were travelling by it more or less injured.

On Thursday afternoon a warrant was issued from the Home Office, under the seal of the Secretary of State, directing the governor of the Compter to remove the monumaniac James Stevenson to Bedlam, there to be confined during her Majesty's pleasure.

Mr. Justice Coltman will open the commission at Liverpool this day. There are more than 300 prisoners for trial, and many of them are charged with grievous offences.

NORTHERN CIRCUIT.—Felix Booth, who attempted to extort money from Sir Felix Booth, by a threat of accusing him of the crime, was sentenced on Saturday last to be transported for twenty years.

THE CHARTIST TRIALS AT STAFFORD.—Owing to the long cross-examination of the witnesses by the prisoners' counsel, the case for the prosecution for and sitting of the court on Thursday evening at a late hour. The other business of the circuit has been consequently delayed.

HOUSE CIRCUIT.—Before Mr. Justice Patteson and a special jury.—HOLLAND V. HARE.—This was an action to recover damages for a libel, brought by the plaintiff, a clergyman of the Church of England, against the Rev. Mr. Hare, the archdeacon of Lewes. The declaration charged that the defendant had published a certain letter containing divers libellous charges against the plaintiff, which letter was sent to a lady named Gilbert. The damages were laid at £2000. The defendant pleaded a not guilty. Mr. Chas. Clark, and Mr. Peacock were for the plaintiff. Mr. Thesiger, Mr. Sergeant Channe l, and Mr. Ogle appeared for the defendant. Mr. Peacock having opened the pleadings, Mr. Platt addressed the jury for the defendant, and stated the case, by which it appeared that the charge made against him by the defendant was, that he was a totally unfit person to officiate as the curate of East Dean, or in any other spiritual capacity, by reason of the gross prevarication and perjury that he had committed at a former period of his life. Amongst the witnesses examined for the plaintiff was the Lord Bishop of Chichester. The jury, after an hour's deliberation, returned a verdict for the defendant.

FOREIGN.

The PARIS papers of Thursday bring the termination of the debate to the Chamber of Deputies on the preceding day on the proposition of M. Duvergier de Hauranne to abrogate the vote by ballot. There were—For the proposition, 193; Against it, 201; Majority against the motion, 8. On Thursday M. de Sade brought forward his proposition against members of the Chambers holding public functions, but there does not exist the slightest chance of its success. The election of the officers of the National Guard is proceeding favourably. Of the 189 companies represented a great many men, 149 are re-elections of old officers, and [illegible] have chosen a prominent part in the last election in favour of Republican candidates, have been re-elected by Conservatives.

SPAIN.—Rumours of changes in the Cabinet were still rifeat Madrid, notwithstanding the contradictions of the ministerial press. The editor of the Tribuno Espagnol had been acquitted. The Spanish papers are altogether destitute of news.

The Augsburg Gazette of the 19th inst. announces, that the Austrian Chargé d'Affaires at Constantinople had recently received instructions from his Court enjoining him to support the demands of Russia relative to Servia.

ALEXANDRIA, Feb 23.—Mehemet Ali has granted to an Eng [illegible]rchant a loan of 100,000 talaris for the transit between Suez and [illegible]xandria.

The Bremen Gazette of the 15th inst. contains a report from Captain J. J. Kencke, of the brig Margaret, dated the 20th October last, announcing the discovery on his voyage from the Sandwich Islands to Canton, in 14 deg. 29 m. lat. north, and 149 deg. east long., of six small islands not to be found on any chart.

REVIEW OF THE 7TH DRAGOON GUARDS AT WOOLWICH.

NEW MILITARY ACADEMY.

MILITARY INSPECTION BY THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.

On Saturday morning last, his Grace the Duke of Wellington visited Woolwich to inspect the 7th Dragoon Guards (the Princess Royal's), previously to their embarkation for the Cape of Good Hope. The hour appointed for the troops to meet on the common was twelve o'clock, and shortly before that time they took their stations, headed by the brass band and kettle-drums of the regiment. The external square was kept by the 7th and 1st Dragoons, and the colour square by a detachment of the Royal Foot Artillery.

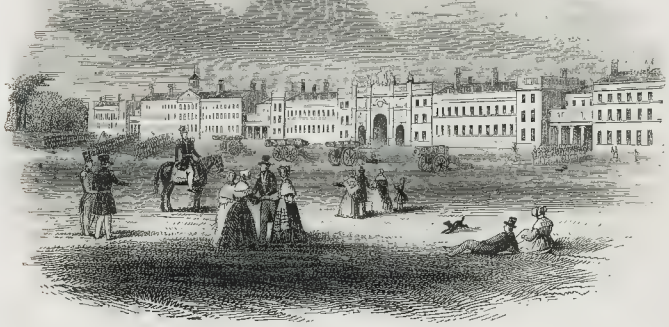
Precisely at twelve o'clock, his grace, accompanied by the Marquis of Douro and a lady, arrived in an open carriage, and was met by General Lord Bloomfield, K.C.B., commandant, Colonels E. Jones and Wylde, of the Royal Artillery, and the principal officers of the garrison, Sir G. Murray, Lord E. Somerset, and several other distinguished officers. His grace was dressed in the full uniform of a field-marshal, and wore the decorations of several orders.

The 7th Dragoon Guards formed in line, and his grace as he viewed them in parade order, was received with all honours, the band playing "God save the Queen."

After parade, the public, comprising a large concourse of persons, apparently of great respectability, were allowed to close in to the inner square, to witness the evolutions of the troops, who passed in close and open review order, and afterwards went through the sword exercise.

At the conclusion of the inspection his grace rode up to the line, and complimented the officers on the efficiency of the regiment, bidding them a fervent and soldierlike farewell. His grace returned to his carriage, accompanied by a numerous suite; and it is much to be doubted whether at any period of his career of glory he met with more spontaneous or general expressions of respect and admiration.

The square was formed of carriages, private and public, and thousands must have come from London by steam-boat, railroad, and on foot. In the evening the Duke of Wellington gave a sumptuous banquet at Apsley House to Lieut.-Colonel Kennedy, C.B. and K.H., and several officers of the 7th Dragoon Guards, Lord Bloomfield, Sir G. Murray (Master of the Ordnance), and other distinguished personages.



ARTILLERY BARRACKS.

In the engravings are seen the Artillery Barracks, a noble range of buildings, containing a library, mess-room, guard-room, and capacious chapel. The entire edifice is 400 yards in length, and 300 in depth. Behind it is a riding-school. In front is a fine parade. Next is the new military academy, also situate on the common, about a mile from the barracks; it is a handsome castellated edifice, with towers, surmounted with cupolas; it is as built from the designs of Wyatt, and is upwards of 200 yards in length. The governor is always the Master-general of the Ordnance, who has the appointment of the principal officers and of the cadets.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL CHIT CHAT

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—The beautiful ballet of "Giselle" is to be shortly reproduced here—the principal characters by Mesdemoiselles Adèle Dumilâtre and Fanny Elssler.

COVENT-GARDEN THEATRE.—This ill-fated establishment came to an unexpected close last week; and, although it has staged to keep open during the present one, it is, we fear, doomed to be ultimately shut up ere long. The public have been generally accused as deserting the "cause of the legitimate drama;" but this is mere idle "verbosity and froth:" the truth, "deep as it well may be," must be sought elsewhere.

MRS. ALFRED SHAW.—This accomplished vocalist is engaged at Drury-lane Theatre, and will appear at that house on Tuesday next with Miss Clara Novello, in an English adaptation of Paul's opera of "Sappho."

CHARLES HORN.—This popular vocalist and composer has arrived from America, laden with a rich store of interesting notices in his art, which we hope to hear produced in the course of the season.

MR. PARISH ALVARS.—It may be some consolation to those Englishmen who in vain struggle for the encouragement of native talent at home, to learn that this unrivalled harpist is "winning golden opinions" throughout the Continent; verifying the truth of the old adage that "no man is a prophet in his own country," which, we regret to say, peculiarly applies to the blighting reception given to the indigenous genius of this island on its own shores, until it has received the generous and enthusiastic sanction of our neighbours.

ROBERT SOUTHEY.

Robert Southey, the poet-laureate of England, is no more. He died at his residence at Keswick, in Cumberland, a few days past, thus bringing to a melancholy close that sad malady which his wife had so recently described with such touching eloquence and hopeless virtuous love. At the period of the general publication of that gifted woman's letter upon the condition of her beloved husband, by the press of England, we received from the Cheval. Chatelain a tributorial contribution, the insertion of which now accords, in spirit, with the sad circumstance of the poet's death.

A ROBERT SOUTHEY,

Poète Lauréat.

Dans sa prison sombre et malsaine,
Celui qui gémit dans les fers
Tristement voit doubler sa peine,
Quand la nuit couvre l'univers;
Mais pour adoucir sa souffrance,
Entre ses barreaux l'Espérance
Lui fait distinguer au réveil,
Un rayon de soleil!

Ne doit-il plus jamais illuminer ton âme
Ce rayon bienfaisant d'immortelle clarté,
Poète Lauréat, dont le cœur exalté,
En si beaux vers jadis sut épancher sa flamme ;
Lorsqu'en tes admirables chants,
Tu réhabilitais la gloire d'une femme—
De la Pucelle d'Orléans,*
Que dénigra Voltaire, en des vers outrageants,
Et que non moins injuste en sa colère,
Le grand Shakespeare immola de son temps
A la joie insensée, aux fureurs du parterre !

Chantre de Jeanne d'Arc, Southey, sublime cœur,
D'un Français, à ton tour, reçois ici l'hommage !
Pourquoi faut-il, hélas ! qu'un précoce veuvage
De ta raison...le prive à jamais du bonheur
De trouver écho dans toi-même ?
De tes beaux vers alors formant un diadème,
Dans ses brûlants transports,
Au poète, son frère, il eut dit son delire ;...
Mais aujourd'hui de douloureux accords
Voilà les seuls accords qui tombent de ta lyre !
Astre éclipsé ! Pour toi plus de beau soir,
Plus de rêves brillants par delà la campagne,
Plus de ces doux émois, derniers boutons d'espoir,
Qu'on aime à savourer auprès d'une compagne !
Pauvre insensé ! tu ne comprends
Plus rien que la souffrance, et plus ces sons touchants,
Qu'en sa prévoyance divine.
Sur toi sait déverser un ange—Caroline !
Le soleil qui s'éteint a du moins son réveil,
Mais de notre raison quand la vive lumière
S'éclipse avant la fin d'une longue carrière,
Nous tombons pour jamais dans la nuit du sommeil !
Sans ce flambeau divin ici bas, qu'est la vie ?
Un objet sans réalité—
Une ombre dans l'obscurité !
Poète au noble cœur, pars, ta tâche est finie ;
Heureux de profiter des fruits de ton génie,
Nous léguerons ton nom à la postérité !
Southey pare, monte aux cieux, monte—Dieu te convie
A l'immortalité !

Le Chevalier de Chatelain.

* We do but repeat here an opinion to which we gave expression in a work entitled "Galerie des Femmes de Shakespeare," published in Paris in 1837, and from which we subjoin the following extract :—"We are delighted to have found in an English poet, Robert Southey, a generous champion of the Maid of Orleans."

ANNIVERSARIES.

BALLAD OF THE CROWNING OF THE BRUCE.

(27TH MARCH, 1306.)

The Earl of Gloucester, a kinsman of Bruce, had notice of his friend's danger, and anxious to save him, yet afraid in so serious a matter, too rashly to compromise his own safety, sent him a piece of money and a pair of golden spurs. Bruce understood the counsel thus symbolically communicated, and instantly set out for Scotland, accompanied by his Secretary and a single attendant. He is said to have reached Lochmaben Castle on the fifth day after his departure from London, and thence repairing to Dumfries, where Comyn was, he sought a private interview with him. From some inward misgiving, no doubt on the part of Comyn, the meeting took place in the convent of the Minorite friars. Here Bruce passionately reproached Comyn for his treachery, and after some altercation drew his dagger and stabbed him to the heart. Immediately hastening from the spot he called for his attendants, who seeing him pale and agitated inquired the cause. "I doubt I have slain Comyn," was the reply "You doubt," cried Kirkpatrick fiercely, "I'se mak' sicker," and rushing towards Comyn, despatched him on the spot. Almost at the same moment Sir Robert Comyn, the uncle, who came into the convent on the noise of the scuffle, shared a similar fate. The alarm soon became general, and the English judges, then holding a court in a hall of the castle, not knowing the extent of the danger, hastily barricaded the doors. Bruce, assembling his followers, surrounded the castle, and, threatening to force their entrance by fire, compelled those within to surrender. He soon afterwards proceeded to Scone, the ancient seat of Scottish inauguration, and was there crowned King of Scots, on the 27th March, 1306. Edward had carried the regalia to Westminster, but their place was soon supplied. The Bishop of Glasgow furnished from his own stores the robes in which Bruce was arrayed; and a slight coronet of gold being got from the nearest artist, the Bishop of St. Andrew's set it on his head. The Bishop of Glasgow also presented to the new king a banner wrought with the arms of Baliol, which he had concealed in his treasury, and under it Robert received the homage of those who devoted themselves to his service. The Earls of Fife had, from a remote antiquity, enjoyed the privilege of crowning the Kings of Scotland; but Duncan, the representative of the family, favouring at this time the English interest, his sister, the Countess of Buchan, with a boldness and enthusiasm which must have added to the popular interest felt for the young king, repaired to Scone, and asserting the privilege of her ancestors, placed the crown a second time on the head of Bruce. The eyes of all Scotland were now directed towards Bruce. Comyn was no more; and the brave Sir William Wallace had been executed by the English. Bruce was therefore without a rival; he was the heir to the throne, and his past conduct had given ample earnest at once of his intrepidity and prudence; he was regarded as the last remaining hope of his country.

CROWNING OF BRUCE.

There is come to the Bruce from Edward's Court,
From a kinsman true and bold,
A rowell'd pair of gilded spurs,
With a money coin in gold ;
And the spurs say—"Fly ! brook no delay,"
And the coin—"Use gold to speed the way."

The Bruce is gone, and the storm-bird's wing
Had never a swifter flight ;
In five short days, to the Scots amaze,
He is threading Lochmaben's height ;
And one other dash on his king-path sees
The Bruce in the city of fair Dumfries !

He has flashed on the craven Comyn's gaze,
By the Minorite Convent-gate,
One deep reproach, one gurgling threat,
One glance of deadly hate ;
And the sheath-freed dagger is gleaming red
In the burning blood of a traitor dead !

The startled court of the ermined judge
Is earthquaked with the din—
"Bruce ! Bruce !" fills the people's voice without,
And its echo rolls within !

And the long-robed English lawyers fall
To their fortress work in the castle-hall !

But a threat has broken their barriers all,
And their courts are overthrown !
With one more whirl of his lightning speed,
The Bruce is palaced at Scone !
And now it is Scotland's pride to sing
How royally ever she crowns him king !

St. Andrew's mitred lord has placed
On his head the light gold band,
And the Baliol-broidered flag is waved
By the Glasgow bishop's hand ;
While under its bannered pomp men bring
The homage of nobles to Bruce their king !

Then a glorious woman, wond'rous fair,
Steps out from the brilliant train,
And is dazzling all with her beauty rare,
While she crowns the Bruce again !
May he not call the battle his own,
When an angel leads him to Scotland's throne !

THE COMET.

GRAND METEORIC PHENOMENON.—THE COMET.

The public have this week been surprised by various announcements, on high authority, that a monstre comet was to be seen bestriding the western heavens. The first to give a detailed notice of the appearance of this meteoric phenomenon in this country was the celebrated astronomer Sir J. Herschel, who described it as a comet of enormous magnitude being in the course of its progress through our system, and, at present, not far from its perihelion. Its tail was conspicuously visible on Sunday night and the night before, as a vivid luminous streak, commencing close beneath the stars kappa and lambda (κ and λ) Leporis, and thence stretching obliquely westwards and downwards, between gamma and delta (γ and δ) Eridani, till lost in the vapours of the horizon. The direction of it, prolonged on a celestial globe, passes precisely through the place of the sun in the ecliptic at the present time, a circumstance which appears conclusive as to its cometic nature. The astronomer goes on to say that as the portion of the tail actually visible on Friday se'nnight was fully 30 degrees in length, and the head must have been beneath the horizon, which would add at least 25 degrees to the length, it is evident that, if really a comet, it is one of first-rate magnitude; and if it be not one, it is some phenomenon beyond the earth's atmosphere of a nature even yet more remarkable.

On the 19th the tail of the comet was again visible, though much obscured by haze, and holding very nearly the same position!

This was accompanied by several statements from the French papers, and numerous correspondents at home, all agreeing that a comet of magnificent dimensions was on that and the succeeding nights visible.

The appearance of the phenomenon, as it presented itself to our artist on Friday se'nnight, at Blackheath, was beautiful in the extreme. An atmosphere so clear and bright prevailed, that the sun, divested of his golden beams, reposed in silver. The smoke of London, unused to so pure and rare an atmosphere, lay upon the city in a dense compact stratum, with its upper surface distinctly marked, at about the height of St. Paul's, by an unsoftened, ruddy, horizontal line; while the plains of Kent and Surrey, to the left, and Essex on the east, were so free from any kind of vapour, that they lost their accustomed look of distance. The scene in the park was glorious; its stately walks seemed to be illuminated by a clear morning sun, rather than by one then sinking westward of the metropolis. The chastity of a moonlight night was mingled with the splendour of a summer's noon; the twilight was consequently short, and the heavens blacker than usual.

In this state of the atmosphere, on reaching the heath, there appeared, west by south, a vast shaft of light, radiating apparently from the sunken sun in the manner of one of his beams, or like one of the vaulting sashes of the northern lights. We concluded (says our informant) that the phenomenon before us was the Zodiacal light or a modification of it. In that impression we continued to watch it till about half past 9 o'clock, when our conjecture of its nature seemed to be confirmed by its slowly melting from view. Its appearance and position is so correctly described by Sir J. Herschel, that we need not repeat them here; but a glance at our picture, which we sketched on the spot, will make perhaps his technical references a little more intelligible to the unprofessional reader. We cannot learn that this precise phenomenon has since been witnessed. A slight milkiness of colour in the western horizon, sometimes in streaks, and at others of a more floccose and diffused character, is all that we have seen or heard of.

On Wednesday Sir James South published the following description of the comet and its eccentric movements, as seen by him from the Observatory at Kensington:—"The brilliant train of light was seen here on Friday evening at a little after seven, and had very much the appearance of the tail of the comet of 1811. Its highest point, when I first saw it, nearly reached theta Leporis, and, passing through the constellation Eridanus, became invisible to me from interposed trees when about 2 degrees from the horizon. More than 45 degrees of tail were measurable; stars of the fifth magnitude were visible through it by the naked eye, and with a 42-inch achromatic of 2⅔ inches aperture, those even of the 8th were perceptible. At 7h. 33m. 22sec. (sidereal time), a bright meteor issued from the very tip of the tail. No trace of the above light could be detected here either Saturday, Sunday, or Monday nights, in consequence of cloudy weather. Last evening, at about ten minutes before eight, the clouds cleared away, but no vestige of the train could be perceived in the neighbourhood which it had illumined on Friday night; but a diffused and amorphous light, commencing at the Pleiades and spreading over the entire constellation Aries, even through the haze, was too conspicuous to escape observation. If this be the tail of the comet, it indicates a very rapid motion of it northward. By a letter which I received yesterday from Mr. Shorts, of Christchurch, Hampshire, he has seen it earlier than any one I have yet heard of, inasmuch as he observed it three nights previous to the date of his letter, which is the 19th inst.; hence, he saw it Tuursday, Friday, and Saturday."

It will be seen that we incline to the opinion that "the comet" is indebted for its name to the enthusiasm which its novelty and splendour, coupled with old astronomic associations, at first sight produced; and that it is "some phenomenon beyond the earth's atmosphere of a nature even yet more remarkable." The question is one that can only be determined by future observation, and we shall give it our best attention.

Letters have been since received from various parts of the Continent, giving almost similar accounts of the appearance of this wonderful phenomenon, and amongst the rest, from Mr. Cooper, late M.P. for Sligo, now at Nice. Our readers must judge and observe for themselves.

HYMN,
ON THE OCCASION OF THE PRESENT ASTRONOMICAL VISITATION.

How beautiful is all this visible world!
How glorious in its actions and itself!—BYRON's Manfred.

If there be aught throughout the pearly deep
Of Heav'n's unfathomable ocean wide,
That doth affect man's soul
With wonder and delight
Beyond the rest of vast creation's wealth,
'Tis THOU, mysterious star!

Thou comest whence no mortal seer can know—
Thou goest whither nothing human dreams—
Thy mission, tho' so bright
Is Speculation's gloom!
We can but gaze upon the starry dust*
Thy lightning wheels upturn

Along Heav'n's road, and call thee charioteer,
Or names which prove that man cannot baptize
Such giant births as thou
With aught descriptive term!
Comet, or fiery star, or feeding light
To myriad viewless suns,

Which trim their lamps at the renewing fount!
Or art thou some watch-angel on his rounds,
To see it drowsy guards
Neglect the camp'of Heav'n,
And leave an outpost for the Fiend to pass
As once of old he did?

Thou mayst be, Light incomprehensible!
A moral messenger enjoin'd to check
Our mind's poor vanity,
That doth imagine all
The secrets of the firmament are found!—
We can't unravel THEE!

Roll on, thou child of wedded time and space,
Eccentric offspring of eternal pow'r,—
Be thy portent to us
Or good or ill, the same—
We'll pay thee symbol worship for thy cause,
And in submission bow.

* An epithet of Plato's bestowed upon the Via Lactea.

Com'st thou in anger, we will not repine—
Com'st thou in harmless beauty, we'll adore,
And through thee bless the ONE
Who by his simple word
Can call creations like to thine from nought,
And end them all again!—

Beautiful—lustrous as the heav'ns can be
On vernal nights with their commission'd stars,
How much more do they seem,
When unaccustom'd lights,
Like thine shoot forth from out the sapphire throne of THE HAT ONE sits!—W.

THE FASHIONS.

PARIS, Rue Chaussée d'Antin, March 21, 1843.

Mon cher Monsieur,—Though our carnival is long since passed, it does not seem to have had much influence upon our gaities; as for many years past it has been customary to continue to open our saloons until the middle of April, and consequently ball toilettes are still as much in requisition as ever. Of this description of dress I have lately seen many specimens of surpassing beauty; amongst others, several whose elegance and novelty, at least, entitle them to favourable mention. One of them was a robe of green moiré, open on each side of the skirt from the bottom to the height of the knee; this opening was trimmed with a piece of English lace laid flat, and fixed on the under petticoat by little quillings of green satin. The under petticoat of white satin is thus left exposed to view in the intervals between these quillings. The corsage, which is pointed, is very low on the neck, and is trimmed with a double frilling of English lace. The sleeves are made very short, are trimmed with puffing, and with bands of narrow lace. The second dress was a rose white and a double skirt, the first of which was of white satin, trimmed with two borders of English lace; the other, which was a good deal shorter, was of rose satin, descending from the edge of the upper border of lace, and relieved on the left side by a knot of ribbons in rose-coloured satin and lace. Another costume consisted of a robe of white satin, with a double skirt bordered completely round by a garland, executed in yellow silk and silver, and having also a fringe of the same material and colour; the second skirt was open in front, embroidered and bordered like the upper one; the corsage, which was worn very low on the neck, was brought to a point, and had a little pelerine, which formed a berthe, which was likewise embroidered in yellow and silver, and edged with a fringe. A fourth dress, which struck our fancy exceedingly from its elegance and good taste, was a robe in crape, shot blue and white, with a double skirt, of which the second, which was very short, was sustained on one side by a knot in blue satin riband. The corsage was made low on the neck, with the pelerine forming a berthe, and covering the little sleeves of the dress completely. There was still another costume in jonquil yellow mohair, trimmed with a band of gimp covering half the hem in front, and with the two upper parts also in gimp: little rosettes of blue satin are disposed lozenge fashion upon the gimp ornaments. The corsage was flat, pointed slightly, covering the shoulders, and the sleeves short. The greater part of these dresses, as will be seen by your fair readers, would admit equally well of the employment of bouquets and garlands as ornaments on the corsage and the skirt, and, when these are well made and natural, I am not sure that their employment would not be a material improvement upon the style of the dress. As ball-room coiffures the most common consistent with elegance are Arab turbans in blue cashmere, embroidered in gold and silver crowns of blue flowers, which harmonise well with a head-dress whereon are thrown a few bows of lace, iris plumes, and birds of paradise. In reality there is nothing very new this week in head-dresses beyond those I have already described, if I except some Arab turbans in white cashmere, embroidered in red silk, the crown of the turban terminating in a point, and ornamented with a silver tassel falling down behind. The barbes, which are in embroidered cashmere, trimmed with silver fringe, are placed somewhat on the left side of the head. The effect of this head-dress, however, was as remarkable as it was handsome.

HENRIETTE DE B.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

SONNETS.

SUPPOSED TO HAVE BEEN WRITTEN BY CERVANTES DURING HIS CAPTIVITY IN BARBARY.

Thou pale and melancholy ray, which through
My jealous Moorish dungeon bars dost peep,
Where my sad mates in short oblivion sleep,
Wouldst thou, the lonely one that waketh, view
And mock him with the thought that thou dost strew
The vallies of his Father-land afar
With pearls of light, on which young lovers tread,
Careless of crushing them, at this lone hour?
Say, dost thou come in anger, sullen star,
To wreak their slight upon a captive's head,
And make his cell at once their heedless bow'r?
The sky is blue—there is no cloud to low'r.
Why gleam'st thou then with such a sickly light?
It pours fresh sorrow on my sleepless night.

Or dost thou come, as Dian did of old,
To wake a new Endymion from his trance?
Again I look upon thee—and behold!
I find thou'rt regent of the blue expanse,
As full of gentle beauty as e'er sent
The outshone stars back to their firmament.
Oh! thou art then, sweet moon, a messenger
From out the deep infinity of Heav'n,
To the sad victim of a long despair;
Saying, at length, his fault will be forgiv'n,
If fault it be to prize his creed and land
Beyond the Moslem's tempting splendour here.
Thou'rt looking now as pityingly bland,
As when thy smile doth kiss the night-flow'r's tear.

Turn then, Astarte! with thy gentlest light,
To some regretted Andalusian shades,
Where I have wander'd many a summer night
With one of Beauty's most celestial maids;
And tell her tears, there mingling with the dews,
That they're but harbingers of goodly morrow;
That, though I'm captive, they must not refuse
To let bright Hope beguile their lovelorn sorrow!
Then if she smile—oh! let the sweet reflex
By thee, kind mirror! here to me be sent,
And our fond eyes will meet in thy apex,
Wide as the angle he whose base hath rent
Two hearts asunder that by nature were
More doom'd to die of love than of despair!

Tell her, to soothe her, though her hero lie
Herded in dungeon with a base-born crew,
That visions of bright fame salute his eye!
His mind is free, and to the farthest blue
Of Fancy's firmament it wanders on,
Fabling enchantments which the world ne'er knew,
But which shall live until that world be gone!
The bay, to shield him from Time's lightning," yet
Has not put forth her verdant chaplet's bloom;
But Fate has will'd—and when does Fate forget?—
That e'en grim Death shall wreath it round his tomb!
Here, too, he shall not die: where first we met
Has been the cradle of his infant sighs,
And there alike his monument shall rise! W.

MUSIC.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The first concert, for the season, of this society for the encouragement and patronage of the musical art in this country, took place on Monday evening last at the Hanover-square Rooms; the vocalists, Miss Birch, Miss M. B. Hawes (nee Mrs Alfred Shaw, who was indisposed), and Mr. H. Phillips: the instrumental solo performers M. Pilet (violincello), and M. Deloffre (violin), both débutants in this country. The programme, which we subjoin, contained some excellent selections.

ACT I.

Overture, Euryanthe..... Weber.
Tercetto, Miss Birch, Miss M. B. Hawes, and Mr. Phillips,
"L' usato ardir."..... Rossini.
Fantasia, violincello, M. Pilet..... Pilet.
Rec. and Air, Mr. Phiilips, "Oh! what is man?" ("The Fall of Babylon").. ..... Spohr.
Scena, Miss Birch, "See Griseida," with violin obligato, Mr. Loder. Paer.
Sinfonia, G minor. . ..... Mozart.

ACT II.

Sinfonia in D..... Beethoven.
Aria, Miss M. B. Hawes, "O salutaris."... .. .. Cherubini.
Concerto, violin, M. Deloffre. . ..... Deoffre.
Duet, Miss Birch and Miss M. B. Hawes, "Vaghe colle" ("Il Ratto di Proserpina" . . .. Winter.
Overture, Calypso. ..... Winter.

Weber's overture was beautifully executed under the most judicious leadership of Mr. Loder, whose office after all, particularly in instrumental music, is more attended to by a band than any conductor's seated at the pianoforte. Rossini's Terzetto was very charmingly sung, but it suits the stage more than the concert-room. A fantasia on the violoncello next followed, which exhibited the powers of a Mons. Pilet in a very pleasing, if not very striking, point of view: his style is chaste, but his tone (and full rich tone on this beautiful instrument is a sine qua non) cannot be compared to that of many others, much less to our great Lindley's. Mr. Phillips sang Spohr's rec. and air with his accustomed correctness, and, we may add, coldness: we cannot help imagining what Bartleman would have made of it. Miss Birch is most decidedly and rapidly improving, particularly in her enunciation, which, especially in the recitative of Paer's scena, was admirable in the extreme. The violin obligato to the aria was finely executed by Mr. Loder. The first act terminated with Mozart's Sinfonia in G minor, and was performed with great precision and effect. Beethoven's Sinfonia in D opened the second act, and had similar justice rendered to it; but it is not one of that great man's masterpieces—his wild fancy and daring originality had not sufficiently developed themselves at the period of its composition. Nevertheless, it occasionally throws out scintillations of the volcanic fire which his genius poured forth so magnificently in subsequent works.† M. Deloffre played a concerto of his own composition on the violin, in which he displayed moré ability as a performer than a composer, although in each capacity he is far above mediocrity. But a new aspirant to the laurels of that generally ingrate instrument has a vast number of invidious associations to remove before he can supersede rivalry, or universally be permitted to take his stand on his own merits—which, again, must be transcendent indeed to prevent us making any concrasts to his injury. Winter's charming duet from "Il Ratto di Proserpina" was deliciously sung: the voices of the two cantratrices being eminently qualified to give proper effect to the purely vocal and graceful music of a composer who was one of the greatest ornaments of the German-Italian school—a genius, who happily combined the solidity of the architectural design of the one with all the florid elegance of the other, and whose name should never be omitted from any programme professing to be a selection from "the works of immortal men." The overture to "Calypso," by the same composer, finished a delightful evening's enjoyment.—His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge occupied the centre box.

* As thunder nor fierce lightning harms the bay,
So no extremitie hath power on fame!
Bodenham's "Belvedere, or the Garden of the Muses."
In the old play of "The White Devil," Cornelia says:—
Reach the bays;
I'll tie a garland here about his head—
'Twill keep my boy from lightning!

* Miss M. B. Hawes gave Cherubini's "O salutaris" with great purity and solemnity of style. It is a morceau particularly well adapted to her powers.

LITERATURE.

SPRING FLOWERS. A Collection of Poems. By THOMAS WILLIAM NEWTON. Charles Haselden.

This is a volume of poems, in the style which Mrs. Hemans, and the writers of her school, have rendered so popular. The pieces are short, smoothly versified, and marked by sentiment, which, if it possesses no great depth, is sweet and fanciful, and is the index of a good heart and a rightly-constituted, if not a very strong or highly-gifted mind. They have been produced, we understand, under circumstances of peculiar difficulty, in the interval of repose from a close and absorbing occupation. This feature gives them peculiar interest in our eyes, and we shall be happy to meet the author again, and to recoguise, in his future attempts, more confirmed fervour of feeling, and richer variety of illustration, conjoined perhaps with more arduous themes.

LA BIENFAISANCE. Poème par le Chevalier CHATELAIN. Au Profit des Infortunés secourus par la Société de Bienfaisance, établie à Londres en Mars, 1842.

When we last had the pleasure of a public meeting with the Chevalier Chatelain, he sang the praises of the victors in the late Asiatic wars, and the lustre of the honours of the civic magistracy, in his "Glorieuses;" he now tunes his lyre to a more tender and homely subject, and appears, if we may so express ourselves, as the high-priest of Charity, soliciting the bounty of the wealthy for their less fortunate brethren. This is an ode on the beauties of beneficence, written on the model of the old French lyric poets. There is a manliness in the sentiments, and an artistical skill in the construction of the verse, and the arrangements of the parts, which reflect great credit on the author. He celebrates the establishment of the society lately founded by French residents in London for the relief of their distressed countrymen here, and awards due praise to all who have taken an active part in forwarding the objects of the society. The profits of this publication are to be devoted to aid the funds of the society. We have therefore increased pleasure in recommending the poem to all who take an interest in French literature, as they will by purchasing it obtain two pleasures, that of contributing to support a laudable and humane institution, as well as that of reading a justly-conceived and elegantly-written French ode.

THE YEAR-BOOK OF FACTS IN SCIENCE AND ART; exhibiting the most important Discoveries and Improvements of the past Year. Illustrated with engravings. Tilt and Bogue.

A most useful manual, furnishing a record of the progress of science in mechanics and the useful arts, natural philosophy, chemistry, zoology and botany, geology and meteorology. It is carefully compiled from the transactions of scientific societies, the reports of scientific and other journals, and offers, from the best sources available, a condensed and popular view of the most remarkable facts and phenomena brought to light or investigated during the year. Presenting much information in a short compass, it saves much trouble and labour to the general inquirer, for whose use it is intended.

THE HAND-BOOK OF NEEDLEWORK; being a complete Guide to every Kind of decorative Needlework, Crochet, Knitting, and Netting, with a brief historical Account of each Art. By Miss Lambert. With illustrative engravings on wood. John Murray.

This elegantly printed volume contains a complete encyclopædia of information for the fair votaries of the needle. The various mysteries of tapestry-work, embroidery-work, plain-work, net-work, and so forth, are fully laid open, with a clearness of statement and completeness of direction which leave nothing to desire. A short history of the art is also given, with notices of celebrated persons who have cultivated it successfully. It seems by far the most complete and satisfactory manual of instruction we have met on the subject, although we cannot boast of speaking with the practical experience of adepts. The taste for ornamental needlework has singularly revived within the last few years among the middle and upper classes, and ought by all means to be encouraged; it affords the means of innocent and useful occupation, and its pursuit in such circles will not interfere with the employment of females in an humbler rank, who are dependant for their bread on the plainer kinds of needlework. We recommend this volume, therefore, to the patronage of our fair readers, and will take leave with a stave of old Taylor, the water poet :—

> The needle's work hath still bin in regard,
> For it doth art so like to nature frame,
> As if it were her sister, or the same.
> Flowers, plants and fishes, beasts, birds, flies, and bees,
> Hills, dales, plaines, pastures, skies, seas, rivers, trees—
> There's nothing near at hand, or farthest sought,
> But with the needle may be shap'd and wrought.

MEMOIRS OF A GRIFFIN; or, a Cadet's First Year in India. By Captain BELLEW. Illustrated from designs by the Author. 2 vols. Allen and Co.

Memoirs of a griffin! some uninitiated reader may exclaim. What is a griffin? Can a wyvern play the chronicler, and wield the pen with the same facility as he manœuvres his forked tongue or his armed paw? For the benefit of such interrogants we may say that there are two species of the genus griffin, and that in the Oriental sense of the term, which is what we are now to consider, he is neither a Gorgon, nor a Hydra, nor a hippogriff, nor a monoceros, nor a mastodon, nor any other of the tribe of monsters, but simply a greenhorn. So our "most sweet monster" does not present himself in the shape of a fiery dragon, vomiting forth flames and smoke, or like him of Wandsworth, all issuing off barns, and dining on parish churches, but in the form of a mincing and delicate youth of 16 or 17, fresh from school, and not very long out of the nursery, sent out to British India to launch on the great ocean of life, and encounter the toils of the civil, or the dangers of the military service in our Eastern possessions.

It may be supposed that the ideas of a griffin receive no slight shock from the contrast of the new and entirely unthought-of scene into the midst of which he finds himself thrown on his arrival at Madras or Calcutta. From the protection and the comforts of his paternal hearth, from the congenial studies and innocent sports of boyhood, passed in the green fields and wooded dales of England, he is transferred to a country where every thing wears a strange, uncouth, and often repulsive aspect; a land of burning suns and pestilential airs, which dry up the blood, and unnerve the arm of the strong man; a land of benighted idolaters, where human sacrifices are offered up to hideous gods, where robbers and murderers are organized into a caste, where the tiger and rhinoceros prowl in the dreary jungles, and sharks and alligators haunt the floods. The result is, if not a total subversion, yet a direful confusion in the Griffin's mind; and the numberless blunders and misunderstandings into which he is betrayed furnish, it may be imagined, ample food for the lovers of the hideous, until, the yearlong period of probation having passed, when he is supposed to have become rather more familiarised with the nature of the country and the manners of the people, he shakes off his griffin's hide or hood, and emerges a full-fledged Indian.

The object of the present work is to describe the career of a Griffin during his first year's residence in India, in a narrative in which the author states that he has blended fact and fiction. This plan has considerable advantages. Supposing the author's judgment not to be warped by prejudice or other sinister influence, of which no trace appears, it allows him, in the progress of the narrative, to give us the general result of his experience of Indian life and society, and diversify his account of a limited portion of time by introducing the various prominent types of Anglo-Indian character. The execution is on the whole successful, and the book gives an amusing picture of the Griffin's reception, adventures, and mishaps, with a distinct view of Indian life in the Presidencies, at the seats of government, at the military stations, on the huntinggrounds, and on the plantation, as it existed five-and-twenty years ago. Men, manners, and things in general, as the author remarks, have no doubt undergone some changes since that period; still, in its main features, the sketch he has drawn will apply as well to Griffins in the present mature age of the century as when it was in its teens. Society does not go a-head in India at the same rapid rate as in England: the nature of the climate and the country, with the habits of the Hindoos, will for ever prevent that. There is probably less idleness, revelry, and dissipation among Europeans at the present time, less coarseness and selfishness of character, with a livelier and more general sense of the duties imposed on individuals, both in the camp and the city.

Bating a few faults of taste—a proneness to sentimentalism, and to making bad jokes, from which few of our military writers seem to be free—the style of the work is agreeable. There is too free a use of Indian terms a fault common to almost all who write on Oriental subjects. The following adventure with an alligator is well told :—

> "In the little patch of grass meadow I have mentioned, which lay nearly opposite to us, two or three miserable stunted white cattle were feeding, one of them considerably nearer the margin than the others. Whilst looking towards them, I thought I discerned something dark slowly emerging from the water where the muddy shelving shore dipped into it. I kept my eye steadily fixed upon the object, which evidently moved and presented to my view the resemblance of two large foot-balls at the end of a rough log of wood. I directed my companion's attention to it, at the same time asking him what it was. 'There, yonder,' said I, 'just beyond the tuft of reeds. See! see! it moves.' 'Oh, I perceive the rascal,' said he, 'it's a huge alligator, making a point at that poor beast of a cow; but I'll spoil his sport. Bearah bundook laou jeldee! bring up the rifle quickly.' Ere gun, however, could be brought, the monster, as if anticipating our intentions, suddenly rushed his consistent, with a rapid and wriggling motion, and in an instant had the unsuspecting cow by the nose. The poor brute struggled, her tail crooked with agony, her two fore-feet stuck out, and bellowing most lustily, whilst the alligator backed rapidly towards the water, dragging the cow along with him. 'Quick! quick!' shouted Augustus, as the servant blundered along, capsizing a bucket or two in his hurry, and handed up the gun. 'Click,' went the lock—the rifle was pointed, but it was too late: the scaly monster sunk with his prey, as the bullet cracked sharply over the eddy; a few bubbles and a slight curl on the water were now marking the spot where the poor cow had disappeared in a doleful tragedy—her last appearance in public."

NEW MUSIC.

A CONCERTO FOR THE ORGAN, with Accompaniments (in score) for two violins (where's the viola?), violoncello, trumpets, drums, and contra basso; composed by Haydn Wilson, Professor of the Organ and Pianoforte. Published for the author.

On perusing the title-page of this composition, it was with considerable pleasure that we perceived there was somebody bold enough in this country to sit down and write—moreover, publish, a work exclusively devoted to the most magnificent of instruments; an instrument that, if we are to credit history, was first suggested to the knowledge of counterpoint, and yet irreconcileable, from its peculiar fitness for the most elaborate displays of that art, with any chance invention of ignorance or accident. The facilities which it affords to limitless combination of harmonical structures were as free at the seasons on its first appearance as they are now; for the organ has remained, in bass, the most unchanged of all instruments, and, unlike every other, if it have undergone any trifling mutation, it has been only to deprive it of powers whose objects of expression have sunk into desuetude in the lapse of ages. Altogether the ORGAN is a puzzle to those who, on the one hand, would trace the discovery of harmony to a date comparatively recent, and yet, on the other, are at a loss to understand how it could have been invented at a time when its constructors could not have been aware of the very practical principles which that said discovery was grounded upon, and which, by it, could be so eloquently and most satisfactorily explained. Be this as it may, it is universally allowed to be the noblest of instruments, and none but hierarchs of of the most undoubted gradation should presume to lay their hands upon its sanctuary.

The first movement of Mr. Haydn Wilson's concerto is not written in the genius of the organ; it abounds in passages that were en vogue in the infancy of pianoforte playing, and which, whatever he may think, are as unfit for the gravity of Minerva's loom-mate (by the way, an old name for that goddess was Organé) as the graziosa strains for Tagioni or Dumilâtre would be for the more grave and impressive pas of Mdlle. Djeck, of late elephantine celebrity. The andante affettuoso is a restless thing—always trying to arrive as soon as it can to a close in the tonic (F), which it industriously effects half a dozen times in the space of two pages and a half. Then follows an allegro for the full organ, which promises something of fugue, but which promise is never realised. At page 17, stave 3, a subject of fugue is given out, and answered antichronically for twenty bars, and then left off, upon an inversion too, and totally lost sight of till he arrives at a pause (always dominant to C), which seems to be to Mr. Wilson what his mother-earth was to Antæus—he always gathers new vigour, and "straight he's at it again." Though there are some fortunate weds to modulation in this movement, it never virtually departs from the key of C; there is nothing peculiar to the fugue style—no augmentation—no diminution—no inversion, prolation, or new subject interwoven; in fact, nothing to show that the writer ever saw (or if he saw, understood) the fugues of Handel, Bach, Scarlatti, Albrtsberger, Hinberger, Marpurg, Rink, and a hundred others, of our own country, too. The passage at page 26, staves 3, 4, and 5, are a bad mutilation of a beautiful thought in his namesake Haydn's "Heavens are telling." Altogether, we cannot commend this production.

TAYMOUTH CASTLE QUADRILLES. 1st set. By H. Oakey. H. Tolkien.

This set is composed upon several well-known Scottish airs, which suffer nothing under the skilful treatment of Mr. Oakey. It may be had also in the shape of duets for the pianoforte, nicely and effectively arranged for the instrument by the same hand.

HOLYROOD PALACE WALTZES, composed by T. L. Rowbotham. H. Tolkien.

He certainly must evince considerable invention who discovers anything new in the shape of a waltz: graceful melody and correct arrangement, as we frequently have occasion to remark, are all that can be looked for in this threadbare style of writing. We are happy to say these qualifications are eminently possessed by Mr., Mme., or Mlle. Rowbotham (for how are we to judge from initials?). Waltz 3 pleases us most, as possessing more breadth and freedom. No. 4 is pretty à la Strauss, and No. 5 introduces to us our old friend "The Blue Bells of Scotland," with a change rung upon them to fit them pour la danse. A coda in the usual way winds up this very agreeable set, which no doubt will be popular through the season.

PHOTOGRAPHIC PORTRAITS IN COLOUR.—Yesterday we had an opportunity of witnessing this new and important discovery, and truly glad are we in being able to say, the great objection to this method of producing portraits is at length removed; hitherto the portraits of aged persons only were really striking, their peculiar expression depending less upon colour than upon light and shade. Now may be seen at 7, Regent's-quadrant, establishments, portraits, striking as life, of young and old, each exhibiting the peculiar complexion of age and health, and which alone was necessary to render this wonderful process equal to the original idea of its still more wonderful discoverer, Mons. Daguerre, that of permanently fixing upon the face of a mirror the colour and character of its reflected object.

EARTHQUAKE IN THE NORTH OF ENGLAND.—We are happy to say that at the latest accounts from the north of England and the Isle of Man confirm the gratifying intelligence that the shock of the earthquake felt in these places on Friday se'nnight produced no more disastrous results than the destruction of a gas and other brittle ware.

ASSIZE INTELLIGENCE.

MIDLAND CIRCUIT.—DERBY, March 20.

(Before Mr. Baron Gurney.)

BURGLARY AND MURDER.—Samuel Bonsall, aged 26, William Bland, 39, and John Hulme, 24, were charged with having, on the 30th of September last, at the township of Stanley, feloniously, wilfully, and of their malice aforethought, killed and murdered one Martha Goddard. Mr. Serjeant Clarke, Mr. Whitehurst, and Mr. Fowler conducted the prosecution; Mr. Millar defended the prisoner Bonsall. The case excited intense interest. From an early hour every avenue to the court was thronged, and many hundreds were unable to obtain admission. Mr. Sergeant Clarke, in opening the case, stated that the deceased, Miss Martha Goddard, was a maiden lady upwards of seventy years of age, who lived with her sister in a large house, called Stanley-hall, about six miles from Derby. They were the daughters of a clergyman, connected with one of the best families in the county, and possessed of considerable property, but of very eccentric habits, living in their mansion without any other inmate, occupying separate rooms, taking their meals apart, and rarely having any communication with each other. They were supposed to have hordes of money in the house, and it might, therefore, be easily conceived that they would be marked out as a prey. The surviving sister was now in a state of mental imbecility, and incompetent to give her evidence, but she was in attendance and should be called if either of the prisoners wished it. The confession of Bland was put in and read, the substance of which was that he participated in the robbery but was innocent of the murder. He stated that they went together on the night of the robbery and murder. Hulme took off the slates from the coal-house and got in. The surviving sister came to the spot armed with a poker. Hulme knocked her down and then unbolted the door. They all entered and drove the old lady up stairs, and broke open the room in which the deceased slept. Prisoner put various atrocious which they threw down into a bag. He heard the deceased scream, and call out several times, "Sally, come Sally." Hulme struck her several times over the ribs with an iron crow-bar, and at last beat her about the head and killed her. Hulme and Bonsall told prisoner that they had found only 19s. 6d., and gave him 6s. 6d. of it. They then left and met a man soon after in the lane, whom they thought of murdering. In corroboration of this confession a considerable deal of circumstantial evidence was adduced, and the jury without hesitation found the prisoners "Guilty." His lordship, in a very impressive address, passed sentence of death, assuring them there was not the least hope of mercy. The prisoners, whose appearance betokened the greatest hardihood, heard their doom without the least apparent emotion.

(Before Mr. Baron Alderson.)

SEDITION.—John West, aged 25, was indicted for having, at Swadlincote, on the 18th of September last, wickedly, maliciously, and seditiously uttered certain words concerning our sovereign lady the Queen.—Mr. Waddington and Mr. Macauley appeared in support of the prosecution. The prisoner conducted his own defence.—Mr. Waddington stated that the prosecution had been instituted by the magistrates of the district in which the alleged offence was committed. The prisoner was charged with having, on Sunday the 18th of September last, uttered, in the presence of a large number of persons, a discourse of an inflammatory and seditious character, calculated to incite persons to commit acts of outrage and insubordination. The prisoner had addressed an assembly of about two hundred on Gresly Common, taking a text from Scripture. In the progress of his discourse he had uttered these words: "We are told to unite together to oppose the abominable laws which strip our rights by class legislation." "We must be alive and active, for as long as we sleep quiet we shall not get our rights from the aristocracy." "We must combine together to open the locks of the prison doors, and liberate those of our brethren who are confined for asking for our rights." "We have no right to be content with the abominable laws which are entailed upon us." These were the words used; no one could mistake their meaning; and it would be for the prisoner to explain them away if he could. The meeting commenced by singing a hymn, after which the prisoner took his text from the first chapter of the 2nd of Peter, the 4th and three following verses. He spoke for an hour and half, during which he uttered the expressions for which he had been indicted. Witnesses were then called to speak to the facts. It appeared that the prisoner had spoken of moral duty, temperance, and godliness, and had referred to the 42nd of Isaiah, 7th verse, when he alluded to opening the prison doors. He implored a blessing upon her Majesty and the rulers of the land.—Mr. West having declined to enter into his own recognizances in the sum of £100 for the peace.—The learned baron told them they had been in great jeopardy, as the offences with which they were charged were serious. It would be as well, perhaps, if they were to know what their rights upon the subject for which they were indicted were, and what they were not. They had a right to meet and agree together as to the wages they should demand from their employers; but no right to compel others to follow the same course. The freedom they claimed for themselves they were bound to allow to others—that was only justice, and was both the law and the prophets.

NORTHERN CIRCUIT.—YORK, March 20.

(Before Mr. Justice Coltman.)

CROWN COURT.—Samuel Sledding, Thomas Garrick, and William Garlick were indicted for a highway robbery, in feloniously assaulting William Batty and stealing some money from his person, at the same time using personal violence towards him. The prisoners were convicted, and sentenced to be transported: Sledding for life, and the others for 20 years.

Thomas Greaves, William Hawling, and James Scholefield were also indicted for a highway robbery with violence. Mr. Pickering and Mr. Price appeared for the prosecution. The prisoners were not defended by counsel. It appeared that the prosecutor had been suddenly set upon and pulled from his horse. He identified the prisoner Greaves as the one on whom he fell, and they came to the ground together. His face was bruised and bleeding when he got up, and they proceeded to rifle his pockets. He struggled hard, and one of his assailants said, "D—n him, if he doesn't lie still stick him." The losing of his waistcoat was finally cut and carried off. Greaves then made off, but, however, before he had inflicted a severe bite on the hand of one of those who was holding him down. The prisoners were convicted, and sentenced to transportation for 15 years.

OXFORD CIRCUIT.—STAFFORD, March 20.

(Before Mr. Justice Erskine.)

THE CHARTIST TRIALS.—THE QUEEN v. COOPER AND OTHERS.—Mr. Sergeant Talfourd, Mr. Richards, Q.C., Mr. Godson, Q.C., and Mr. Alexander, were counsel for the crown. The defendants, Thomas Cooper, John Richards, and Joseph Cooper, took their places in the usual table. Richards is a respectable-looking old man, as is also Capper, who cried very much on coming into court, and appeared in bad health.—Previous to the jury being sworn, Cooper submitted that if he was found guilty of one count of the indictment at Lancaster aright, it precluded his being tried, as he understood he had been found guilty on that count, but he was not present.—The judge said he could not take cognisance of anything that had occurred elsewhere, unless he had been sentenced.—Mr. Alexander opened the pleadings. The defendants were charged with conspiring at Burslem on the 15th of August, unlawfully to cause, raise, and make riots, and, in other counts, with making certain false, libellous, and seditious speeches to excite the people, and unlawfully overthrow the laws of the realm, to the great terror of the queen's peaceful subjects.—Mr. Sergeant Talfourd stated the case in a lengthy and energetic speech.—Mr. Cooper twice interrupted Sergeant Talfourd during his address, complaining that he was endeavouring to exclude him from attempting to describe what he thought, and said something commenting upon his being seen near Dr. Vale's house, when he clearly proved an alibi on that charge at the special commission.—Mr. Justice Erskine said the learned sergeant should not attempt to describe the thoughts of any persons, or impute intentions to them.—Cooper said he hoped the crown was not actuated by vindictive motives in pushing the prosecutions against the two poor old men beside him; one of whom (Capper) was already sinking from his imprisonment (having been sentenced to two years' imprisonment for sedition at the late special commission), and therefore let the charge of conspiracy be given up against them, and he himself was ready to take his trial.—The counsel on the part of the crown, however, did not consent to the course proposed by the defendant.—Mr. Richards then proceeded to call witnesses in support of the charge against the prisoners, the particulars of which, it will be remembered, were given at full length in the columns of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS at the time of the occurrence, together with the speeches of accusing emissaries, which excited considerable public admiration and attention.—The court sat until nine o'clock, when it adjourned the further hearing until next day.

March 21.—Mr. Justice Erskine took his seat at nine o'clock, when the first witness called was Thomas Firth, who was a tailor, and who deposed to seeing the defendants, William Ellis and Joseph Capper, leading the people towards the town-hall, at Tunstall, on the 24th of June last. Both these defendants made violent speeches, and advised the people to arm themselves, and to obtain the Charter. This witness was cross-examined at great length as to his veracity and truth. He admitted he knew of a meeting against Capper but his political proceedings.—Richard Forrester, clerk to Lord Granville, was at a meeting at the Crown Bank, and saw Mr. Capper and Mr. Richards there. He heard Capper say, "My lads, we must have military tactics before we gain our cause." He also spoke about the Poor-laws, and about throwing property into one common fund, and that he was willing to do so with his, if others would do the same. In cross-examination the witness admitted that Capper generally kept the people in good temper when he spoke to them. He considered that the meeting was a legal one. The witness added that he gave evidence at the special commission, and that Lord Granville paid his expenses.—Several other witnesses having been examined, the court adjourned at half-past seven o'clock.

SURREY SESSIONS.

(Before Mr. Puckle and a Bench of Magistrates.)

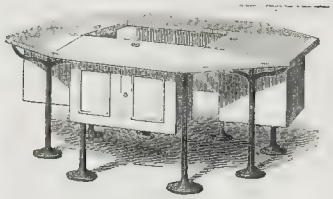
MARCH 22.—A bench warrant was issued against the Duke of Normandy to find sureties, himself in £100, and two sureties of £50 each, and to give forty-eight hours' notice of bail, to appear at the next sessions to answer the articles exhibited against him at the suit of his landlord, Mr. Jackson.—Mr. Charnock said such was the violent conduct of this distinguished foreigner, that the inspector now in attendance informed him that it would require twenty policemen to apprehend him, and that his house, 13, Marlborough-road, was now in a state of siege, and it was reported that he had invented an infernal machine, by which he threatened to blow a little police to atoms, and that he supposed the public would be treated with another celebrated exploit of monomania.—The Chairman said it would be hard to prejudge the case in its present stage, the defendant not being present. If the defendant had himself been before the court they probably would have fixed a higher amount of bail. The process, however, should issue immediately.

THE RECENT ESCAPE FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH.—The grand jury having returned a true bill for misdemeanor against Frederick Lauford for an escape from the custody of the Marshal of the Queen's Bench, by concealing himself in a chest of drawers, on the application of Mr. Lilly, the court ordered the defendant to enter into recognizances, himself in £400, and two sureties of £200 each, to appear and take his trial next session, and to give the Marshal forty eight hours' notice of bail. The effect of this application will be to remove the defendant from the strong room in the Queen's Bench to the felons' side of Horsemonger-lane Gaol, provided he is unable to find the required sureties.

INTERIOR OF TATTERSALL'S.

TATTERSALL'S.

Just far enough west to enable nobles and gentles to enjoy an atmosphere in which they can "live and breathe," stands that fine point of our metropolis called Hyde Park Corner. Passing thence into Grosvenor Place, take the first stith lane that occurs on your right hand, and having arrived near the end of it, you reach a small building to the left, with iron rails in front—that is the new subscription-room. That is the famed Tattersall's, of which you have heard so much; a spot where honour is the sole bond between man and man, and where (to carry out the principle) the largest amount of sharp practitioners is to be found perhaps beneath the sun. It is early, probably, when you arrive, for your curiosity prompted you to visit it betimes. The scene is, as you will observe, sombre in the extreme; wait awhile, and—it being April or May—stirring things shall be done anon.



BETTING-TABLE.

The laws of England are the finest laws ever conceived since Solon began business in the legislative line. Foremost, for moral effect, stand the statutes against gambling—for small sums. It is wrong to bet on a ball of ivory running round a table,—honourable to do so on a horse running round a course. The former is roulette, punishable by imprisonment, the latter is racing, rewarded as a patriotic demonstration. The room now fills fast, for it is five o'clock, and if you are in luck, a company that you have not often before met will surround you. On one side peradventure you see the gallant brother of the premier, on the other a group of gentlemen with faces that would compliment an execution. The subscribers to Tattersall's Room consist of three classes; the proprietors of race-horses and amateur betters, young men of fashion and sporting ambition; commission-agents, who bid for others, and legs who bid for themselves (so called because they run away when they lose and can't or won't pay). If the law of libel had been remodelled before this was written, it would have been a rich morceau; but the truth is not to be told at all times; the more is the pity. Were the band not tied, what a history might be written of those who have for years dragged on their Damocles existence at Tattersall's! Men with honour in their hearts, and nothing in their pockets, who long have gazed on the dreary round of the circle there, brooding over what the next issue might bring about—a precarious provision or a pistol! Scoundrels—the most noisy and influential of the ring—notorious cheats—desperately defiled levanters—who take the lead, and keep it by the very force of their infamy. Efforts are being made to render Tattersall's—as well as the turf generally—becoming the presence and patronage of gentlemen. The improving spirit of the days in which we have the fortune to live will doubtless bring about this consummation so devoutly to be wished. The heavy betting, now common in racing speculations, will then give way to a more rational and a more enjoyable system, and causes shall cease to exist, which have too often driven the broken in spirit and fortune to seek a fearful refuge from his sufferings. Strolling a few years since, on the occasion of a visit to Paris, along the Italian Boulevards, we saw a set of prints—meant, if our memory serve us, to depict a settling day for the Derby. The dramatis personæ are of course Englishmen. One was seated at a table with his elbows driven down on it like iron props; his head grasped between his palms, and his eyes starting from their sockets in a paroxysm of despair. Another, unwilling to leave his friends in uncertainty, holds a pistol to each ear, to report the cause of his departure. A third is exhibited in all the agony of suspense—swinging from the bough of a tree while a fourth—in exposition of the passage which declares that there is a tide in the affairs of men—is in the act of descending, head foremost, from the parapet of a bridge. These sketches may be somewhat highly coloured, it is true, but there are too many episodes in the history of the turf and of Tattersall's which they would in some wise serve to illustrate.

ENTRANCE TO THE THAMES TUNNEL.

At the annual meeting of the proprietors of this stupendous work, held on Tuesday, March 7th, the completion of the Tunnel, as a thoroughfare for foot-passengers, and, with the exception of the descent, for carriages, was announced, and gave great satisfaction to the assembly. It was also stated that the Tunnel would be opened during the month; and, the formal arrangements being completed, Saturday (this day), is the day fixed for the interesting ceremony. Of its details we purpose giving an illustrated account in our next paper. The Duke of Wellington, it is arranged, will be present on the memorable occasion; his grace having, from the first moment that he had seen the plan, conceived a high notion of its practicability, and forwarded the undertaking as much as possible. Meanwhile, we subjoin a view of the entrance to the Rotherhithe shaft.

THEATRICAL PORTRAITS.

MR. ANDERSON.

Mr. Anderson has been performing the character of Othello at Drury-lane Theatre with a great deal of promise and success. It has afforded us pleasure to find Mr. Macready affording the opportunity of obtaining further distinction, in the eye of the public, to young actors who have already exhibited marks of decided histrionic ability; and we are ready to aid such emulous encouragement, in the case of Mr. Anderson, by a notice of the fact, accompanied with appropriate illustration. The best features of this gentleman's acting have been, hitherto, a certain grace of deportment—a confident walking of the stage—a smooth, yet sonorous, style of declamation—and a disposition to make the most of emphasis in the more passionate episodes of his part: perhaps, in his efforts towards the latter consummation, he has not been altogether successful, and has occasionally neglected Hamlet's advice to his craft, by attaining more of the extravagant than of the simply energetic or sublime. His manner, too, was once disfigured by too studied—or unstudied—an imitation of Macready—which, however, is gradually wearing away, and is, perhaps, less perceptible in his acting of Othello than in any other of his tragic characters. He has, altogether, made a strong and favourable impression upon the public, and is generally welcomed as one of the favourites of the house.

Mr. Anderson's impersonation of the jealous Moor is unequal, but still much worthy of commendation. Here and there it develops points of originality, and always a self-dependent conception, not a mere reliance upon precedent and the approved points of others. His delivery of the speech to the senate was a clever piece of correct and somewhat eloquent declamation. His bursts of passion, too, in more striking and animated passages, were full of impulse and power; and to his adjurations of Iago under the torture of suspicion and disbelief—

> If thou dost slander her and torture me
> Never pray more; abandon all remorse;
> Do deeds to make heaven weep, all earth amazed,
> For nothing canst thou to damnation add > Greater than that—he imparted something of the concentrated firmness, and terrible storm of heart which Macready pours out in passion with those burning, withering words. His death-scene is less effective, but the tout-ensemble of his performance pleased the audience, and won him no inconsiderable tribute of applause.

MR. LOVE, THE POLYPHONIST.

This gentleman has resumed at the Strand theatre those performances by which he has already made himself and his art so popular in many other places, and by which his reputation has not been confined to this side of the Atlantic, but has extended from one end of the United States to the other, setting our American brethren upon the task "to guess and calculate" by what process of the physical organization of the performer, and by what rare management of the powers with which he is endowed by nature, he can give utterance to such rare sounds, and so modulate, direct, and manage the faculty of enunciation as to persuade an audience almost out of their senses and produce illusions almost as strong as realities. This artist, for he may with the greatest propriety of language be called an artist, has very properly called himself a "Polyphonist," which being interpreted or rather paraphrased means one who speaks with many voices. Mr. Love does speak with many voices, and those voices so well managed, made to represent so well the voices as means to imitate, that the auditor can scarcely believe that the variety of sounds he hears can proceed from one pair of human lungs or be the effort to articulate of one set of human organs of speech. But this is not all, Mr. Love possesses, besides the power of imitating the voices of persons of all ages, grades, and professions, the art of diversifying the voices of their respective genera into an endless variety of species. He can imitate an "infant pulling in its mother's arms" and an infant laughing on its mother's knee. He can represent an old crone chuckling, or an old crone wheezing and uttering maledictions both loud and deep. He can depict a merry old man and a cross old man, a blustering boatswain and a solemn Quaker. The tones of the lover and his lass, when "whispering trees are telling tales of love"—that is, not of Mr. Love himself, but of his scarcely less universally potent namesake. In a word, he can, with the rapidity of thought, bring upon the stage such a numerous dramatic corps, so perfect in their respective parts, so diversified in character, and so humorous in their exhibition, that though they play not "those fantastic tricks" which are said to "make the angels weep," they do what is much better, they play those fantastic tricks which make ladies and gentlemen die with laughter, and go very near to increase the category of coroners' inquests, "came by their deaths by some means or other unknown." Mr. Love, however, is no murderer; he has rather, by his good-humour, his spirited imitations of men and manners, and illimitable versatility of talent, prolonged than shortened the existence of his fellow-creatures. His bill of fare at the Strand Theatre is a rich one; there are solid dishes and piquant entremets. There is enough for all, and variety for every taste. Vivid and faithful in his colouring, correct in his outline, and forcible in his lights and shadows, if what he represents may be deemed a picture, he is a painter of first-rate genius, and with all that art can do to make him pre-eminent in his profession.

Oh, 'tis Love! 'tis Love! &c. &c.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

COWPER'S SUMMER-HOUSE, AT OLNEY.

Cowper, "the most popular poet of his generation, and the best of English letter-writers," was an enthusiastic lover of nature. His poems contain, as it is not too strongly expressed by Hazlitt, "a number of pictures of domestic comfort and social refinement which can hardly be forgotten but with the language itself." Hence his works abound with interesting localities, one of which is shown in the engraving, from a sketch by a correspondent, R. R.

Cowper's summer-house is situated at the back of his residence, at Olney, in Buckinghamshire, a large brick house in a remote corner of the market-place, now much dilapidated, and occupied as a school. This little relic is carefully preserved by desire of the proprietor, from regard to the memory of the poet, and stands in a pretty garden, precisely as when he occupied it as a study; its walls and ceiling are inscribed, nay, almost covered, with names, dates, &c., by persons of note, with many a poetical tribute to the poet's talents and character. Near it stands an apple-tree, said to have been planted by him. In the summer-house Cowper wrote "The Task," and pursued his studies generally, apart from the interruptions of the house and the bustle of the adjacent market-town. Behind is the church and vicarage, held, in his time, by his devoted friend, the Rev. John Newton, afterwards of Lombard-street; to facilitate communication, a gate was formed in the fence between, to save going round by the public road.

In a letter addressed to "Dear Joe" (Joseph Hill, Esq., of Wayreave, and Great Queen-street, London), Cowper thus describes the above interesting apartment:—"I write in a nook that I call my boudoir: it is a summer-house not bigger than a sedan chair; the door of it opens into the garden, that is now crowded with pinks, roses, and honeysuckles, and the window into my neighbour's orchard. It formerly served an apothecary as a smoking-room; at present, however, it is dedicated to sublime uses; here I write all that I write in summer time, whether to my friends or to the public. It is secure from all noise, and a refuge from all intrusion." Or, as he wrote on another occasion:—

> Here, free from riot's hateful noise,
> Be mine, ye calmer, purer joys,
> A book or friend bestows;
> Far from the storms that shake the great,
> Contentment's gale shall fan my seat,
> And sweeten my repose.

The Friend of China, a paper published at Hong-kong, contains the curious announcement of a newspaper about to be published in the Chinese language. "We had hoped, ere this," says the editor, "to have issued a newspaper in Chinese, but the types, which were very handsomely loaned to us by his Excellency the Plenipotentiary, have hitherto been, and still are, we believe, employed at Macao in printing some works introductory to the study of the Chinese language." Nearly all the Chinese population, it is asserted, are able to read, but all classes evince an "extraordinary avidity" to obtain information, provided it be conveyed to them in their own language.

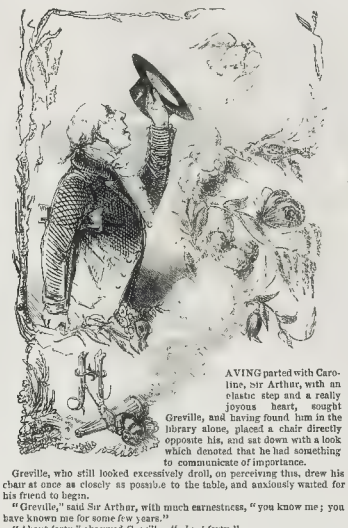
CHAPTER III.
THE PROPOSAL.



AVING parted with Caroline, Sir Arthur, with an elastic step and a really joyous heart, sought Greville, and having found him in the library alone, placed a chair directly opposite his, and sat down with a look which denoted that he had something to communicate of importance.

Greville, who still looked excessively droll, on perceiving this, drew his chair at once as closely as possible to the table, and anxiously waited for his friend to begin.

"Greville," said Sir Arthur, with much earnestness, "you know me; you have known me for some few years."

"About forty," observed Greville—"about forty."

"The number is unimportant; you have known me sufficiently long to know that I am a man of some considerable substance. Very well. Now, have you anything to say against my moral character?"

"Your moral character," exclaimed Greville, with a look of amazement; "No! Who has had the audacity even to intimate that I ever said a syllable in disparagement"———

"No one—no one," interrupted Sir Arthur. "I merely wished to know whether you ever saw anything in my conduct to object to."

"Never, my dear friend, never!"

"Very well; do you perceive at this present period anything objectionable in my person?"

"Nothing! But what are you driving at? What do you mean?"

"I'll explain all anon: we shall soon come to the point. But tell me candidly, is there, in your judgment, anything either morally or physically the matter with me?"

"No!"

"Very well, then; that being the case, I presume you can have no objection to my marrying one of your daughters?"

"You marry one of my daughters!" said Greville, sinking back in his chair,—"you?"

"Ay!—why not? Is there anything particularly staggering in the idea? Caroline—bless her—and I, have made up our minds to marry. If you have any objection, state it: if you have none, let us have your consent: if you withhold it, I'll run away with her. Nothing can be more straightforward or clear."

"Oh, it's quite straightforward enough, and sufficiently clear! But do you recollect what age you are, Cleveland?"

"Age! Pooh, pooh, pooh! what has age to do with it? The constitution's the point, and I've a remarkable constitution—powerful, ardent, staunch—like a lion!—sound, Greville, sound!"

"I cannot help smiling," said Greville; "but really the thing appears to be so excellent a joke"———

"A joke!"—cried Sir Arthur—"a joke! Is it a joke for an honourable man to propose for your daughter? Is it a joke to see her united to one upon whom she has set her affections? Will it be a joke to see her happy? If so, then it shall be an excellent joke, for you will see her the happiest of the happy. And how much better is it to give a creature of her intellect and judgment to a man of experience than to a butterfly-boy!"

"Experience makes fools wise," thought Greville, "in all save matters of love, in which that same experience has a tendency to make wise men fools." But this he kept to himself.

"Give her to me, then," pursued Sir Arthur, "and you'll see what I'll make of her. Will you consent to our union?"

"Why, things must take their course! I can't pretend to control them: If you are to have the girl, why you'll have her: I can say nothing more."

"But am I to understand from what you have said already that you consent?"

"Why, Cleveland, I have solemnly promised my sister, who has been, and is still, extremely kind to the girls, that I never would consent to the marriage of either without consulting her."

"Well, then, my dear Greville, send for her. But, recollect, if there be any opposition, off we go! Send for her, by all means, at once: send Charles?"

"Oh, dear, no! I couldn't think of that—Fred shall go: he can wait and bring her down with him."

Very well—thus it was arranged. Fred received his instructions; and having had the secret revealed to him, much to his surprise, was despatched; when Sir Arthur rejoined Caroline, leaving Lucrece to be entertained by Charles.

To say that Greville was displeased at the thought of Sir Arthur being united to one of his daughters, were to say that which is not particulary true. On the contrary, when he considered the wealth and influence he possessed, and dwelt upon what he had, in all probability, been predestined to do for the family, he was delighted; although he could not appreciate the wisdom of the step.

"But, human wisdom," thought he, "how far does it extend? Nay, what in fact is human wisdom? Nothing! That which appears to be an unwise act may have been wisely ordained: who can tell? Who can draw the line correctly between right and wrong? An act may be wrong according to our conceptions, and yet in reality right. Hence the presumption involved in human judgment. Certainly, according to my notions, this on the part of Sir Arthur will be an act of great folly; but things must take their predestined course; we have nothing to do with them more than to act as automata—for automata we are, and nothing more."

Engaged in the contemplation of this admirable line of argument, Greville remained in the library while Sir Arthur was practising with infinite zeal all the arts of fascination of which he was master, and Charles, without any apparent design, was securing the heart of Lucrece.

LADY GRANGE.

In accordance with the injunctions of Greville, Fred reached town with all possible expedition, and immediately repaired to the residence of Lady Grange, whom he found just about to step into her carriage.

"Frederick!" she exclaimed; "why what brings you to town?"

"I am commissioned to deliver a message," replied Fred.

"Oh, indeed!—What is it?"

"Why, the governor and Sir Arthur are anxious to see you at the Hall on pressing business."

"Impossible! I could not under any conceivable circumstances leave town in less than a fortnight."

"Oh," said Fred, "that settles the matter. It will all be over long before that."

"All over! What will be over? What has occurred?"

"Nothing yet; but something I expect will occur in a day or two."

"Well, what is it? Why keep me thus on the rack? What is likely to occur?"

"The marriage of Caroline."

"The marriage of Caroline!" echoed Lady Grange. "Impossible! And I not to have heard a single syllable about it!—without being consulted in any way, or receiving the slightest intimation!"

"I have to state that the governor has not yet given his consent, and that he will not until he has seen you on the subject."

"Then how can you tell me, sir, that you expect the affair to take place in a day or two?"

"Simply because Sir Arthur has declared that he'll carry her off at once if"——

"Sir Arthur! Ridiculous! You don't mean to affirm that Sir Arthur has proposed?"

"However ridiculous it may appear it's a fact!"

"Sir Arthur himself propose to Caroline! Monstrous! But I'll very soon settle that. I'll just write a note and run down with you at once."

"But you'll dine first?"

"I have no inclination for anything now. I was going out to dinner, and thus you see all my arrangements are upset."

"Well, I must have something! Forty miles here and forty back, you know: I can't stand that with an empty stomach."

"Well, ring the bell, ring the bell; do not annoy me. Really I am now in such a dreadful state of nervous excitement I scarcely know how to hold my pen."

The bell was rung and the servant appeared.

"John," said Lady Grange, "desire Thomas to drive down to Newman's and order post-horses to be put to the carriage immediately—four!"

"And then bring up something to eat," added Fred. "Anything will do—on a tray—but be quick."

Lady Grange finished her note and retired, when Fred set to work on some chickens and tongue, and succeeded in making a very fair meal before the carriage re-appeared at the door. On its being announced, her ladyship, in travelling attire, returned, and when her maid and certain trunks had been established on the box, she and Fred, without a moment's unnecessary delay, entered the carriage and were off.

During the journey nothing was either alluded to or thought of, but Sir Arthur's proposal. Her ladyship put an infinite variety of questions, and with surpassing ingenuity, in order to ascertain whether Frederick knew more of the affair than he pretended to know; but all he was able to communicate was the hasty intimation of his father, which was brief, although much to the point.

On their arrival at the Hall—having accomplished the distance in less than four hours—Lady Grange was received with great affection, but being in a feverish state of impatience to know the whole of the bearings of the case, she closeted Greville at once.

"Alexander," said her ladyship with a most profound air, "what is this I hear about Caroline? Is it really a fact that Sir Arthur has proposed?"

"Oh that's true enough," replied Greville. "But I told him I would not entertain the proposal without consulting you."

"Then, Alexander, if I am to be consulted, I have no hesitation in saying that you ought as a father to set your face against it at once."

"Well," returned Greville, with a shrug, "if I am to set my face against it, why I shall! But what will be the use of my setting my face against it if he is to have her?—while, on the other hand, if he is not, why should we trouble our heads at all about it?"

"Folly; folly, Alexander, mere folly! I have really no patience with you. Have you the happiness of Caroline at heart?"

"Of course I have."

"Then how can you or any other person of sense expect happiness to spring from an union like this? Why her sister is only fifty-nine!"

"Fifty nine; he assures me he's only fifty-nine."

"Well, fifty-nine, and she a mere child! Oh it's monstrous!

"It is true, very true," rejoined Greville, "that there is a great difference in point of age; but then they appear to be excessively fond of each other, and the girl is quite old enough to choose for herself, and as it is manifestly her wish to marry him, why should we oppose it?"

"Have you, Alexander, been talking to her in this strain?"

"I have not said a syllable to her on the subject."

"Then send her to me, that I may learn from her own lips the motives by which she has been actuated."

Greville accordingly withdrew; and in a few moments Caroline appeared before her aunt, who, seated with appropriate dignity on the sofa, waved her hand as she entered with significance and grace.

"My dear!" she observed, when Caroline had seated herself by her side, "you need not be at all apprehensive that I shall use any unkind expression, but I do expect—I have, indeed, a right to expect—that you will answer whatever questions I may put to you, ingenuously. In the first place, Sir Arthur has proposed to you, and you, on your part, have accepted that proposal: what on earth could have induced you to do that? Now, be candid, Caroline, and attempt to conceal nothing from me."

"I will be candid," returned Caroline. "In consenting, I had three objects in view: —the first was to be settled; the second, to be happy; and the third, to be rich: the very objects to which you have ever taught me to aspire."

"But is it conceivable that happiness, the chief of these objects, can ever, by making such a match, be attained?"

"You have instructed me to believe that the attainment of this, the chief object, may be, in all cases, made to spring from that of the other two; in other words, that a woman who is settled and rich has within herself the power to be happy."

"But not with an old man, child! not with an old man! Have you any idea of the age of Sir Arthur?"

"Oh, yes! there has been no attempt on his part to disguise his age; he was fifty-nine last July."

"Oh, only fifty-nine!" cried her ladyship, ironically; "I thought he had been ten years older, at least."

"He does not look ten years older," said Caroline.

"Well, to you he may not. And so you expect to be happy?"

"I do: for he is an amiable and an honourable man."

"And passionately fond of you, of course?"

"I believe him to be. I moreover believe that his study will be to render my happiness complete."

"This is all very well, theoretically, dear; but practically, believe me, it is not quite so admirable. Look a little forward: conceive what your position will be ten years hence; picture to yourself an emaciated, withered old man, but double by age, bloated, palsied, and bloodless, tottering in the very last stage of decay by the side of a young wife, in all the pride of youth and beauty: picture to yourself"——

"I have done so already, and an interesting picture it is—indicative of gratitude, confidence, and love. I shall regard him as a husband while his faculties remain, as a father when locks and limbs are gone."

"Why, what in the name of common sense is the matter with you, Caroline? Really you appear to be possessed. Who has been poisoning your mind? The idea of your throwing yourself away upon an old man like that! Why it is absolute madness; especially at a time when you have such magnificent prospects in view."

"I have no magnificent prospects in view."

"But I have for you!"

"You have had them in view, my dear aunt, for five years."

"Caroline," exclaimed Lady Grange, with the most superb hauteur, "I desire that you will not talk to me as you would to your maid."

"Nay, my dear aunt, you are angry."

"Angry! it is sufficient to make a dove angry. However, I have but one question more to ask: it is this: have you made up your mind to have Sir Arthur?"

"I have."

"Very well, Miss Cleveland, very well! But remember, if you do have him, never hope to be received by me!"

"I trust that on reflection you will not oppose it?"

"I never will sanction so monstrous a match! I should be ashamed, Caroline, if I were you, to entertain the thought of having such an old person. It is, however, for you to decide. I do not expect your final answer this evening; let me have it in the morning. In the interim, Caroline, remember what I have said, and reflect."

Her ladyship then rose and rang for her maid, when Caroline rejoined Lucrece, to whom she proceeded to explain all that had occurred, while Sir Arthur and Greville were sipping their wine, and throwing out various intimations having reference to the great point at issue, with unexampled ingenuity, in the perfect conviction that Charles was in the dark, although, in reality, he understood it all.

Having amused themselves thus until tea, the gentlemen repaired to the drawing-room, in which they found Lady Grange in a state of composure, listening to a sweet duet, delightfully sung by Caroline and Lucrece at the piano.

Of course, her ladyship rose the very moment they entered; but when Sir Arthur approached her with consummate grace, she received him with that chilly elegance which freezes the inexperienced, but which had no other effect upon him than that of prompting him to press her hand still more warmly, and to say, "Although we have been friends for years, we do not exactly understand each other yet: we must presently have a little private conversation."

Charles then presented himself, and was somewhat more cordially received, when the girls left the piano, and they sat down to coffee, over which they introduced the chief topics of the day.

"You are fond of chess, Lady Grange, I believe," said Sir Arthur, when the evening had somewhat advanced.

"Extremely," replied her ladyship, smiling.

"May I hope to have the honour of being check-mated by you?"

"I shall be happy to do my best with the view of check-mating you, Sir Arthur," replied her ladyship with an emphasis which all understood.

Sir Arthur smiled, and condescended to take a table at the extreme end of the room, when Greville and Caroline, who were passionately fond of chess, challenged Charles and Lucrece.

It was not, however, for the purpose of playing that Sir Arthur and her ladyship retired to this table: it was to converse on that subject which engrossed all their thoughts, and upon which—although with views diametrically opposed—they both conceived the earthly happiness of Caroline to depend. It is true the men were placed, and it is equally true that each moved the king's pawn two squares; but when this had been done no more was thought of the game, for Sir Arthur boldly opened the all-important subject at once.

"Lady Grange," said he, sotto voce, "I am, of course, aware of the object which brought you from town; and, as it appears that your consent to my union with Caroline must be the forerunner of Greville's, I embrace this, the earliest opportunity of ascertaining whether that consent will be given or withheld."

"Look at the age of the child, Sir Arthur; look at her age! What will the world say to it?"

"What world? the fashionable world?—I am not a fashionable man. The moral world?—It is not an immoral act. The religious world?—Is it not sacred to religion?—The vulgar world?—What is the vulgar world to me? What world, then, have I to care for? the opinions of what world ought I to study? You will answer, my own world—my own immediate sphere. Let those who compose the limited circle in which I move say whatever their fancy may prompt. They cannot accuse me of dishonour; they cannot accuse me of vice: they cannot, in fact, accuse me of anything of which I need be ashamed; and all other accusations I hold in contempt."

"Well, but Sir Arthur—I scarcely know how, with sufficient delicacy, to express it—but you'll pardon me if I suggest that the difference between your age and hers is considerable."

"It is, but what of that? You wish to see her happy? Of course you do; and if it be in the power of man to make her so, happy she shall be. Upon what grounds, then, can you withhold your consent?"

"Why she is, comparatively speaking, but a child!"

"I do not regard her as a child. She has as old a head as I have, and an equal capacity for forming a judgment. Have you any other grounds of objection?"

"Sir Arthur, I have my own peculiar notions on the point, and I never can sanction a match of this character."

"Well, then, I've got the money to purse; I must make up my mind to run away with her to-morrow. But if you can show me one sufficient reason why the marriage contemplated should not take place, I'll abandon my suit on the instant."

"Give you a sufficient reason! That were indeed a hopeless task, for were five hundred sound substantial reasons to be given, not one, I apprehend would be, in your view, sufficient. However, I have none so much unhappiness spring from marriages of this description that I would not have it said or even supposed that I countenanced one for the world."

"Well, how am I to act? What am I to do? I want a wife and I'm firmly resolved to marry into this family! What if I were now to relinquish Caroline and boldly transfer my proposal to you? I presume the same objection would be raised. The difference between our ages is, as you justly observe, considerable. I am unfortunate enough to be considerably in advance of you all. You would reject me on the self-same grounds."

"I should not be justified in doing so. In that case the match would not be quite so unequal."

"Well, will you have me?"

"Now that you have become so agreeably playful, Sir Arthur," replied her ladyship with one of her sweetest smiles, "I would suggest that we had better change the subject."

And the subject ostensibly was changed; but as every important point in their subsequent conversation bore directly upon that of marriage, the favour of her ladyship was so decidedly propitiated that, on rising from the table, she was much more deeply than ever impressed with the expediency of discountenancing the match.

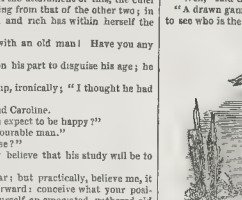
"Well," said Greville, "have you been check-mated?"

"A drawn game, a drawn game, Greville," replied Sir Arthur. "We are to see who is the conqueror in the morning."



(To be continued weekly.)

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—The present week's arrivals of English wheat up to Mark-lane have been on a comparatively moderate scale, but of very superior quality. However, on each market day, the stands have exhibited full average numbers of samples of last article, the demand for which has proved excessively dull, at an abatement on previous rates of from 1s. to 2s. per quarter, without effecting a clearance in any instance. In foreign wheat, both free and in bond, no little has been doing that prices may be considered almost nominal, but to effect sales the factors must give way quite 2s. per quarter. Barley and malt have been in fair supply, and steady inquiry, at about stationary figures. In consequence of the immense arrivals of oats, they have declined in value from 6d. to 1s. per quarter; beans, peas, and flour having likewise had a downward tendency.

English. Wheat: essex and Kent, red, 47s to 50s; ditto white, 47s to 52s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 47s to 47s; ditto, white, 49s to 52s; rye, 31s to 32s; grind malting, 27s to 29s; malting ditto, 30s to 32s; Chevalier, 34s to 36s; Scotch and Norfolk malt, 30s to 32s; brown ditto, 30s to 32s; Rangoon and Ware, 30s to 32s; Chevalier, 33s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 17s to 18s; potato ditto, 19s to 23s; Youghal and Cork, black, 17s to 18s; ditto white, 19s to 20s; tick beans, new, 34s to 36s; ditto, old, 36s to 38s; grey peas, 36s to 38s; maple, 36s to 38s; white, 36s to 38s; boilers, 42s to 47s per quarter. Town-made flour, 44s to 46s; Suffolk, 38s to 40s; Stockton and Yorkshire, 36s to 38s per 280 lbs. Foreign.—Free wheat, 50s to 52s. In Bond.—Barley, 30s1 oats, new, 15s to 17s; ditto feed, 14s to 16s; beans, 30s to 32s; peas, 32s to 37s per quarter. Flour, Americ, 2s to 24s; Baltic, 23s per barrel.

The Seed Market.—We have had very little inquiry for any kind of seed since our last, and prices remain unaltered.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed, English, sowing, 48s to 52; Baltic, crushing, 47s to 48s, 6d per quarter. Coleseed and Odessa, 42s to 46s, bongazed, 38s to 40s per quarter, coriander, 13s to 16s per cwt. Brown mustard seed, 10s to 12s; white ditto, 10s to 12s 6d; tares, 2s to 3s 6d per bushel. English rapeseed, new, £20 to £23 per last of ten quarters Linseed cakes, English, £5 5 to £6 10s; ditto foreign, £5 to £6 10s per 1000. Rapeseed cakes, £5 5 to £6 per ton.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 47s 6d; barley, 27s 11d; oats, 17s 4d; rye, 30s 10d; beans, 30s 8d; peas, 32s 8d.

Imperial Averages of Six Weeks which govern Duty.—Wheat, 47s 11d, barley, 27s 6d; oats, 17s 2d, rye, 28s 8d, beans, 30s 10d; peas, 32s 6d per quarter.

Duty on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 20s 0d; barley, 9s 0d; oats, 8s 0d; rye, 11s 6d; beans, 11s 6d, peas, 11s 6d

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread are from 6½d to 7½d; of household ditto, 5½d to 6½d for the 4lb loaf

Tea.—The imports of tea continue on an extensive scale, they having exceeded 1,000,000 lb. this week. At the public sales held since our last 58,000 packages were offered, but the buildings have ruled heavy, and only about 7000 packages have actually found buyers, at about previous rates.

Sugar.—We have not had much business doing in the sugar market during the week, and prices, in consequence of the large imports, are somewhat lower.

Coffee.—There has been rather more inquiry for coffee, and prices are tolerably well supported.

Cocoa.—This article has risen in value from 4s to 5s per cwt.

Rice.—The market still remains very dull, and prices are with difficulty supported.

Cotton.—There are inquiries after East India descriptions for export; but the limits, in most cases, are 1d to 2d per lb. too low to admit of business being done

Cassia Lignea.—The demand is good, and prices are firm

Pimento.—The continued mild weather keeps the Irish provision market in a quiet state, but, as a good consumption is going on, holders remain firm, and we do not hear of any reduction in price. The supply of foreign butter is light, consequently the best sorts readily command extreme prices, the best Dutch brings 118s to 120s per cwt. Lard is difficult of sale, though offered on lower terms. The bacon market is still heavy, at barely late rates

Tallow.—This article is firm at 43s 3d to 43s 6d on the spot, but without much business doing. For current prices, for autumn delivery, see 43s 6d.

Oils.—The market continues in a very dull state, and prices are still receding

Metals.—Exceedingly little is doing in any kind of metals, and the rates are sin out noinal

Wool.—The imports of wool this week have been nearly 1700 packages, while the private contract demand is excessively heavy.

Hops.—There is a steady, but by no means brisk, demand for hops, at prices about equal to those obtained last week.

Potatoes.—From Scotland, the Channel Islands, and various parts of England, about 2200 tons of potatoes have reached the Port this week, and are selling at from 40s to 60s per ton.

Coals.—Adair's, 14s; Old Tanfield, 14s, Tanfield Moor, 14s 6d; Wylam, 14s 6d; Lambton, 15s 6d, Caradoc, 15s 6d; Evenwood, 14s, Stewart's, 15s 6d; Towneley, 14s 6d per ton. Ships arrived, 19.

Smithfield.—This market has ruled excessively heavy, and prices have declined from 2d to 4d per 8 lb, with but average supplies on offer. Beef, from 2s 8d to 3s 4d; mutton, 2s 8d to 3s 10d; lamb, 4s 8d to 6s; veal, 3s 4d to 4s 4d; and pork, 3s 10d to 3s 10d per 8 lb, to the offal.

Newgate and Leadenhall.—These markets have been extensively supplied with all kinds of meat, which has moved off heavily at the following prices:—Beef, from 2s 4d to 3s 4d f 8 lb.; mutton, 2s 4d to 3s 6d; lamb, 4s 6d to 5s 8d; veal, 3s to 4s; and pork, 2s 6d to 3s 8d per 8 lb., by the carcase. ROBERT HERBERT.

COMMERCE AND MONEY.

We have had very little news in the city since our last publication, either of political or of commercial importance. Commercial enterprise is again beginning to be directed to the country, particularly to the North and Scotland, to which, to a great extent, those people shipments are making of goods of a saleable description. Many are of opinion that these movements are positively essential for the [illegible] of the country, as [illegible] the population of a portion of the [illegible] in the United States of North America, who cannot afford to pay the heavy duties levied on their direct importation into that union, and who, therefore, probably will be hereafter supplied by smuggling them across the lakes, without the payment of any duty whatever. This is the natural consequence of heavy taxation; and it is, therefore, far from being improbable that the same quantity of manufactures, of which we have latterly lost the sale in the direct channels of consumption with the United States, will in future be introduced into that republic by these [illegible].

From the East Indies considerably larger supplies of sugar and of other descriptions of produce than usual will be this season forwarded to our markets, and the same observation applies to the last sugar crop in the West Indies, from whence much larger shipments have been already made than during any of the last three years. This prospect, no doubt, has had its influence on the value of colonial produce during this week in Mincing-lane, where notwithstanding the impression made on prices when the news of the earthquake was first received, demand and supply are again beginning to regulate the intrinsic value of colonial products, and increased quantity in future will remunerate the planter for lower prices

On the English Stock Exchange the operations in national securities have been more limited during this week than they were during the last, and prices consequently are lower. Consols, which at the close of last week left off at 92¾, have declined to 92¾ again, for which no better reason can be given than the bulls being contented with their late profits. In the premium on Exchequer bills, also, a decline of nearly 10s must be noted since our last publication; but this alteration has seem partly occasioned by the introduction into the money market for sale of a portion of the bills which have been substituted for the late forged ones, and part, also, by the certainty that a reduction in the present rates of interest will be soon made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. On the Foreign Stock Exchange the business actually done not at present exceed to an extensive as at dull last week in transactions in foreign securities, and in Spanish bonds in particular a considerable decline has been experienced—their present value being about 21¾ for those bearing an interest of 3 per cent. The alteration is mainly to be attributed to the doubts existing here respecting the political character of the newly elected Cortes. In the shares of public companies, likewise, no material change has been now occurring, although on the actual value of any of them alteration can be noted. Money is still uncommonly abundant, and channels for its profitable employment equally scarce.

TO THE PEOPLE OF ENGLAND!—Fellow Countrymen! We, the undersigned, and the honorary members of the BRITISH COLLEGE OF HEALTH, hereby represent to you, after nearly twenty years' practical experience, the following for your serious consideration; namely, that the differences of treatment between Doctors and Hygeists is to you all, from the highest to the lowest, a question of life or death. Bear in mind that proper purging with sanatorious vegetable medicines, such as MORISON'S Medicines, can never do harm, but the contrary of it is in most cases out of ten the cause of death. We request that your blood is the life of that the natural course of bleeding should be immediately put a stop to. Lose into the question for yourselves, it is of eminent importance to you. Study your own constitutions, and the consequences will find a large stock of Ready-made Linen of every description. Light Trunks and Shooting Jackets.

Signed) MORISON AND MOAT, HYGEISTS

BIOGRAPHICAL NOTICE OF THE HYGEIST.—JAMES MORISON, the youngest son of Alex. Morison, Esq., was born at Bognie, in the county of Aberdeen, in the year 1770. The family has been long known as one of great influence and respectability, and the late member for Banffshire, John Morison, was the second brother of the subject of this brief sketch. He early left to be studied at the University of Aberdeen, and afterwards at Hanau, in Germany, being intended for the mercantile profession. After finishing his studies, he resided at Riga, as a merchant, and subsequently in the West Indies, where he acquired considerable West India property. Having suffered much from ill health, he was obliged to leave that country and proceed to Europe, seeking from change of clime a restoration to health. About the year 1814 he settled at Bordeaux, where he resided in great respectability

BETTS'S FAMILY ATLAS

To be Completed in FOURTEEN MONTHLY PARTS, each containing Four Single or Two Double Sheet Maps, and reaching the DATE OF THE KNOWN WORLD
The Proprietor has much satisfaction in appearing before the public with a NEW EDITION of a work which has already existed for him much profit and great commendation, and of thus affording the means to many individuals) the opportunity of supplying themselves with a valuable work at a very reasonable price, and on a plan which is found most convenient.
The present edition will possess the advantages of the introduction of several new and very important Maps, the whole having undergone a thorough revision, every new and important discovery and settlement will be found carefully introduced. The Maps of ENGLAND, WALES, SCOTLAND, and IRELAND are on an unusually large scale, accurately showing the various lines of RAILROAD, the Turnpike and Principal Cross Roads, Rivers, Canals, &c. (that of England and Wales alone embracing no fewer than 8000 Names). The Maps of the BRITISH COLONIES are also on a large scale, and the whole, the Proprietor feels satisfied that the work will be found fully to support the character it has obtained, and be considered entitled to a larger share of patronage than even on its first appearance. Extracts from a few literary notices of the former edition are subjoined.
"This work is correctly described in its title as a good Family Atlas, compiled with care, executed with taste, and sold at a moderate price, and we observe that an available exertion has been made to bring down the information to the latest moment."—Athenæum.
"The maps are, on the whole, of faithful book of maps, the whole of which appear to have been got up with great care, and to be exceedingly accurate: they are printed from steel plates, and are remarkably clear."—Mr. Betts deserves well of the public for the cheapness with which he has executed his labours."—Times.
"Independently of these claims to notice, the cheapness of the work, and its elegance of appearance, must insure its popularity."—Morning Herald.
"In this, the expense of the old and elaborate, as well as the errors of the hasty and superficial, are happily avoided, and Betts's Atlas will be found to be one of the best in the market."—The Spectator.
"The work is a valuable one: we have tested its accuracy in distracts as far as we can in the face of a country possibly can be, and we feel ourselves quite secure in recommending it to all who wish to supply themselves with a first rate atlas."—Conservative Journal.

CAMBRIDGE, FROM THE CASTLE HILL.

CAMBRIDGE ELECTION.

This ancient seat of learning, a view of which we herewith present to our readers, has, during the past week, been the scene of one of the most violent party struggles that has ever taken place in that borough, even during the reign of the most exciting questions of political strife. Our readers are aware that a vacancy having occurred in the representation of Cambridge, in consequence of the retirement of Sir Alexander Grant, two gentlemen of considerable distinction offered themselves as rival candidates—Mr. Fitzroy Kelly on the Conservative interest, and Mr. Foster on what is called the Liberal. The usual preparatory proceedings, such as entering the ring, peeling, and shaking hands, having been disposed of with the most chivalrous courtesy, the nomination took place at the Town-hall, on Saturday morning last, when, after the usual declaration of political principles, and the promise of future consistency, a show of hands was taken, which was declared by the mayor to be in favour of Mr. Kelly; and a poll being demanded, it was appointed to take place on Monday. On Monday morning the polling began at eight o'clock. The friends of the respective candidates were on the alert, in bringing the voters to the poll; but it was apparent to all that the supporters of Mr. Foster were using their most untiring exertions, in order to place and keep their favourite candidate at the head of the poll. They succeeded for a time, but were eventually beaten; and Mr. Kelly was returned the victorious candidate. The subjoined numbers will give the state of the poll at the hours specified:—

Eleven o'clock Foster, 407; Kelly, 339.
One o'clock—Foster, 502; Kelly, 508.
Two o'clock—Foster, 605; Kelly, 536.
Three o'clock—Kelly, 679; Foster, 651.
Close of the poll—Kelly, 714; Foster, 681.—Majority for Kelly, 33.

A SATURDAY SCENE IN OUR PUBLISHING-OFFICE.

Of the many hidden mysteries and crafts of trade which are essential to all orders and degrees of commerce—of the thousand and one dramas that are acted in most comical spirit and variety in every arcanum of metropolitan business (which stir the very heart of the spheres they agitate and enliven, and yet are never blazoned before the sight of society)—that which is peculiar to the news fraternity, and performed over the active duty of wholesale publication, is, perhaps, noisiest of all the noisy, liveliest of all the lively, busiest of all the busy, and the most eccentric within the pale of eccentricity. Your demoiselle, who binds within her girdle the fresh and blooming bouquet of the morning, has no idea of what has been witnessed by those gentle flowers towards the peep-o'-day at Covent-garden. The roses are not redolent of the gin-shop, the apple-shrew, or the porter's knot. The heartsease afford no reflex of the tumult of slang and fury which has erewhile shaken the arena in which they were bought. The epicure, who luxuriates in early season over the tender lamb, or whets his relish of the mutton haunch with sauce and jelly, à discretion, wots not of the Smithfield riots, and has no picture in his imagination of the markets of Newgate and Leadenhall. The milk that revels in your hyson sends not, from the teacup's deep, any whisper of the dairy prattle that has made discord even in the ears of cows. Nor by the same token has the reader of the journal that pours news and knowledge upon his expectant brain—that multiform creature whom the sweet courtesy of authorship still dubs "gentle,' be he never so irritable or enraged—the most remote conceiving of the play that has been acted in the publication of that intelligent sheet—the belligerent struggles to win it for him in defiance of courtesy and in the teeth of time—the lung-tearing energy of demand which has stormed the publisher for the quire to which it was related—the hurricane of slang and chaff, and anger and laughter, and accusation and repartee, which devote the office to the destinies of Babel, until the noisiest trade in the universe has appeased its hunger by a supply. Byron designated a literary lion as

That most powerful parson, Peter Pith,
The loudest wit I e'er was deafen'd with.

A newsman is an incarnation of all the loudness and power of all the Piths, Peters, parsons, or otherwise; and his voice has no kindred, save in the thunder-storm, the earthquake, and the cannon roar. He is a good-natured stentor, rioting in imperishability of lungs!

We had, last week, a fine exemplification of this important fact in the publication of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, under a pressure of demand which steam could not follow, save after the fashion in which Ascanius followed Æneas—haud passibus æquis; anglice—by no means as fast as could be wished. We have thrown into pictorial form and pressure a portion of the scene which presented itself in our office on Saturday last, and it is a mighty fine thing for our readers that we are unable to engrave the noise! There, such as it is, is the picture, but without the animating hurricane of language which gave it soul and sound. A few of our office symbols of business or prosperity chequer the walls. There is our prize ox of agricultural celebrity; our "immense success bill," whose flaming numbers are now outgrown by our circulation, those staring round O's ranging the length of thousands, which, from mural fronts of London, have tempted other speculators to a field wherein our reapers are gathering the harvest, while they are sitting lugubrious upon the stile; there is our intimation that the beautiful example of Victoria forbids the toleration of "light sovereigns" in our till; and there, that wise injunction to the newsmen to count their merchandize aright, for such is our acute sense of the rapidity with which reparation should follow injury, that we rectify errors only upon the spot! There is our publisher,

In the pale sufferance of a mute despair, at the non-arrival of those mountains of papers and supplements, which vanish more speedily than they grow; there is our porter, who must on that day be

Fifty times an Atlas at the least;

and last of all, there are the high-priests of impatience, the terrible newsmen themselves. Are they not busy in their temple? They want quire upon quire of fresh demand, and quire upon quire will not come as they are wanted. Now they bellow for papers until the office trembles, and there is a rumbling at the Land's-end; now they make incongruous noises among themselves, such as were never before assimilated in the history of discord; now they sink down into a sort of lulling hum, the intervallic murmur of repose foreboding storm; and now they burst forth in banter upon the publisher and his household gods. The poor ox comes in for the first sally. "What's the use of staring at that 'ere fat bullock? Better take the bull by the horns and give us our papers." Then the "immense success" bill furnishes pabulum for ready assault. "Forty thousand! Forty thousand! Gammon; why we want eighty thousand, and you can't print as fast as we get the orders." "Why don't you get the steam up? What's come of your engine? Why don't you make the organ play as fast as the people can dance?" Then one little clique will squeak up a good-humoured threat, "Ha, they've got some rivals." "Yes, Sheridan's comedy of the 'Rivals' aint more pleasant to them than their rivals, I know," shouts a new comer. "I tell you what it is. Here they keep us waiting for them while the other offices have got nothing to do but to keep on waiting for us." "Yes," responds another, "They keeps on a waiting for us, and we keeps on a-never-minding on 'em." Then breaks in a hit at the light sovereigns, then another about counting the papers; then another about the publisher, then another is nascent about the porter—but no! that is strangled in its birth—the porter is gone! Well they must have an interlude, and they get up a sham engagement, they form a ring, and a young Bungaree and a juvenile Sambo Sutton plunge into most unhurtful spar; but—presto—sudden lively as the lark, quick as the lightning, loud as "the bursting of the bladder of Chaos," there flashes out such a congratulatory round of cheering as might touch the iron nerves of a Wellington, and send the "enthusymuzzy" of glory through the veins of all the other conquerors in the world.

A gurgling murmur low and deep,
Then a burst that rends the sky;
A loud huzza like a people's shout
When a good king passeth by!

The office is all echo, and the joy of the enraptured multitude goes pealing along the Strand. One start for the West-end—one quiver for Temple Bar—one young earthquake for the city—and the murder is out! The sight of the porter has done it all; this time there is nothing half-and-half about him; he has a regiment of trucks outside the door, and in a few minutes he will have laid upon our interminable counter an instalment of FIVE HUNDRED QUIRES OF THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS!

The work of publication rushes into life anew, and the newsmen turn to their vocation cheerfully, and folding with a forty-man power, in a few minutes endeavour to astonish the trains. Now, then, yo-ics! Go it, Dawson! Go it, Smith! Go it, Clayton! Go it, Wyld! Go it, Hutton! Go it, Moggridge! Go it, Marlborough! Go it, Clarke! Go it, Cleave! Go it, Hetherington! Go it, Bishop! Go it, Violet! Go it, Clements! There was never a better race, the Derby is nothing, Ascot sinks into the shade, Doncaster is annihilated, and your customers are served.

THE PICTURE OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS, 1833.—The picture painted by Sir George Hayter of the House of Commons in 1833, representing the moving of the address to the Crown in the first Parliament after the passing of the Reform Act, is at length, after almost continuous labour for ten years, completed. Nearly four hundred persons, whose portraits are introduced, have sat to the artist, so that some idea may be formed of the difficulties he has had to overcome, and the indefatigable industry required to surmount them.

PUBLIC ESTIMATES.

THERE is an order of debating in the House of Commons which affecting the comforts, the interests, and the pockets of the people almost more than any other which is resorted to—is yet passed over by the great bulk of the reading community, either with an unaccountable or nonchalant indifference, or with the slightest possible amount of observation and regard. There is a much greater desire on the part of newspaper readers generally for the pleasurable and exciteful in the intelligence of the moment than for the true extract of public knowledge from the spirit of the times. With regard to what passes in Parliament, how much more are men fixed by the reputation of the speakers than by the matter with which they illustrate their thoughts—how far more ardently do they rush to what is eloquent than nurse the satisfaction of criticism for what is sound. Is the debate one involving large principles—a question of state policy—of political contest—of religion—of philosophy—of domestic injustice or abuse—then the eager world is greedy for the labours of the journalist to unfold to it, not the abstract truth and value of the propositions urged or combatted, but simply the strength, interest, and order of the battle—how the leaders played their part in the warfare, and what eloquences of advocacy or opposition produced the crisis of triumph or defeat. The excitement is the thing. But produce some theme without that electric attraction—some dry subject, upon which the pleasure of reasoning is not equal to the use—some maze of statistics, which should be threaded with art and caution—long lines of figures, civil contingencies, wearying estimates, dull, uninteresting returns—and, although the journalist still does his duty of recording what these subjects elicit from the house—pigmy in size and small indeed in number is that portion of the public which condescends to examine, or even to peruse. In this respect we must candidly compare the community to some careless, but not too wealthy, old bachelor, who entrusts his affairs to the management of a bad housekeeper—a lady of easy virtue in the practice of expenditure, and who pays his bills with an alacrity which quite disdains and repudiates anything like a proper examination into the items and errors of the accounts. No doubt the housekeeper is as much to blame as the bachelor; and in the case of bachelor John Bull and stewardess the House of Commons, there is unquestionably a pretty even amount of culpability resting upon both. The public does not take care of its own money, and the Parliament is not a little pliable in leaving its own proper responsibility to the business-like expedition of the Government of the day.

Honestly, we are of those who think that public money is voted too lavishly and rapidly—and that the estimates are accelerated through the Legislature at an unfair rate of speed, considering the deep-seated distresses of the country, and the evidence of stern necessity for economy which is presented in the afflicting depression of nearly all the ranks of the people which form the links of the chain between the capitalists and the poor. We are not of the school of Hume, or of his imitator, Mr. Williams. We would not have the nation either penny-wise, parsimonious, or illiberal, in the management of its exchequer—we would have it fulfil with justice, freedom, and dignity the destinies of a great empire, and not allow the taint of meanness, or miserly alloy, to sully the wonderful reputation which it has sustained in the sight of the world; but we would have the community prone to inquire into and regulate its sources of expenditure—to watch that in times of severe trouble none of the more enormous items are spent in paying for the oppression of the poor—to see that the stream of taxation is carried into legitimate channels, neither promoting jobbery here, nor the influences of tyranny there—nor permitting anywhere an useless and unfair extravagance, in which no public benefit could result. All that we would have our legislators do for us on this behalf we would have done upon broad principles—and nothing in a quibbling spirit, or with an envious and petty design. In the state, as in the private gentleman, let there be nobility and generosity of heart, without

HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS ALBERT EDWARD PRINCE OF WALES.—BORN NOV. 9, 1841.*

Child of the Queen and People—for Love's bond
Bids them, no less than her, deem thee their own—
Now thou art but a baby of the throne,
The petted beauty of the fair and fond;
The sun of childhood shining in thy heart,
While its light frolic plays upon thy cheek,
And thou among the delicate and weak
Of the world's flowers. Years, that strength impart,
Shall into manhood thy brave limbs unfold;
May heaven, too, cast thy soul in Honour's mould;
That so, unfurl'd for greatness, the fair sails
Of thy life-ship may fill with fav'ring gales
Of popular esteem;—and pride untold
Make England glory in her Prince of Wales!

Then, when thy years have into fulness grown,
And thou art as a tree—Oh, may thy fruit
Be worthy of the rich and noble root
That thou didst spring from! Grace but thou thy throne
Like thy young mother!—so much lustre shed,
To shine beyond the jewels in thy crown!
Be like thy sire, when love shall bid thee wed,
And wear the virtues which they both hand down:
So shall the nation bless thee for thy worth
In manhood, as it bless'd thy childhood's birth;
So shall thy fame to other nations ring,
And thou unto thy trusting subjects cling—
Who then, above all other kings of earth,
Will make old England glory in her king!

the wilful waste and unjust profuseness which pervert liberality into a crime.

We know not if our readers may have noticed the debates on "Supply," in the House of Commons, on Monday evening. A number of minor topics of expenditure were brought forward, and they may elucidate some bearings upon our arguments here; they may prove that in Parliament, as out of doors, there is often much cry with little need of it—and that the small culprit may be loudly shouted after, while the larger criminal may be suffered silently to escape. Of all the complaints made upon the estimates mooted on that evening, there was hardly a tithe of ordinary economy that could be called forth—while many and many an outrageous estimate has been whipped upon a wing of lightening, and without a murmur of regret. The "ridiculus mus" is hooted after—the "montes" escape regard. Mr. Williams cavilled at our ambassadorial expenses, and would level them with the diplomatic outlay of the United States. So would not we. Monarchical and wealthy England does not require that the principles and practice of other governments should be applied to the payment of men who represent our sovereign in foreign countries, and have to maintain her grandeur and her dignity abroad. The just limit is all that we require to see preserved. Neither do the items for Lord Wilton's mission of honour, bearing a compliment from England to the sovereign of Saxony, seem worthy of a reproach. Lord Wilton, like an English nobleman, paid his own expenses, and the state disbursed the outfit and salaries of its appointed heralds out of its own purse. Mr. Hume would have packed one of the most coveted rewards and honours of British chivalry in a deal box; and, if there had been a high-road on broad land from London to Saxony, would have booked it thither in a Parcels Delivery cart! The christening of the Prince of Wales was another bugbear! Well, that christening was a national affair—involving curious—stimulating trade—distributing money among the people—and paid for out of her proper revenue by the Queen herself. All the public had to defray was the fitting up of St. George's Chapel! Again, from prince to prelacy, the item was objected to with respect to the establishment of the bishoprics of Guiana, Gibraltar, Barbadoes, Antigua, and Tasmania. The result of the discussion proved that a sacrifice on the part of the former prelates of Barbadoes, and a twelvemonth's being, had effected an actual saving of £1500 to the country, and that the combined salaries in all the new sees did not exceed the aggregate remuneration in the old one. Here was another absurdity of complaint. The English people have no objection to the legitimate promotion and support of Christianity in any quarter of the globe—least of all in their own colonies, where they would gladly blend the influence of religion with the civil and maternal protection which they are proud to see their country bestow.

Over many other trifles there was an equal measure of useless quibbling, which explanation dissolved in air; the only sensible stand made during the evening being that for the more free admission of the public to recreative walks and parks—a desirable object, which we earnestly hope to see effected, and which the fact of the people being taxed, to keep such places in order, unquestionably entitles them to enjoy.

But what we want to bring our readers to now, is a sense of the legislatorial activity in small matters and listlessness in large. Why not watch and attack salient points of extravagance, when public money is wasted to do the public harm? Why not sweep away, for example, the leviathan expenditure of the Poor-law Commission, its acts of extortion by taxes—its oppression in having unfairly held and used? Why not direct the axe of economy against similar public grievances against whatever is unjust in principle as well as enormous in expense? Why be for ever seeking to move away the mere weeds of prodigality, without raising the arm of energy to fell the rooted trees? We begin by declaring that the public does not look sufficiently after its finances—that the Legislature, moreover, is indifferent and reckless in voting away the treasure that grows up from tax—we believe so surely, and end with a repetition of that belief; but in awakening attention to the subject we wish to see it grappled in its glantude and not in its dwarfish symbols, and to vindicate the practice of economy with principles and not with straws.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE, PARIS, March 28, 1843.—(From our own Correspondent.)—Within the last week many rumours have been afloat respecting the treaty of commerce between England and France, and even those who pretend to be well informed believed this delicate question was on the point of being brought to a close. Now, I can state, in a manner the most positive, there will be no treaty of commerce between England and France during the present year; not that Ministers are adverse, but such is the hostility of many of the principal manufacturers that Guizot dare not seriously for the present take up the question. The hardware and iron-masters, many of whom are deputies, have sent delegates to Paris to watch the Minister, and he is threatened with a formidable opposition in the Chambers should he advance a step. On the other hand the wine growers are raising heaven and earth to bring about the treaty; they also have delegates in Paris, but they are greatly discouraged, for should they fail they are ruined. The wine-growers of Bordeaux and Burgundy are in a most deplorable condition, owing in a great measure to their cultivating more than they can sell. Guizot, tormented by both, discourages neither, and with the pretext that he can do nothing during the session of Parliament, he will gain time till December next.

Many diplomatic notes are passing between Guizot, Lord Cowley, and the Austrian Ambassador relative to the affairs of Servia. I am inclined to think the French Government is playing false, having been most positively assured that two agents have been sent into Servia on a secret mission. The French manufacturers are seriously turning their attention to the China market, and much discussion has taken place in the different Chambers of Commerce; that of Mulhouse resolved in sending out three agents, and requested the Government to give them such protection as would protect them in their "voyage of discovery;" the Minister has refused lending his influence, and I believe the project will be abandoned; it will, however, be as well that a careful watch should be kept on this head not only in France but in China.

Several petitions have been presented to the Chamber of Deputies, praying a reduction in the postage. Many of the deputies are favourable to a fixed postage of 6 sous, but the Minister of Finance has declared that he will not consent to any alteration; therefore this question is settled.

Guizot will remain Minister at least for a twelvemonth, and France is quiet; but outward appearances, particularly here, are sometimes deceitful. Much intrigue is still going on; and now that the "right of search" is disposed of, "the regency" is the order of the day. A great party is getting up in favour of the Duchess of Orleans, at the head of which is Thiers. The army is divided in opinion. It was greatly attached to the late Duke of Orleans, and bears no love to the Duke of Nemours, notwithstanding all his endeavours to curry favour with it. The people, too, are against the duke, whom they call "the proud aristocrat." This unpleasant state of affairs seriously occupies the attention of the King; he is making himself popular with the army, and intends, in order to crave the good graces of the greasy chins of the south, to visit that part of France during the summer. The Duke of Nemours will also make a tour of frontier. Such a step I am afraid neither will succeed; the enlightened and civilized democrats of France are so demoralised, that changes and revolutions will only satisfy their cravings instead of attending to their work they pass their time in the cabarets, discussing political questions; indeed, to such an extent do they carry this fever, that during the hours they are obliged, from necessity, to be in the workshop, a person is paid—generally an old man of many pensions—to reads aloud the leading articles of the different opposition papers; then follow cessation of labour, discussion and its consequence, misery and crime—occasioned to the latter by the absence of the "father." Such is the state of Paris that it is impossible to pass the barrier after dusk without running the risk of being assassinated: it was only on Friday last that two miscreants, Nicolas and Despres, were guillotined in the barrière a murder committed near the barrière! A striking proof was on this occasion given of the immorality of the Parisian population. The day previous to the execution was Mi-Carême, and there were many masked balls; after passing the night in debauch, the dancers, in their masquerade dresses, surrounded the guillotine, and the culprits quitted this world amidst laughing, bon mots, and the music of a neighbouring dance room!! There are now ready for trial two other vazabonds for murder, committed without the barrière, and within the last week, in different parts of France; three persons have been found guilty of parricide; two women, aided by their paramours, of empoisoning the husband; and one fellow of murdering his wife!! The French who visit London complain of the number of beggars who infest the streets: this is true; but are there fewer beggars in London than in Paris? a fact that not a day passes without some twenty or more unfortunate beings being brought before the "Police Correctionnel," and punished for beggary—there are other beggars working with permission from the police.

The re-election of officers, to command the National Guards of Paris, has been in favour of those belonging to the Conservative party. It is a strange circumstance, and shows, more than anything else, the state of feeling in France, that the government can only place confidence in the National Guards of Paris—indeed very few other towns possess any; there have been no National Guards in Lyons, Grenoble, and other populous cities for the last 10 years.

Admiral Dupetit Thouars is now master of the whole of the Society Islands. "The Mercury," Admiral Dupetit Thouars's flag-ship, composed of four companies of artillery; and five companies of marines, are about to be sent out.

The French are determined to have the "Joint Stock Bank." Independent of that of Lafitte, another will be opened on the 15th of April, at the head of which is a highly respectable deputy, a M. Ganneron, having for co-director a M. Pierre Lefevre.

The opera of "Don Pasquale" has filled the treasury of the Italian Opera. The music by Donizetti is light and harmonious, and is most exquisitely given by Grisi, Tamburini, and Lablache. The season closes with this truly delightful opera. The Opéra Comique is about to lose two of its best augurs—such as Roger and Madame Rossi Caccia. Roger leaves for Italy. Musard and suite have left Paris for Lyons: it is not known when they will return. The celebrated violinist Camillo Sivori intends leaving Paris in a few days for London. Dreyschock, the astonishing Bohemian pianist, also intends visiting London this season.

We have had much discussion during the past week whether Napoleon, on the statue about to be erected on the esplanade of the Invalids, should be dressed as a Frenchman or Roman—the French carried the day.

The fine arts have lost a great friend in the Prince de Chimay, who died at Toulouse on the 2nd of March, aged 71 years. The prince was the third son of the Duke de Caraman, and in 1789 he emigrated to Hambro', where he supported himself in giving lessons in music. On his return to France he became possessor of the title and property of his uncle Philippe Maurice Gabriel d'Alsace, 14th Prince de Chimay. It was at the Château of the Prince that Cherubini composed his finest works, and Auber his first opera.

BRUSSELS, March 26, 1843.—A letter from Cologne, of 19th March, says "Serious suspicions respecting the robbery committed in the cathedral of Aix-la-Chapelle are fixed on two Englishmen, who have long resided at that watering-place, and have daily visited the treasury. On his return to France he became possessor of this

hon. and learned gentleman then dwelt upon the means which had been resorted to for the purpose of exciting the people, until at length the country was brought to the verge of a civil war; and deeply regretted that this motion should have been made while the parties who had brought the north of England into that condition were yet to be submitted to the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench for their violation of the law. It was assumed by the Chartists that if they committed no actual violence, they were not violating the law, but although the mildest form of prosecution had been adopted towards them, he had no hesitation in saying that parties thus engaged in stopping the progress of justice and disseminating treason, for the purpose of changing the law of the land, were guilty of high treason. In one instance, a bill of high treason had been found, but the Government was unwilling to pursue it. There could be no question that the parties were engaged in combination [illegible] and that the object of [illegible] was to intimidate the Government into the adoption of such measures as might be agreeable to the [illegible] but it was supposed they were dealing with the crime of high treason. In conclusion, he expressed his confident opinion that if it were possible to bring any charge whatever against the Government, it could only be that they had been too lenient in the prosecution of the offenders during the recent disturbances.—Lord F. Egerton remarked upon the circumstance (unprecedented in former times of riot and disturbance), that the people in Lancashire showed every disposition to refrain from outrage and bloodshed; and which, therefore, would cause deep regret if the military force had been unnecessarily resorted to. In the riot which took place at Preston, however, there was no alternative, for a small force together with the magistrates, were placed in the most imminent danger before fire-arms were resorted to.—Mr. Packington defended the magistrates of Dudley from the charge made against them by some of the gentlemen opposite, of having been too severe. It was a very bad return to the magistracy who had acted with so much promptitude and decision in restoring the peace of the country, when it was so alarmingly endangered, to attempt to place upon them the responsibility which had generally conducted themselves with the greatest forbearance and discretion, under the perilous circumstances in which the north of England was placed at the time.—Mr. G. Wood defended the conduct of the Manchester district magistrates, not only as to the bail, but also as to the treatment of the prisoners, which was as lenient as the crowded state of the prison would admit. He would point in favour of Mr. Duncombe's motion, in order to show that he was not afraid of inquiry, although he by no means thought that the hon. member had made out a case for inquiry. (A laugh.)—Colonel Thompson, as chief of the police at Nottingham, replied to the charges made against those magistrates by Mr. Duncombe.—Captain Berkeley said, from what he had heard, he believed the magistrates had not exceeded their duty; but still he had heard no more than by his honourable friend's motion for an inquiry, and should therefore support it.—Mr. Brotherton said he had listened most attentively to the debate, and he must say that he could not support the motion. In his opinion, the conduct of the magistrates of Manchester was most praiseworthy, and he believed they had done everything which could be done under the circumstances.—Mr. Bingham Baring defended the magistrates for the mode and error of refusing bail, yet they had acted bonâ fide to prevent the spread of the excitement by means of the inflammatory harangues of the parties who had been arrested. Mr. Scorry, of Bristol, supported the motion, on the ground that the bail demanded by the magistrates was excessive, and that no sufficient answer had been given to some of the other allegations.—Sir J. Graham said that the speech of his honourable friend the Attorney-General had been wholly unanswered. It was already decided by the Court of Queen's Bench that the magistrates in the Dudley case had acted with an erroneous view of the law; but, although the magistrates had acted with a correct intention to preserve the public peace in a crisis of great moment, the court refused to grant a criminal information; though, as they had acted illegally, the law was discharged on their paying the costs. The fullest investigation had taken place, and he could not see what further inquiry it was necessary to institute. He feared there was some truth in the observation of Sir C. Napier on the previous evening, that no one was on the side of the Government. The gallant officer before him (Capt. Pechell) was haunted by the Gilbertinians, who on his own member rent him (Mr. Ferrand) was haunted by an assailant pour-les-communes, and behind Mr. Mott and his motion sat Keighley always before him with the utmost horror. The hon. member for Finsbury had his monomania also, and took it for granted that the judges were determined not to do justice; that the magistrates were all wrong; that juries were all wrong in their decisions; and that the Chartists were the very emblems of the purest innocence, utterly incapable of doing anything whatever contrary to propriety. (Laughter.)—Mr. Milner Gibson said he had nothing to say in favour of the petitioners, whose conduct and proceedings he did not approve of; but if it were not for the proceedings in the Court of Queen's Bench, he would have supported the motion. As, however, the decision of the Queen's Bench had shown the magistrates the legality of their conduct, he could not see the necessity of the motion.—After a few words from Mr. V. Stuart, Mr. Ainsworth, and Captain Vivian, Mr. Duncombe, in reply, said he might be labouring under monomania, but he believed it was a monomania entirely of the nature of that of the house (much laughter), at all events by those in the manufacturing districts, house then divided, and the motion of Mr. Duncombe was negatived by a majority of 196 to 38.—The other orders of the day were then disposed of, and the house adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS. Wednesday.

There being but thirty members present at 4 o'clock, the house adjourned until Thursday.

HOUSE OF LORDS. -Thursday.

The Lord Chancellor took his seat on the Woolsack at 5 o'clock. The African Settlements Bill went through committee, and was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow. The Consolidated Fund Bill was read a third time and passed.—Lord Wharncliffe laid on the table the 10th Report of the Commissioners of Criminal Law Inquiry. -The Earl of Wicklow moved for returns respecting the distillery laws in Ireland, which, after a long conversation in which Lord Monteagle, the Duke of Wellington, and Lord Fitzgerald took part, was acceded to, and their lordships adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Thursday.

The Speaker took the chair at the usual hour.—The Birkenhead Cemetery Bill and the Birkenhead Improvement Bill were read a third time and passed.—The Sheffield, Ashton-under-Lyne, and Manchester Railway Bill was read a third time and passed.—Mr. Hume, after having given notice that he should, on to-morrow, move for certain returns connected with the Mint, proceeded to say that he should, a week ago, announced his intention of postponing, until Tuesday next, his motion respecting the Secretary of Legation. He had, however, found, upon inquiry, that he could not, in all probability, bring forward the motion on the day in question, as other members would obtain precedence of him with their motions; and as he had ascertained that every business from this and Easter was now engaged, he would, on Friday week for his motion, and take his chance.—In answer to Mr. Hume, Sir R. Peel stated that he should adjourn for the Easter holidays on next Wednesday week to the Monday week following. On the question that the dropped orders of the day be read, Mr. Escott rose to put a question to the right honourable second Secretary of State for the Home Department, with regard to the administration of criminal justice in Ireland. Sir J. Graham said he should have the early attention of Government.—Mr. Ross gave notice that he would put a question to the right honourable baronet the Secretary for the Home Department to-morrow whether he would institute a charge against his friend Registration Bill to do away with the necessity of Roman Catholics taking what is commonly called the Roman Catholic oath.—Mr. Hume moved the reading of a new writ for Nottingham Lincoln, seconded the motion.—Mr. J. O. Corbane moved, amidst much laughter, that Mr. Walter be allowed to stand again for Nottingham. Mr. Hogg said, in giving the vote which he had as chairman of the committee, we have been the consequence of the proof given of the existence of an organised system of bribery by the central committee, of which committee Mr. Walter's two agents were members.—Lord J. Russell said the Legislature had shown every disposition to discourage bribery, and if the act of last session were well carried out, he thought it would tend to diminish the evil greatly.—Mr. Bernal asked if a doubtful question whether Mr. Walter was or was not disqualified from offering himself again for Nottingham.—Mr. D'Israeli contended that bribery had greatly decreased in Nottingham, and hoped Mr. Walter would be able to stand at the next election.—Mr. Gladstone said a bad been already decided in the case of Newcastle under-Lyme (Mr. Harris) that, under such circumstances, a gentleman could not stand during the same Parliament.—A long debate here took place between Mr. Roebuck, Mr. Ellice, Lord John Manners, Mr. Hume, Sir J. Hanmer, Mr. Brotherton, Mr. Aglionby, and Mr. S. Crawford took part, leave was given to bring in the bill. Sir V. Blake moved for leave to bring in a bill to repeal and abolish all the oaths now taken by members of Parliament, on taking their seats, except the oath of allegiance.—Sir J. Graham did not think it to be either politic or expedient to disturb the existing law, and opposed the motion.—A debate ensued; and, on a division, the motion was rejected by 194 to 17.—Mr. Elphinstone then moved for leave to bring in a bill for establishing a court for marriage and divorce, which was opposed by Sir R. H. Inglis; and, after a brief conversation, the house divided: For the bill, 47; Against it, 47.—The Speaker gave his casting vote in favour of the bill, which was brought in and read a first time.—The house then adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Friday.

The Lord Chancellor took his seat on the Woolsack at five o'clock.—A message from the Commons brought up the Birkenhead Improvement Bill and the Imperial Continental Gas Bill, which were read a first, and ordered to be read a second time on Monday.—On the motion of Viscount Hawarden the Sudbury Disfranchisement Bill was read a second time, and ordered to be committed on Monday.—The Duke of Wellington gave notice that he should, on Tuesday, the 11th of April, move the adjournment of the house for the Easter recess to Tuesday, the 25th. (Hear.)—Mr. Hutt attended with a deputation from the Commons, requesting that Lord Ashburton might be permitted to attend and give evidence before the committee appointed to examine into the law affecting aliens.—The Earl of Galloway presented a petition from the Presbytery of Dunse, in the county of Berwick, complaining of the inadequacy of the legal allowances for schoolmasters in Scotland.—Lord Campbell then rose to bring forward the resolutions respecting the Scotch Church of which he had given notice, and which will be found in our Leader report of Tuesday last.—The Earl of Aberdeen said from anything he could observe on the part of the General Assembly and the leaders of the church, he could not hope that any measure, even the most extensive concession, would be sufficient to check the extravagant demands recently put forward in the petition to her Majesty and in the claim of right. Should the threatened secession really take place, Lord Campbell's resolutions would be entirely out of the question before the house, and no one could say that these ministers were driven into the adoption of such a step either by the Government or the Legislature.—Lord Brougham declared that he could never consent to disturbances now in order that they never would have taken place had it not been for the passing of the new Poor law. While these disturbances were going forward, he was called upon, but he asked the workmen what they wanted? They replied that they wanted twelve hours' wages for ten hours' work. He thought the request reasonable, and at once conceded it; and told the magistrates that if his workmen would not protect him, he did not require the protection of the magistrates or the military. He was not annoyed during all the scenes which subsequently took place around him. He should support the motion of Mr. Duncombe.—Mr. Clive said he had defended the conduct of the magistrates, who had generally conducted themselves with the greatest forbearance and discretion, under the perilous circumstances in which the north of England was placed at the time.—Mr. G. Wood defended the conduct of the Manchester district magistrates, not only as to the bail, but also as to the treatment of the prisoners, which was as lenient as the crowded state of the prison would admit. The Consolidated Fund Bill was read a third time and passed.—Lord Wharncliffe laid on the table the 10th Report of the Commissioners of Criminal Law Inquiry. -The Earl of Wicklow moved for returns respecting the distillery laws in Ireland, which, after a long conversation in which Lord Monteagle, the Duke of Wellington, and Lord Fitzgerald took part, was acceded to, and their lordships adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Thursday.

The Speaker took the chair at the usual hour.—The Birkenhead Cemetery Bill and the Birkenhead Improvement Bill were read a third time and passed.—The Sheffield, Ashton-under-Lyne, and Manchester Railway Bill was read a third time and passed.—The Chipping Norton Water Works Bill was read a third time and passed.—Mr. Hume, after having given notice that he should, on to-morrow, move for certain returns connected with the Mint, proceeded to say that he should, a week ago, announced his intention of postponing, until Tuesday next, his motion respecting the Secretary of Legation. He had, however, found, upon inquiry, that he could not, in all probability, bring forward the motion on the day in question, as other hon. members would obtain precedence of him with their motions; and as he had ascertained that every business from this and Easter was now engaged, he would, on Friday week for his motion, and take his chance.—In answer to Mr. Hume, Sir R. Peel stated that he should adjourn for the Easter holidays on next Wednesday week to the Monday week following. On the question that the dropped orders of the day be read, Mr. Escott rose to put a question to the right honourable second Secretary of State for the Home Department, with regard to the administration of criminal justice in Ireland. Sir J. Graham said he should have the early attention of Government.—Mr. Ross gave notice that he would put a question to the right honourable baronet the Secretary for the Home Department to-morrow whether he would institute a charge against his friend Registration Bill to do away with the necessity of Roman Catholics taking what is commonly called the Roman Catholic oath.—Mr. Hume moved the reading of a new writ for Nottingham Lincoln, seconded the motion.—Mr. J. O. Corbane moved, amidst much laughter, that Mr. Walter be allowed to stand again for Nottingham. Mr. Hogg said, in giving the vote which he had as chairman of the committee, we have been in consequence of the proof given of the existence of an organised system of bribery by the central committee, of which committee Mr. Walter's two agents were members.—Lord J. Russell said the Legislature had shown every disposition to discourage bribery, and if the act of last session were well carried out, he thought it would tend to diminish the evil greatly.—Mr. Bernal asked if a doubtful question whether Mr. Walter was or was not disqualified from offering himself again for Nottingham.—Mr. D'Israeli contended that bribery had greatly decreased in Nottingham, and hoped Mr. Walter would be able to stand at the next election.—Mr. Gladstone said a had been already decided in the case of Newcastle under-Lyme (Mr. Harris) that, under such circumstances, a gentleman could not stand during the same Parliament.—A long debate here took place between Mr. Roebuck, Mr. Ellice, Lord John Manners, Mr. Hume, Sir J. Hanmer, Mr. Brotherton, Mr. Aglionby, and Mr. S. Crawford took part, leave was given to bring in the bill. Sir V. Blake moved for leave to bring in a bill to repeal and abolish all the oaths now taken by members of Parliament, on taking their seats, except the oath of allegiance.—Sir J. Graham did not think it to be either politic or expedient to disturb the existing law, and opposed the motion.—A debate ensued; and, on a division, the motion was rejected by 194 to 17.—Mr. Elphinstone then moved for leave to bring in a bill for establishing a court for marriage and divorce, which was opposed by Sir R. H. Inglis; and, after a brief conversation, the house divided: For the bill, 47; Against it, 47.—The Speaker gave his casting vote in favour of the bill, which was brought in and read a first time.—The house then adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Friday.

The Lord Chancellor took his seat on the Woolsack at five o'clock.—A message from the Commons brought up the Birkenhead Improvement Bill and the Imperial Continental Gas Bill, which were read a first, and ordered to be read a second time on Monday.—On the motion of Viscount Hawarden the Sudbury Disfranchisement Bill was read a second time, and ordered to be committed on Monday.—The Duke of Wellington gave notice that he should, on Tuesday, the 11th of April, move the adjournment of the house for the Easter recess to Tuesday, the 25th. (Hear.)—Mr. Hutt attended with a deputation from the Commons, requesting that Lord Ashburton might be permitted to attend and give evidence before the committee appointed to examine into the law affecting aliens.—The Earl of Galloway presented a petition from the Presbytery of Dunse, in the county of Berwick, complaining of the inadequacy of the legal allowances for schoolmasters in Scotland.—Lord Campbell then rose to bring forward the resolutions respecting the Scotch Church of which he had given notice, and which will be found in our Leader report of Tuesday last.—The Earl of Aberdeen said from anything he could observe on the part of the General Assembly and the leaders of the church, he could not hope that any measure, even the most extensive concession, would be sufficient to check the extravagant demands recently put forward in the petition to her Majesty and in the claim of right. Should the threatened secession really take place, Lord Campbell's resolutions would be entirely out of the question before the house, and no one could say that these ministers were driven into the adoption of such a step either by the Government or the Legislature.—Lord Brougham declared that he could never consent to disturbances now in order that they never would have taken place had it not been for the passing of the new Poor law. While these disturbances were going forward, he was called upon, but he asked the workmen what they wanted? They replied that they wanted twelve hours' wages for ten hours' work. He thought the request reasonable, and at once conceded it; and told the magistrates that if his workmen would not protect him, he did not require the protection of the magistrates or the military. He was not annoyed during all the scenes which subsequently took place around him. He should support the motion of Mr. Duncombe.—Mr. Clive said he had defended the conduct of the magistrates, who had generally conducted themselves with the greatest forbearance and discretion, under the perilous circumstances in which the north of England was placed at the time.—Mr. G. Wood defended the conduct of the Manchester district magistrates, not only as to the bail, but also as to the treatment of the prisoners, which was as lenient as the crowded state of the prison would admit. He would point in favour of Mr. Duncombe's motion, in order to show that he was not afraid of inquiry, although he by no means thought that the hon. member had made out a case for inquiry. (A laugh.)—Colonel Thompson, as chief of the police at Nottingham, replied to the charges made against those magistrates by Mr. Duncombe.—Captain Berkeley said, from what he had heard, he believed the magistrates had not exceeded their duty; but still he had heard no more than by his honourable friend's motion for an inquiry, and should therefore support it.—Mr. Brotherton said he had listened most attentively to the debate, and he must say that he could not support the motion. In his opinion, the conduct of the magistrates of Manchester was most praiseworthy, and he believed they had done everything which could be done under the circumstances.—Mr. Bingham Baring defended the magistrates for the mode and error of refusing bail, yet they had acted bonâ fide to prevent the spread of the excitement by means of the inflammatory harangues of the parties who had been arrested. Mr. Scorry, of Bristol, supported the motion, on the ground that the bail demanded by the magistrates was excessive, and that no sufficient answer had been given to some of the other allegations.—Sir J. Graham said that the speech of his honourable friend the Attorney-General had been wholly unanswered. It was already decided by the Court of Queen's Bench that the magistrates in the Dudley case had acted with an erroneous view of the law; but, although the magistrates had acted with a correct intention to preserve the public peace in a crisis of great moment, the court refused to grant a criminal information; though, as they had acted illegally, the law was discharged on their paying the costs. The fullest investigation had taken place, and he could not see what further inquiry it was necessary to institute. He feared there was some truth in the observation of Sir C. Napier on the previous evening, that no one was on the side of the Government. The gallant officer before him (Capt. Pechell) was haunted by the Gilbertinians, who on his own member rent him (Mr. Ferrand) was haunted by an assailant pour-les-communes, and behind Mr. Mott and his motion sat Keighley always before him with the utmost horror. The hon. member for Finsbury had his monomania also, and took it for granted that the judges were determined not to do justice; that the magistrates were all wrong in their decisions; and that the Chartists were the very emblems of the purest innocence, utterly incapable of doing anything whatever contrary to propriety. (Laughter.)—Mr. Milner Gibson said he had nothing to say in favour of the petitioners, whose conduct and proceedings he did not approve of; but if it were not for the proceedings in the Court of Queen's Bench, he would have supported the motion. As, however, the decision of the Queen's Bench had shown the magistrates the legality of their conduct, he could not see the necessity of the motion.—After a few words from Mr. V. Stuart, Mr. Ainsworth, and Captain Vivian, Mr. Duncombe, in reply, said he might be labouring under monomania, but he believed it was a monomania entirely of the nature of that of the house (much laughter), at all events by those in the manufacturing districts. house then divided, and the motion of Mr. Duncombe was negatived by a majority of 196 to 38.—The other orders of the day were then disposed of, and the house adjourned.

IRELAND.

The Waterford Chronicle mentions that the poor-law insurrection is at an end, the landlords, in most instances, having undertaken to pay the rate. It is uncertain when a similar outbreak will take place. The Court of Exchequer has already decided that the landlords in Gaultier is likely to be relied upon by the people in other parts of Ireland.

The Anti-Tracy.—There is no foundation whatever for the report that Major Macnamara, M.P., and his two brothers, were dismissed from the Commission of the Peace for the county Clare.

Accident to Sir Richard Musgrave.—Mary The Cork Constitution says that this esteemed baronet, while entering a boat on the Blackwater last week, over-balanced himself, and tumbled headforemost into the river. He sank twice, but fortunately assistance was promptly given him, and he was rescued.

O'Connell and Charles Dickens.—We perceive by a letter from Mr. O'Connell to the proprietor of the Dublin Pilot, that the honourable and learned gentleman disclaims the severe and inelegant language attributed to him in reference to Mr. Charles Dickens, which it will be remembered went the round of the press some weeks ago, as having been addressed by Mr. O'Connell to the editor of an American paper. In his letter to the Pilot Mr. O'Connell says—"The thing is, from beginning to end, a gross lie. I never wrote a letter to that newspaper; nor am I in the habit of corresponding with the editors of American papers. I have seen, indeed, with great contempt, but without much surprise, in several American newspapers, letters deliberately published under my signature, given to the American public as genuine documents—all, of course, being forgeries, but published by the editors as if perfectly genuine. Few people admire more the writings of Dickens, or read them with deeper interest than I do. I am greatly pleased with his 'American Notes.' They give me, I think, a clearer idea of everyday life in America than I ever entertained before. And his chapter containing the advertisements respecting negro slavery is more calculated to augment the fixed detestation of slavery than the most brilliant declamation or the most splendid eloquence. That chapter shows out the hideous features of the system far better than any dissertation on the evils would possibly produce them—odious and disgusting to the public eye. But I cannot heap deploring one paragraph in the work. It is one full of the ignorant and decadent spirit of infidelity, respecting the rigid order of Benedictine Monks. I say of infidelity—because surely no Christian man could place upon an equality the duellist-murderer with the ascetic servant of the crucified Christ."

The Limerick Chronicle states that illicit whiskey is now commonly hawked about the streets of that city, and that on Saturday the police apprehended an individual in our Leader report of Tuesday last.—The Earl of Aberdeen said from anything he could observe on the part of the General Assembly and the leaders of the church, he could not hope that any measure, even the most extensive concession, would be sufficient to check the extravagant demands recently put forward in the petition to her Majesty and in the claim of right. Should the threatened secession really take place, Lord Campbell's resolutions would be entirely out of the question before the house, and no one could say that these ministers were driven into the adoption of such a step either by the Government or the Legislature.—Lord Brougham declared that he could never consent to disturbances now in order that they never would have taken place had it not been for the passing of the new Poor law. POPULAR PORTRAITS.—No. XXXV.

LORD LYNDHURST.

John Singleton Copley, Baron Lyndhurst, has associated the highest eminence in the law with a name distinguished by a reputation in the very different pursuit of art. He is the son of J. S. Copley, Esq., R.A., a painter of considerable ability, though his place is not among the highest names which the study has given to the world. Though we have said that the skill of the lawyer and that of the artist are of a very different kind, we know not but some analogy may be discovered between them. Does not the able advocate show great skill in colouring his case? Would he not for his client add another hue to the rainbow, might he thereby be enabled to give another tinge of brightness to the cause which has bought him "with a great sum."[1] Does he not cast discreetly into shade all the parts of his cause which would not bear too much light? And does not he blacken to a hue darker than the deepest of the shadows of Rembrandt all he can find capable of being so coloured in the case of his "learned friend?" We throw out this as a mere suggestive hint to the curious in such speculations, if they are inclined to consider how far the great, the commanding, the universally acknowledged talents of Lord Lyndhurst may or may not be hereditary. His lordship was born in 1772, and has therefore passed the three score and ten; but, contrary to the general theory, it seems to us that the intellects that have been the most exercised are the last to show any signs of decay. There is not a sign of mental weakness, no trace that a single faculty is impaired, in the present Lord Chancellor, at an age when so many among mankind fall physically to the "lean and slippered pantaloon" of the poet, and mentally are eclipsed by the "mere oblivion" of the second childhood. The political and legal duties of his high office are discharged with all the ability, judgment, and acuteness of the prime of life. He is one of the great lawyers who are not all law—not mere living abstracts of statutes and precedents, with heads that contain as much learning as their bookshelves, and on everything else but law appear to be dimmed and clouded with as much dust. As an equity lawyer, he is considered far superior to Lord Brougham, and even equal, considered only as a lawyer, to his immediate predecessor, Lord Cottenham. As a politician, he is a warm, and not at all scrupulous, partizan, while his great ability as an orator makes his opposition very effective and damaging, as the Whigs found to their cost in their days of office. His "sessional summaries" of the public business that had been done during the sitting of Parliament were most severe castigations, not so savage as one of the onsets of Brougham, who continually breathes out vengeance and slaughtering, "now he has got his former friends for foes," but even more effective, from the appearance they possessed of not being overdone. His style of speaking, too, is most pleasing—we were about to say captivating, nor do we know that the term is too strong to apply to it. His voice is one of the most beautiful that can be imagined, distinct without the least effort, and with a silvery clearness of tone in it, that the ear is gained by the manner, if the reason is not always satisfied with the matter of his speech. His allusions to classic literature, which are not unfrequent, are always in good taste, as well as skilfully introduced, and made applicable to the subject he is treating; and the structure of his sentences is both correct and elegant. He is one of the few speakers whose words might be printed as they fall from his lips, they require no arrangement to fit them for the reader. In the discharge of his duties he is not altogether so regular as a piece of clock-work, and in fulfilling the mere forms of his functions he goes through them "state and accents" with an air of most supreme indifference. Then his receiving and bringing up the bills of the Commons, from the bar to the table of the House of Lords; his manner is occasionally quite amusing; you see that familiarity with ceremony hath in him gone very far towards breeding a contempt for it. The matter-of-course tone of his "call in the messengers" fully prepares you for the easy carelessness with which he takes up the bag containing the great seal, on which, it seems, etiquette requires that a cushion should be covered, a napkin in the hand of a Lord-in-Waiting will be borne with quite as much reverence and regard for decents. He receives the bills and dismisses the messengers with the three necessary bows, which he converts into cordial nods of recognition rather than courtly genuflexions of ceremony (we doubt not they were such in the days of Wolsey), walks up to the Woolsack with something between a slouch and a halt, and, as his eyes are generally fixed on the floor as he goes, he often jostles a peer or two in his progress, but we do not remember his ever stopping to apologise. He takes out his eye-glass, reads the title of the bill or bills, hands them to the clerk, and sits down with the air of a man who has got through a piece of business necessary to be done, but which is rather a bore than otherwise. He appears to be rather impatient of long speeches if they happen, as they occasionally do in the House of Lords, to be rather dull; and we think we have at times detected a kind of cordiality and heartiness in his "that this House do now adjourn," as if the motion had his perfect concurrence. Lord Lyndhurst is High Steward of Cambridge University; he has been through all the higher offices of the law—those of Solicitor-General, Attorney-General, and Master of the Rolls. He was created a peer when made Lord Chancellor, in 1827, which office he held until 1830; from 1831 till 1834 he was Chief Baron of the Exchequer; and again Lord Chancellor, from Dec. 1834 till April 1835; he now fills this high office for the third time.

LORD LYNDHURST.

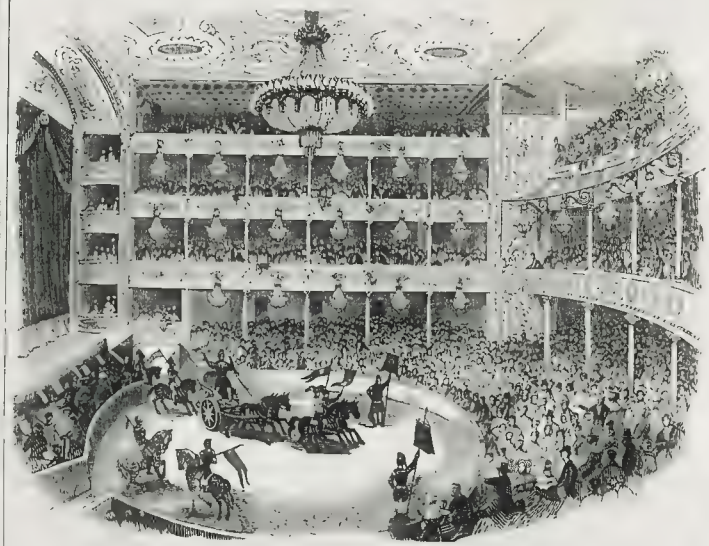
"ASTLEY'S" NEW AMPHITHEATRE.

This magnificent theatre will be ready for opening at the usual time, viz., Easter Monday. The external walls, built by Mr. Buckwell, jun., of Brighton, are 148 feet in length, and include an area larger than any other theatre in London. There are two fronts; the old one facing Westminster-road, the only part of the former building left untouched by the late fire; the other facing the intended new street from Westminster-road to Stangate. This will form the entrance to the gallery. The box-entrance will be, as formerly, from the Westminster-road; thus the two entrances will possess the advantages of being widely separated from each other.

The general form of the interior is octagonal, and has been constructed by Messrs. Heywood and Nixon, from plans and models furnished by Mr. Usher, of whom those who remember the palmy days of the elder Astley will have an amusing recollection. The stock of jokes that form the staple commodities of modern clowns have mostly their origin in "Dickey Usher," while the tricks and transformations of pantomime are largely indebted to his mechanical inventions. Practical experience has enabled him to judge accurately of the advantages and defects of modern theatres, and his plans have succeeded in placing the ring, for the equestrian performances, in such a position that a perfect view can be obtained from the distant seats of the upper gallery. This has been considered of the greatest importance, for in most of the amphitheatres hitherto erected the architect has failed to afford a perfect view of the stage and ring combined to a majority of the audience.

The prevailing decorations are white, lemon-colour, green, and gold, with rich crimson hangings for the private boxes. There are two full tiers of boxes, and two half tiers, ranging evenly from the two galleries. Each of the full tiers contains nineteen open boxes. The circles are supported from the pit by eight Doric pillars and forty-six Corinthian columns, fluted in white and gold. There are six spacious saloons—two for the dress-circle, two for the pit, two for the upper boxes, with extensive refreshment places for the galleries. In the centre of the first tier is the royal box, tastefully ornamented. The new scenic curtain represents the triumphal procession to the Temple of Fame of the competitors from the games of the athletæ, with Fame distributing her gifts to the victorious Olympians. The decorations consist of copies of the productions of the ancient masters in entablatures of gold. From the rich allegorical dome is suspended a crystal and gold chandelier, emblematic of Fame holding the coursers of triumph. The proscenium forms a magnificent triumphal arch, and has been designed and erected by Mr. John Evans, the inventor and builder of the stage and proscenium of the St. James's and other theatres. The stage measures 75 feet by 101, and is fitted with substantial platforms for equestrian spectacles.

The proprietor, Mr. William Batty, has undertaken the rebuilding of the Amphitheatre entirely on his own resources.



INTERIOR OF "ASTLEY'S" AMPHITHEATRE.

HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.—A return made to the House of Commons, published this week, states that the total amount already expended for building the new Houses of Parliament is £730,483 10s.; the amount voted has been £438,500, and consequently £58,016 10s. is in hand unexpended, which will be required for works now in progress of completion. It is estimated that a further sum of £578,424 12s. 9d. will be required to complete the buildings. The total amount of Mr. Barry's estimate will, therefore, be £1,016,924 12s. 9d., besides what will be required for completing the landing-places, making good the pavings, furniture and fittings, and for decorations by works of art.

THE COMET.—WHO SHALL DECIDE?—Sir John Herschell, Sir James South, and other astronomers, have no doubt whatever that the brilliant light seen in the western hemisphere is the tail of a comet, while Mr. Cooper, who is at present in Italy, affirms that he has actually seen his nucleus, M. Foster, an astronomer of Bruges, in Flanders, in a letter in the Journal du Commerce d'Anvers, of the 23rd ult., says he has no doubt that the phenomenon is the zodiacal light. Mr. John Taylor, of Liverpool, in a letter published in one of the journals of that town, maintains the same opinion. The Cheltenham Chronicle says that the comet has been very visible at Cheltenham, where it was first taken by some for a lunar rainbow. It was very plainly to be seen in the west, on two or three nights of last week. The Echo de Vesonne, of Perigueux, of 22nd ult., has the following:—"Yesterday evening, about half-past seven o'clock, several persons of our town witnessed an extraordinary appearance in the heavens, a little above the horizon. It was that of a magnificent cross, appearing to the eye 50 metres in length and 30 in width, perfectly defined, with its head towards the north. It was visible for half an hour, and astonished all who saw it. We have this account from ocular witnesses, whose veracity we cannot doubt."

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

On Saturday last Donizetti's heretofore much injured opera of "Belisario" was vindicated even to the composer's heart's content, could he have been present to hear the magnificent manner in which it was performed, and witness the enthusiastic furore with which it was received. A cold indifference, owing to the barbarous attempt made to represent it on the same boards before in the season 1838, ever since prevailed against this partition (now proved to be one of the maestro's most felicitous serious productions); but still the avant-courrier fame of Fornasari as a great basso-contanti had raised the highest expectations, and these expectations were not only not disappointed, but realised to a fuller extent than we recollect ever to have been the case before within the walls of this theatre—in a double capacity too; for while all parties were enchanted with the new singer, and indeed we may say singers, those who had been previously displeased with the music of this opera had the additional pleasure of exchanging a prejudice, unjustly formed against it, for the highest admiration and delight. To describe Fornasari to those who have not been fortunate enough to have heard him is no easy undertaking. The best way is to draw upon their imagination at once, and tell them to form the beau ideal of the executive powers of the musical-dramatic art, and say that even then they may fall short of an adequate notion of this great artiste. But for some attempt at detail. We have already, in a former number, described the personal appearance of Fornasari as extremely portly and imposing; our business now is to particularize his perfections as a singer and histrionic deplorer of the passions, over which he possesses most absolute control. In the first department he possesses an extensive and sonorous voice, of most easy and agreeable inflection; the quality of its happily combined registers always corresponding with the sentiment which it has to express. This natural endowment has been most highly cultivated, and can at pleasure be used by its fortunate possessor with a most surprising agility, grace, and energy. In short, in the three great requisites to constitute a first-rate singer, namely, pathos, elegance, and flexibility, he is without a rival. With the first he affects us to the soul; with the second he captivates our most exquisite sense of refinement; while with the latter he astonishes us by the ease with which his immense voice is rendered submissive to the wildest flight of a highly soaring and excursive fancy—a fancy at the same time always within the reins of a refined taste and consummate judgment.

FORNASARI.

It is hard to say whether Fornasari excels the more in recitative, aria, or concerted singing. He had not sung more than a measure or two of the first when he convinced his auditors of his power in dramatic melody. In the next, the first opportunity he had of displaying his cantilena exhibited him as equally successful; and his duet and part singing throughout the piece finished him in the minds of a delighted audience as a complete singer. All were ready to exclaim "Quando tilium inesset parem?" and to allow that, much as had been promised, they did not find in him "carbonem pro thesauro"—a disappointment which had often before attended the highest expectations, injudiciously raised for others immeasurably his inferiors. His enunciation is most perfect. In the duet ("Sul campo della gloria") with Conti, who sang beautifully, he was particularly fine; and in the trio "Ah! se potessi piangere" nothing could exceed the mournful melancholy with which the persecuted hero sought to lament his being "fall'n from his high estate!"

If we are to consider the opera season but in its dawn at present, we care not how long may be prolonged the delay of its noon; in fact we might exclaim—

Questo di mai non raggiomo!

Persiani, for whom the contralto part of Irene was transposed, sang as usual—that is, beyond all female rivalry. Her recitativo of "La man terribile," was exquisitely given; as, indeed, was every other portion of this beautiful opera allotted to her. Moltini has made most rapid and wonderful improvement since her début here last year in "Gemma di Vergy." In the aria "Sin la tromba a'à me negata" thus was particularly to be remarked; and in the finale of the same scena, "O desio della vendetta," she evinced an extraordinary accession of style, power, and energy. The ensemble of the "getting up" does great credit to the conducting influence of M. Costa, who fills his post with more credit to himself than any of his predecessors.

The ballet department improves every night upon further acquaintance. In fact there never was, at any period of the season, a more delightful treat than the Opera at present affords.

EMIGRATION TO AMERICA.—On Wednesday last the American line of packet ship Wellington, of 703 tons register, Captain Chadwick, sailed from St. Katharine's Dock for New York, taking out about 80 cabin, intermediate, and steerage passengers, most of whom are poor agricultural labourers and their families from the counties of Essex, Kent, and Sussex, emigrating to the "far west," in the hope of bettering their condition. Within these few days several vessels have sailed from the docks with emigrants for Quebec, Montreal, and Halifax.

VAN DIEMEN'S LAND COMPANY.—The annual meeting of the proprietors of this corporation, established to promote emigration and extend agricultural pursuits in Van Diemen's Land, was held on Monday at the Company's office, in Old Broad-street, to receive a report from the Court of Directors relative to the progress of colonisation, the election of directors, &c. The Governor, Mr. William Burnie, took the chair. The report gave a satisfactory account of the Company's operations, and was unanimously adopted.

NEW ASSIZE COURTS, CAMBRIDGE.

Cambridge has always been remarkable for its public buildings, and the student of architecture, no less than the lover of the antique, or the admirer of learning, finds on the banks of the Cam abundant material for study and reflection. One of the new erections just concluded in the town is the New Assize Courts, which adds materially to its adornment; and as it will be seen by a remarkable case reported elsewhere that the assizes are now being held there, we seize the opportunity, in pursuance of our duty as pictorial chroniclers of public improvements, to present our readers with a view of this building. The New Courts stand on the road leading to Ely, just out of the town, on the opposite side of the road to the gaol; a communication existing underground between the court-house and the prison. The exterior is built of a very fine and excellent stone from quarries near Whitby in Yorkshire, and the total expense of the building, which is henceforth to afford the ample and much required accommodation for judicial purposes, will not exceed £11,000.

The style selected is Palladian, and the façade somewhat novel and decidedly effective. It reminds the spectator of Palladio's loggie at the Basilica, Vicenza. It is not, however, a servile imitation of its Italian predecessor; there are many variations, and these certainly in favour of the English building. The sameness and poverty of the original are avoided by compressing the details, a richness being thus gained which tells favourably for the general effect. Palladio's production presents a series of compartments repeated from one end of the building to the other. A variation in this particular has also been made to good purpose, and the charm of variety obtained without loss of general unity of composition. But our sketch, displaying the general character of the building, renders further architectural description unnecessary. The total length of front is 136 feet; the entrance leads into a hall 30 feet square, and this communicates with the two courts, one fitted up for the trial of criminals, the other for cases Nisi Prius. Each of these is 51 feet by 32 feet. Rooms for the judges and the grand jury, with other apartments, are also conveniently placed; and these new courts, which are likely soon to be applied to the purposes for which they are designed, are adapted to meet the convenience of the judicial functionaries and others called together at assize times.

The present assizes were opened in splendid style by the High Sheriff, H. Greene, Esq., whose handsome equipage was the object of general admiration. The dresses of the javelin men, and the liveries of the servants, Verte et ventre de Bische, together with the state coach, drawn by four grey horses, had a most magnificent appearance.

GRETA-HALL.—SOUTHEY'S HOUSE.

THE LATE DR. SOUTHEY.

Robert Southey, LL.D., was born at Bristol on the 12th of August, 1774. He received his primary instruction at Corston, from whence he was removed to Westminster, and afterwards entered Baliol College, Oxford, but did not remain the whole course. He appears to have commenced his career as a poet early in life; several of what he terms his juvenile and minor poems having been published, and a considerable portion of his first important work, "Joan of Arc," written, before leaving the university. Having left this work in the hands of Mr. Cottle, bookseller at Bristol, for publication, he proceeded to the Peninsula, where he collected a mass of valuable materials, which he has since given to the world. The valuable authorities whence he drew his information of the Brazils were, however, collected by his uncle, the Rev. Herbert Hill, during a residence in Portugal as chaplain to the British embassy.

The life of Dr. Southey will present few or no salient points to his biographer. The business of his life was unwearied industry, in delighting the world with his works; his relaxations, the enjoyment of domestic happiness and the practice of every Christian virtue. After having resided for a short time at Westbury, near Bristol, he went to Keswick in the year 1803, on a visit to Mr. Coleridge, who was married to Mr. Southey's sister; and returned in 1803 to take up his residence at Greta-hall, where he subsequently lived, beloved and respected by all who knew him.

The amiability of Dr. Southey's disposition was strikingly exemplified in his patient endurance of criticism, frequently of an irritating and personal nature. The most important notice he takes of the long and honoured articles of those who followed in the wake of Byron is in the preface to the fourth volume in the collected edition of his poems, where he observes:—"I was in Portugal when 'Thalaba' was published; its reception was very different from that with which 'Joan of Arc' had been welcomed. In proportion as the poem deserved better, it was treated worse. Upon this occasion my name was first coupled with Mr. Wordsworth's. We were then, and for some time afterwards, all but strangers to each other; and, certainly, there were no two poets in whose productions, the difference not being that between good and bad, less resemblance could be found. But I happened to be residing at Keswick when Mr. Wordsworth and I began to be acquainted. Mr. Coleridge also had resided there, and this was reason enough for classing us together as a school of poets. Accordingly, for more than twenty years from that time, every tyro in criticism who could smatter and sneer tried his 'prentice hand' upon the Lake poets; and every young sportsman who carried a popgun in the field of Latin considered them as fair game." The intimate bond of union which existed between Southey, Wordsworth, and Coleridge is most creditable to them all—candidates for fame in the same field. No feeling of jealousy or rivalry has for a moment interrupted that friendship which Dr. Southey, in one of his prefaces, hopes will not terminate with this life, but be considered an heir-loom by their posterity.

The fertility of Southey's mind can only be estimated by glancing at a list of his works. It is possible he might have reached a still higher pinnacle of fame had he devoted a large portion of his time to improving and revising, instead of producing new works; but the value of a good tree consists in the quantity as well as the quality of its fruits.

Of prose works we have—"Letters from Spain and Portugal, and Travels in those Countries;" being an account of his residence there. "Chronicle of the Cid;" a compilation from several Spanish works, 1 vol. 4to. "Amadis of Gaul;" a translation. "Palmerin of England;" a translation. "History of Brazil," 3 vols. 4to. "History of the Peninsular war," 2 vols. 4to. "Life of Nelson," 2 vols. 12mo. "Commens," 2 vols. 12mo. "Letters of Don Manuel Espriella from England to Spain," 3 vols. 12mo. "An account of the Madras System of Education, founded by Dr. Andrew Bell," 1 vol. 12mo. "Life of John Wesley," 2 vols. 8vo. "Book of the Church," 2 vols. 8vo. "Colloquies upon the Progress and Prospects of Society," 2 vols. 8vo. "Vindiciæ Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ," 1 vol. 8vo. "Life of John Bunyan;" in Murray's 8vo edition. "Life of Cowper." "Lives of the Admirals;" in Lardner's Cyclopædia.

This list as to minor works is necessarily very imperfect. In early life he contributed to the "Edinburgh Annual Register," and the "Quarterly Review" has been indebted to him for a constant succession of articles from its first establishment till he ceased to write. A selection from these papers was published by him in two small volumes under the title of "Essays Moral and Political." The last collected edition of his poems consists of two closely printed volumes with copious notes. The most important of his poetics as "Joan of Arc," "Thalaba," "Madoc," "The Curse of Kehama," and "Roderic, the Last of the Goths." Many of those minor poems which are familiar to every one are exquisitely beautiful; of the "Devil's Walk," so much praised by some of his detractors as long as they considered it from the pen of Porson, he seems to have been by no means vain; and most likely it might still have been attributed to the professor, had Coleridge not set the matter at rest by announcing it as the joint production of himself and Southey, one morning at the breakfast-table. "Wat Tyler" is included in the last edition as a juvenile poem, where he mildly answers the sneerers at his change of political opinions, by saying that he is not more ashamed of having been a republican in early youth than he is of having been once a boy. The duties of poet-laureate, as fulfilled by Dr. Southey, render the appointment one which any man of independent feeling may accept. He has absolutely no servile practice of bedashing princes, year after year, with the fulsome flattery of birth-day odes, which caused Sir Walter Scott to decline the offer, and seems to have circumscribed his task to chronicling such national events as seemed worthy of his pen, in the way and at the time best suited to himself. The marriage of the Princess Charlotte presented a fair opportunity for the adulation of a court poet. Yet in the lay of the laureate we find him assuming the character of a monitor; pointing out the duties of princes, and what a nation expects of them.

The present Premier, when last in office, showed his regard and estimation of his talents by offering him a baronetcy, which was, however, pre-mediately declined. Shortly afterwards he was granted a pension of £300 per annum, in addition to his other emoluments. He was married early in life to Miss Edith Fricker, of Bristol, who died at Keswick, in 1838, and afterwards to Miss Caroline Bowles, who can have enjoyed the delight of being the companion to such a mind for but a short time, as Dr. Southey had been for years in a state of perfect unconsciousness; his mind had been overworked, and the distress occasioned by the protracted illness of his first wife, to whom he was most fondly attached, laid the foundation of that mental decay which gradually reduced him to a state of helplessness. If we consider his private virtues as a husband, a father, and a friend; his eminent talents as a poet, a historian, and a biographer, we must feel that it may be long ere we look upon his like again.

He died on Tuesday the 21st of March at Greta-hall, and was interred on the Friday following in the same grave with his Edith, in the beautiful and romantic church-yard of Keswick. A limited number of personal friends were invited to the funeral, but it was numerously attended by the uninvited of all classes in testimony of their regard and respect.—From a Correspondent.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, APRIL 1, 1843.

One of the worst signs of the times is the absence of means of profitable employment for either capital or labour—the fact that money will not fetch one and a half per cent. interest, and that industry is at a still worse—because more distressing—discount. There can be no doubt that this indication of disease in the framework of our social economy is both formidable and alarming—alarming as the harbinger of a train of evils, and formidable because it is of a nature most difficult to overcome. The extreme inconvenience of this paralysing condition of affairs has been so acutely felt among the capitalists in the metropolis that they have roused themselves into something like an energetic movement, which they hope may tend to improving results, although their panacea is the old one of colonization and emigration. The past week has recorded the publication of a memorial addressed by "Merchants, Bankers, Shipowners, and others of the city of London," to Sir Robert Peel, in his capacity of Prime Minister, showing, among other propositions, the following, which form the gist of the document:—

That the memorialists are of opinion that colonization conducted on a large scale and sound principles offers a safe and effectual means of augmenting trade, affording employment for various classes, and removing some of the causes of general distress; and that, impressed with the necessity of doing something for improving the state of the country, they earnestly hope that her Majesty's Government will take the subject of systematic colonization into their immediate and serious consideration, with a view of ascertaining in what manner the best practical results may be attained.

That the memorialists address themselves to the head of her Majesty's Government, because they conceive that in the present condition of the country the subject of systematic colonization is rather of great national importance than one in which the colonies have a particular interest.

We do not, in the outset of this mere nutshell of a scheme, offer any strong discouragement to its agitation, although we should undoubtedly wait to see the kernel, before we ventured one step upon the path of direct approval. Experience of the past, and a knowledge of the practical operation of former plans of emigration, have taught us to regard it with a deep-seated jealousy and dread; and even with the authority of such high, honourable, and influential names as are signed to this Peel memorial, with the belief that the memorialists seek to meet an emergency rather than to create a gain—with their qualification of the colonization project upon "a large scale and sound principles;" and with, moreover, an expressed anxiety to commit it to the charge of the Government rather than to individual enterprise;—we still nourish in our bosoms that sort of distrust which is the best security to the poorer public for our watchfulness of their interests, and our desire that no ambition of the wealthy nor scheme of the theoretical, shall be worked to do them harm.

We know too well what a sad dream, deliriously broken, emigration has frequently turned out—how promise has kept its word to the ear and mocked it to the heart—how men who could have lived respectably, even with large families, in their humble vocations in England, have left its kindly shores in the belief that Arcadia was before them, only to find a port of misery and starvation when all was done. Victims of plausibility, of speculation, of deception, of jobbery of the worst and most abandoned kind, they have been lured by credulity into ruin, and have brought home wives and children in rags have bitterly toiled their way back to England, fit only for the shelter of the workhouse, where they formerly enjoyed a comfortable cottage home. In other cases the work of emigration has gone more prosperously, and so well as almost to enforce the charm of happy example upon our population; but unfortunately that charm has worked generally more upon the enterprising and industrious than the distressed and unemployed. Artisans and labourers who were doing well enough, but thought they could do better, are the classes who have far outnumbered the mere pauper emigrants, and thus this country has often rather lost than gained. Still there are advantages to be considered—the opinions of the great world of capitalists are not to be set at nought; their suggestions to a Minister should be deeply respected and promptly weighed; and the project of nationalizing both colonization and emigration is too grand in its features not to demand that it should receive the fullest justice from the attention of the community. We repeat, therefore, that, with no immediate discouragement, we wait the further development of the plan, still watching it with jealous interest, and most earnest hopes for the best. In the meanwhile a glance at the statistics of present emigration may be appropriately taken here:—

EMIGRATION.—Tables, showing the amount of emigration from the United Kingdom, in 1842, give the number of emigrants who have embarked from each of the three kingdoms:—From England, 74, 083; from Scotland, 13,108; from Ireland, 40,554: total, 128,344. The parts of the world to which they went were the following:—To the United States, 63,852; Texas, Central America, and Buenos Ayres, 363; Canada, 41,375; New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward's Island, &c., 12,748; West Indies, 813; the Cape, 517; Western Africa, Mauritius, and Falkland Isles, 72; Sydney, 1453; Port Philip, 864; Van Diemen's Land, 2448, South Australia, 143; Western Australia, 863; New Zealand, 3084: total, 128,344. Four fifths of the Irish emigrants went to the British North American colonies; most of the Scotch went to Canada and Nova Scotia; and five sevenths of the English to the United States. Of the emigrants, 1038 were assisted from the poor rates; 2341 from funds supplied by the Commissioners of Colonial Lands and Emigration; and 988 from bounties paid in New South Wales and Van Diemen's Land. In 1841 the number of emigrants was:—From England, 72,104; from Scotland, 14,050; from Ireland, 34,428: total, 118,582. The number of emigrants in 1842 was greater than in 1841 by 10,000, and exceeds in a much higher proportion that for any previous year. Its extent is, indeed, unparalleled and astounding, amounting to no less than 400 souls per diem, excluding Sundays. Its direction also has undergone a material change. In 1841 the emigrants to Australia and New Zealand amounted to 32,100; in 1842, only to 8309.

We leave society to make its own comment on a success which has been of its own fostering, merely remarking that the returns in question are only up to the close of the last year, and that since that period the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS has been experiencing a rapid weekly progression:—

The great degree of state appeared in their gorgeous attire, giving the usual air of magnificence to this splendid ceremonial, but the presentations were not so numerous as on former occasions.

THE FUTURE OF WALES.—It is generally rumoured in the court circles that a separate establishment will shortly be formed for his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. There is every reason to believe a number of domestics will be selected for the young Prince not in any way connected with her Majesty's household.

His Royal Highness Prince Albert, attended by General Sir E. Bowater, visited the Egyptian Hall, Piccadilly, on Monday last. His Royal Highness went upon the occasion incog. ATTEMPT TO ASSASSINATE A CLERGYMAN IN ST. PAUL'S.

This afternoon, during the service at St. Paul's, which commenced at three o'clock, just as the Rev. Mr. Hadeu, the officiating clergyman, had commenced the prayer for the Queen, a man, who was seated among the congregation in the choir, stepped forward, and presented a pistol at the Rev. gentleman. There was immediately a cry raised among the congregation—"A pistol!" "A pistol!" and those who were near the miscreant instantly rushed upon him, and disarmed him before he had time to discharge his weapon. The Bishop of Llandaff, who was present, stopped the service, and the man was secured, given into custody, and taken to the station-house; after which the service proceeded as usual.

On being conveyed to the station-house in Black Horse-court, he refused to give any information as to his name or as to the motives which had induced him to make the attempt upon the Rev. Gentleman. Mr. Sergeant Talfourd said he would take care that the recommendation of the jury was attended to; he thought he might pledge himself that the defendant Capper would not be brought up for judgment. Cooper, addressing the judge, said the defendants felt deeply indebted to his lordship for his kindness and courtesy during the whole of that protracted investigation, and he was worthy of the name of Erskine. The prisoner was proved to have stated in a public house, on hearing the Queen's health proposed, that the first opportunity he had he would blow the Queen's brains out, as she was nothing but an impostor, and that a woman had no right to sit on the throne at all. She was receiving money she had no right or claim to. She was tutored by Sir Robert Peel, and that he should blow his brains out or chop his head off with a hatchet. The prisoner then said that he had served 19 years, and was only allowed 6d. a day: that was the cause of his being so embittered against the Queen and Sir Robert Peel. They were nothing else but a set of robbers. The prisoner was not tipsy. After a long examination the prisoner was remanded.

FOREIGN.

There is no news of the slightest political moment in the French papers of Wednesday. In the Chamber of Deputies, on the day before, the estimates for the Ministry of Commerce, with a very rapid discussion, and a bill, demanding credits to the amount of 1,774,000 francs for replacing 700,000 flint-locks in the muskets of the army, by the same number of percussion locks, was passed by a majority of above two hundred.

The Madrid journals of the 22nd March continue to indulge in speculations on the ministerial changes which are daily looked for. Espartero, in the Cabinet as imminent, and mentions Senores Alonso, Escalante, Chacon, Surra, y Rull, Lopez, Iriarte, and Cambe, as among those who are most likely to form the new administration. The Infante Don Francisco de Paula was expected to arrive in the capital on the 26th or 30th. Every account from Spain represents the army as suffering greatly from the wretched condition of the Treasury.

AMERICA.—TREATY OF WASHINGTON.—The Philadelphia packet-ship, which arrived off Dover this morning, brings American papers to the 8th ult., with the important documents upon the Washington Treaty, one from the President, and the other from Mr. Webster, which were laid before the house of Representatives. We regret that we cannot find room for the whole of these documents, the first of which, from President Tyler, will be read with considerable disappointment, inasmuch as it does not meet the conciliatory spirit evinced by Great Britain in the candid and reciprocal manner in which the long-standing differences between the two countries would wish or expect. The following paragraphs appear to express the President's own feelings on the subject.

To seize and detain a ship upon suspicion of piracy, with probable cause and in good faith, affords on the ground either of responsibility on the part of the nation whose flag she bears, or claim of indemnity on the part of the owner. The universal law sanctions, and in numerous instances of these descriptions, requires the right, under certain circumstances, not only to visit and detain, but to search a ship, is a perfect right, and involves neither responsibility nor indemnity. But, with this single exception, no nation has, in time of peace, any authority to detain the ships of another upon the high seas for any purpose whatever beyond the territorial jurisdiction. And such, I am happy to find, is substantially the doctrine of Great Britain herself, in her most recent official declarations, and were now communicated to this house. These declarations may well lead us to doubt whether the apprehensions which gave the two Governments a year ago to the detention [illegible] Not only is the right of search, properly so called, disclaimed by Great Britain, but even that of a mere visit and inquiry is asserted with circumstances inconsistent with the idea of a perfect right.

Denying, as we did, and do, all colour of right to exercise any such general power over the flags of independent nations, we did not demand of Great Britain any formal reparations of her pretensions, still less any of the rights of visiting captains ourselves in that respect. We chose to make a practical settlement of the question. This we owed to what we had already gone upon this subject. The honour of the country called for it; the honour of its flag demanded it; and we could not be used by Great Britain for an iniquitous traffic. This Government, I am very sure, has both the inclination and ability to do this; and, if need be, it will not contest itself with a fleet of eighty guns, but, backed by the strong government itself exercises the province of executing its laws and inflicting its chastisement on the wrong-doer, is to protect its flag alike from abuse or insult, it would, I doubt not, put in requisition for that purpose its whole naval power. The purpose of this Government is fortunately to fulfil to the treaty on its part, and it will not permit itself to doubt that the apprehensions which gave the two Governments a year ago to the detention [illegible] Not only is the right of search, properly so called, disclaimed by Great Britain, even that of a mere visit and inquiry is asserted with circumstances inconsistent with the idea of a perfect right.

JOHN TYLER.

The Senate had passed the Treaty Bill for the payment of the claims of Massachussetts and Maine. The Treasury Note Bill and the General Appropriation Bill had also passed. The President had sent a message to that legislature to the repeal of the Bankrupt Act; but it was generally believed that he would do so in a few days. Mr. Cushing, it was said, was confirmed in the office of Secretary of the Treasury, and Mr. Wise, in that of Minister to France. The Great Western steamer had not reached New York on the 4th ult., although she had been out twenty days. No fears, however, were entertained for her safety, as she was not expected to reach that port before the 3rd; arrangements having been made for her to call at Madeira, which would necessarily delay her much beyond her ordinary time. Exchange on London was 10½ 5, with little money.

The last intelligence from Canada represents the health of Sir C. Bagot to be improving.

IMPORTANT FROM YUCATAN.—The Monterains and Regeneradores have risen, with two brigs, had arrived at Campeachy from Vera Cruz, with reinforcements. A pretty warm fight took place on the 4th ult. On the 1st the Monterains, 1000 strong, under the command of General Andrade, took possession of the fortified town of China, about two leagues from Campeachy. At three o'clock, on the morning of the 4th, 200 men, commanded by Gen. Lorgio, marched from Campeachy, and before daybreak the advance guard of 150 men attacked the Mexican outposts, and the Mexicans retreated to the village, where a brisk skirmish ensued. Soon after the main body of the Campeachean troops reached the scene of action, and in the confusion fired upon their friends instead of their enemies. By the first discharge of their cannon, about thirty of the advance guard were slain. Finally, a general engagement ensued, the soldiers on both sides fighting with considerable bravery and vigour. Over 500 Mexicans were destroyed in the engagement. Among the killed were the commander, General Andrade, and Mexicans in a state of disorganisation, and that at a council of officers convened by General Minon, for the purpose of swearing them to conform to the new order of things in Mexico, General Morales and Commissary Molina refused to sign, and were suspended from command. It was also known that General Minon himself had thrown up his command, in consequence of some insulting orders from the Secretary of War. So the general London was 10½ 5, with little money.

THE COMPANY'S MEDALLION OF SIR ISAMBERT BRUNEL, SUPPORTED BY ONE OF THE TUNNEL EXCAVATORS.

When the ingenious Miss Pardoe visited Constantinople in 1836, she was not less surprised than pleased at being questioned by an Albanian chief as to the Thames Tunnel. This, however, is but one of the many instances of the anxiety with which the great work has been watched throughout Continental Europe. In Egypt, where a new country is rising, phœnix like, upon the ashes of the old world, the progress of the Tunnel has been regarded with unabated interest—participated, indeed, throughout the civilised world. Had not modern ingenuity extended "the wonders of the world" to seventy times seven, the Thames Tunnel would long rank as the eighth wonder; for this bold attempt to effect a communication between the shores of a wide and deep river, without any interruption to its navigation, has had, and probably will have, no parallel for many ages. When and where are likely again to combine the necessities, physical and commercial; the resources, pecuniary and scientific; the rational hope of remuneration; and the courage and energy necessary to the conception and production of such a work? And who answers, "Where?". Formidable as have been the difficulties, which it has required almost superhuman energies to counteract, the great work has been achieved; and on Saturday last the consummation was witnessed by admiring thousands.

A tunnel (from Gravesend to Tilbury) similar, in its chief features, to the present work, was proposed and even commenced by Mr. Dodd in 1799, but soon abandoned as impracticable. Two or three years after this, an attempt was made a mile below the present Tunnel, to connect Rotherhithe and Limehouse, by an experienced Cornish miner, named Vesey; a shaft was sunk 76 feet, and the horizontal excavation made in the form of a driftway (to be afterwards widened into a passage), and carried to within 160 feet of the Middlesex shore, when the engineer gave up the work as impracticable, notwithstanding rewards were offered for plans, and many were received. It was under these discouraging circumstances that, in 1823, Mr. (now Sir M. J.) Brunel, completed a design, which received the sanction of many gentlemen of rank and science, among whom were the Duke of Wellington and Dr. Wollaston. The spot between Rotherhithe and Wapping, selected for the proposed communication, is, perhaps, the only one situate between London Bridge and Greenwich where such a roadway could have been attempted without interfering essentially with some of the great mercantile establishments on both sides of the river. "The importance of this new mode of communication between two such places, only some 1200 feet apart geographically (but four miles by the way of London Bridge), will be at once apparent. But it is still more so, if we consider for a moment the peculiar connexion between the two great interests which belong to the different sides of the river. An immense amount of the foreign goods brought into the West India, the London, and St. Katharine's Docks, on the north side, is absorbed by the coasting-trade on the south; and, it appears, is almost entirely conveyed from one to the other by land-carriage." (Knight's "London.") The accommodation of the Tunnel to passengers is shown by 3,700 persons conveyed daily by the different ferries in the neighbourhood. There will be no expensive approaches to the Tunnel to form: on the north, it is connected, through Old Gravel-lane, with Ratcliffe-highway, and a new road is projected in continuation of the former, to the Commercial-road, Whitechapel; on the south it is close to the Deptford Lower-road.

Early in 1824 a company was formed, and in June an act of Parliament was obtained, for effecting the Tunnel, Mr. Brunel being appointed engineer. Meanwhile competent persons, unconnected with the engineer, had taken three parallel borings beneath the bed of the Thames, in the direction of the proposed tunnel, and their very favourable report induced Mr. Brunel to go to work in a somewhat bolder way than he had otherwise intended. He began, in March, 1825, by preparing for a shaft 50 feet in diameter, which he commenced at 150 feet from the Rotherhithe bank of the river. This he effected by constructing, on the surface of the ground, a brickwork cylinder of the above diameter, 42 feet in height and 3 feet thick. Over this he set up the steam-engine for pumping out the water, and for raising the earth to be taken from within the cylinder, which he then sank, en masse, into the ground, in the way that well-shafts are usually sunk. By this means he passed through a bed of gravel and sand, 26 feet deep, full of land-water, and, in fact, a quicksand, in which drift-makers formerly had been compelled to suspend their work. When the shaft was sunk to its present depth of 65 feet, another shaft, of 25 feet diameter, was sunk still lower, till, at the depth of 80 feet, the ground suddenly gave way, sinking several feet, whilst sand and water were thrown up with some violence. The existence of this quicksand had been foretold by some eminent geologists, and the experience proved of essential service to the engineer.

The shaft and reservoir having been completed, the horizontal excavation, or the Tunnel itself, was commenced at the depth of 63 feet, 38 feet in breadth, and 22½ feet in height; the excavation being larger than the interior of the old House of Commons. It was to be defended by strong walls, and to have room within for double archway, each 15 feet high, and wide enough for a single carriage-way and footpath. The mode in which this great excavation was accomplished must be a lasting proof of the genius of its author; viz., by means of a powerful apparatus termed a shield, consisting of twelve great frames, lying close to each other like as many volumes on the shelf of a bookcase, and divided into three stages or stories, thus presenting thirty-six chambers or cells, each for one workman, and open to the rear, but closed in the front with moveable boards. The front was placed against the earth to be removed, and the workman having removed one board, excavated the earth behind it to the depth directed, and placed the board against the new surface exposed. The board was then in advance of the cell, and was kept in its place by props; and having thus proceeded with all the boards, each cell was advanced by two screws, one at its head and the other at its foot, which, resting against the finished brick-work and turned, impelled it forward into the vacant space. The other set of divisions then advanced. As the miners worked at one end of the cell, so the bricklayers formed at the other the top, sides, and bottom, the superincumbent earth of the top being still held up by the shield till the bricklayers had finished; and following the shield, in each archway was a stage for the assistance of the men in the upper cells. The above, however, is but an outline description of the shield, which was as remarkable for its elaborateness as for its vast strength, and to which the successful formation of the Tunnel is entirely owing. In the first engraving is shown one of the miners in his working dress, the long cap hanging down the back to protect him from the dripping of water, &c.; he supports a medallion portrait of the great engineer of the work, copied from a plaster cast, whence a medal has been struck in commemoration of the stupendous work.

STAIRCASE.—THE PROCESSION DESCENDING.

Our notice of the progress of the Tunnel must, however, be little more than bare chronological record. The excavation was commenced with the new year 1826, and the first nine feet were passed through firm clay; then came a loose watery sand; but substantial ground was reached again on March 14, after which the work proceeded at the rate of about two feet in twenty-four hours, displacing from ninety to one hundred tons of earth, which were lifted to the surface by the engine in the shaft; 5500 bricks being used in each foot. On June 30 the work entered under the bed of the river, and, by September, 260 feet had been completed. By January 2, 1827, 350 feet were accomplished, and by March 2 it had advanced 470 feet, or about one third of the whole length; and, though the line of the Tunnel dips about 3 feet in 100, the excavation in one part, towards the middle of the river, approached within ten feet of the water above it. All proceeded well till May 18, 1827, when, at 544 feet from the shaft, the river found its way through a portion of loose earth, and through the shield, entered the Tunnel with such velocity and volume as to fill the Tunnel and shaft in fifteen minutes, with water and about 1000 tons of loose soil and rubbish; but, although the workmen were at their duties, no lives were lost. The breach was examined by means of a diving-bell, when the structure was found to be sound, and the shield apparently undisturbed; the hole, or chasm, was 38 feet deep, and, being closed with about 3000 bags of clay, armed with small hazel rods; the water was then pumped out, and, in September, the works were recommenced. With the recent irruption fresh upon their minds, the workmen were now continually alarmed: "now a report would take place in the frame like a cannon-shot, some part having been suddenly ruptured; now alarming cries were heard, as some irruption of earth or water poured in," with large quantities of carburetted and sulphuretted hydrogen, which, igniting with an explosion, would wrap the place in a sheet of flame, and strangely mingle with the water. Then, the impurity of the air would so overcome the labourers, that the most powerful had frequently to be carried out insensible; and headaches, sickness, and eruptions of the skin were common.

The dangerous part was, however, passed, and 52 feet added to the length achieved, when the river, on January 12, 1828, broke through the shield a second time. The tunnel was filled in less than ten minutes, and the rush of water brought with it a current of air that put out the lights, when six of the workmen were unable to extricate themselves. For some distance Mr. Brunel, jun., struggled in total darkness, and the rush of the water carried him up the shaft. This irruption occurred at 600 feet from the shaft, within 25 feet of the channel of the river, leaving about 700 feet still to be executed. The obstacle was, however, removed by the same means as heretofore. No less than 4000 tons of soil, principally clay in bags, were required to fill the chasm. The tunnel was cleared of water, and the structure again found to be sound. Such was the desire to see the work completed, that some hundreds of plans were tendered for the purpose. But the funds of the company were too low to proceed with the work; an Act of Parliament was obtained for borrowing £200,000 for its completion, and above £5,000 was raised by public subscription.

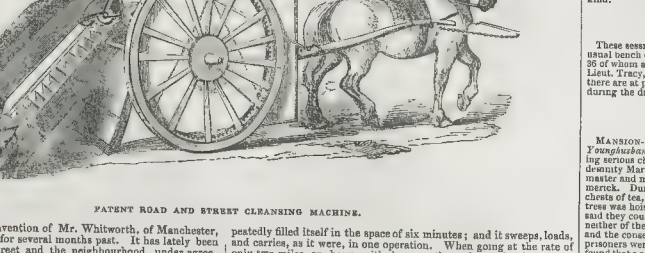
For seven years the work was suspended; but at length Government having agreed to make the required advances, in January, 1835, the arches of the tunnel were unclosed; but the progress was very slow, from the almost fluid state of the ground, from the being necessary to form an entire new and artificial bed in the river in advance, and from the tunnel forming a drain and receptacle for all the water in the neighbourhood, which was ultimately remedied by sinking the shaft on the Wapping side; besides which, the old shield was taken away and replaced by a new one. On April 23, 1837, a third irruption occurred; a fourth on November 2, 1837, with the loss of one life; and on March 6, 1838, the fifth and last irruption took place. There were completed—

In 1836	117 feet	In 1839	194 feet
In 1837	38 „	In 1840, in two months,	76 „
In 1838	80 „	Leaving only 60 feet to complete.

Meanwhile, public curiosity to inspect the Tunnel had increased with the progress of the works. In 1838 it was visited by 33,000 persons, and in 1839 by 34,000 persons—being an increase of 35 per cent. By January, 1841, the Tunnel was completed to the breadth of the river, 1140 feet; and, on August 13 of this year, Sir Isambert Brunel was the first to pass from shore to shore, by means of a driftway connecting the Tunnel with the shaft (75 feet deep) which had been sunk on the Wapping bank of the river. The receipts from visitors during the year ending March, 1841, were £1705. On August 1, 1842, the western arch was opened on the Wapping side, when upwards of 500 persons passed through to the Rotherhithe shaft. The great circular shafts are now provided with handsome staircases for foot-passengers—that at Rotherhithe being shown in the annexed engraving. The carriage-ways have yet to be constructed: each will consist of an immense spiral road, 200 feet diameter, winding twice round a circular excavation, 57 feet deep, in order to reach the proper level; the road itself being 40 feet wide, and the descent very moderate. We have omitted to state that the two archways were at first built separately, and the arcades of communication afterwards opened in the wall. They are always lit with gas, so that the temperature is nearly the same as it is on the shore.

The ceremony of throwing open to the public was performed on Saturday last. At the Rotherhithe shaft two marquees were erected, one for the directors and proprietors, with their friends, the other for visitors generally; flags were hoisted, bells were rung, and the entire scene was a demonstration of triumph. At four o'clock, a signal-gun was fired, and the procession started from the directors' marquee, down the staircase, in the order shown in the engraving. The route taken was along the western archway of the Tunnel, and, on arriving at the shaft at Wapping, the procession ascended and crossed the landing, and then returned by the eastern archway to Rotherhithe. Sir I. Brunel, in his passage through the Tunnel, was cheered with heartfelt enthusiasm, and courteously acknowledged the compliment. (See the engraving.) In the marquee, or pavilion, was subsequently held a kind of levee, at which Sir I. Brunel received the congratulations of the company; it was indeed a gratifying scene of homage to genius. Amongst the visitors were the Earl of Lincoln, Lord Dudley Stuart, Sir Robert Inglis, Sir E. Codrington, Sir W. Clay, the Hon. Mr. Byng, the Lord Mayor, Mr. Hume, M.P., Mr. Roebuck, M.P., Mr. Hawes, M.P., Mr. Warburton, Mr. Rennie, Mr. Babbage, Dr. Faraday, Mr. Maudsley, Mr. Field, and other scientific persons. The Duke of Wellington was absent, from a pressure of public business. In the evening, the directors entertained their friends at the London Tavern, and upwards of one hundred guests sat down to a well-served dinner, Mr. Hawes, sen. (chairman of the board of directors), presiding.

The cost of the Tunnel has been, of course, very much greater than at first contemplated, which was £160,000. In 1837, £180,000 of the company's capital had been expended, and £34,000 worth of Exchequer bills advanced by government, making together £264,000. It was then estimated that £150,000 would be required to complete the Tunnel, and £200,000 for the shaft on the Wapping side, the great circular approaches, &c.; forming a grand total of £614,000; and this will be about the actual expense. Sir I. Brunel has more than once acknowledged the liberality of the government: "The Duke of Wellington, from the first moment that he had seen the plan, conceived a high notion of its practicability, and forwarded the undertaking as much as possible." At the late annual meeting of the proprietors, Sir I. Brunel observed: "When he considered the dangers that had been overcome—that but seven lives had been lost in making the tunnel under the Thames, while nearly forty men were killed in the building of the new London Bridge—that they had terrible explosions of gas to overcome, by which the miners and other workmen had been rendered frequently insensible—it was gratifying to him that he had accomplished the work. Though so many difficulties had to be contended with in the construction of the Tunnel, there was not a line at present out of position." Since Saturday the Tunnel has been open to foot-passengers at 1d. each, and many thousand have already cheerfully paid the toll.



PATENT ROAD AND STREET CLEANSING MACHINE.

This machine is the invention of Mr. Whitworth, of Manchester, where it has been in use for several months past. It has lately been set to work in Regent-street and the neighbourhood, under agreement with the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, and has accordingly excited some attention in the metropolis. The principle of the invention consists in employing the rotary motion of locomotive wheels, moved by horse or other power, to raise the loose soil from the surface of the ground, and deposit it in a vehicle attac hed. The apparatus for this purpose consists of a series of brooms suspended from a light wrought-iron frame, hung behind a common cart, the body of which is placed near the ground for greater facility in loading. As the cart-wheels revolve, the brooms successively sweep the surface of the ground, and carry the soil up an inclined or carrier-plate, at the top of which it falls into the body of the cart. The draught is easy for two horses, and, whilst filling, scarcely a larger amount of force is required than would be necessary to draw the full cart an equal distance. Proceeding at a moderate rate through the streets, the cart leaves behind it a well-swept track, and it has repeatedly filled itself in the space of six minutes; and it sweeps, loads, and carries, as it were, in one operation. When going at the rate of only two miles an hour, with brooms three feet wide, the patent machine will clear nearly sixty superficial yards per minute, which is about the average rate of work done by thirty-six men. The water collected in the cart can be let off by means of a pipe, having its inner orifice some inches above the level of the mud after settlement; the cart, when full, is drawn to the side of the street, at some distance from a sewer grid, and the pipe-plug being withdrawn, the water flows into the channel. The pressure of the brooms on the ground is regulated by a series of weights, and the whole apparatus may be raised from the ground by means of a handle turned by the driver, whenever necessary. Wood pavement, when swept with this machine, is stated to be no longer slippery. An indicator attached to the sweeping apparatus shows the extent of surface swept during the day, and acts as a useful check on the driver. By use of the machine, it is estimated that the streets may be swept at one fifth of the present cost.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF CHANCERY, WEDNESDAY.

SUISSE V. LORD LOWTHER AND OTHERS.—THE MARQUIS OF HERTFORD'S WILL.—JUDGMENT.

The Lord Chancellor gave judgment in this case, which was an appeal from the decision of the Vice-Chancellor, relating to the codicils in the will of the late Marquis of Hertford. The Vice-Chancellor decided in favour of the codicils, and against that decision the present appeal was brought by the executors. His lordship, after going through the facts of the case, which have frequently of late been reported, said he was of opinion that the judgment of the court below was right; the codicils in the will of the late Marquis of Hertford were operative, and must be allowed; therefore the appeal must be dismissed. Appeal dismissed with costs. This decision gives to Suisse the full benefit of the will of the late marquis.

SHERIFFS' COURT, RED LION-SQUARE, MARCH 27.

WALKER V. THE BLACKWALL RAILWAY.

IMPORTANT DECISION, JUN WHO WAS a case which had been before tried in Cumberland Head, Back-road; he had brought an action against the proprietors of the railway for compensation for his house, &c. The defendants are, by a clause in their act, obliged to take and give compensation for all premises within 50 feet of the railway; a portion of the plaintiff's house was within the limit, and a portion without it. The jury at the last trial returned a verdict for the defendants under the direction of the court. Since then the Court of Queen's Bench, on application of plaintiff, ordered a new trial, which took place on Monday, and lasted for several hours. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, establishing that every portion of the premises, any part of which was within 50 feet of the railway, should be taken by the railway; damages, £2200. The stock and fixtures to be taken at a valuation.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.—WEDNESDAY, March 29.

(Before Mr. Commissioner Evans.)

IN RE CHARLES SERRY NICHOLLS, INSOLVENT.

The insolvent in this case was described as clerk to an insurance company, but better known as manager of the Loan and Investment Society, Adam-street, Adelphi, and to-day was fixed for hearing his application for his interim order. A large number of creditors were present, but the insolvent was not in attendance. The solicitor for the insolvent produced an affidavit, stating that he was confined on a fit of hysteria, and, therefore could not attend. He prayed for further time.—A solicitor for a number of creditors hoped his Honour would not grant any further time. The insolvent was only subpœnaed on the 27th inst. the commission day), and which he (Mr. Nicholls) must have known as well as any man to be an insufficient notice.—The insolvent's solicitor assured the learned Commissioner that his client wished to attend here, but was afraid of incurring the penalties which would follow upon his not attending on the subpœna.—Mr. Commissioner Evans: It appears, as far as I can judge, that he has borrowed £4000 without any apparent means of paying, which sum, it says, he has lent to his father. It is not a case in which to give time, and the petition must, therefore, be dismissed.—The petition was dismissed accordingly.

ASSIZE INTELLIGENCE.

CAMBRIDGE, MARCH 25.

(Before Chief Justice TINDAL and a Special Jury.)

BELANY V. TOTTON.—This was an action in which the plaintiff sought to obtain compensation at the hands of the jury for certain libellous expressions. The defendant is the rector of Mashreth, but resides on another living in Essex, in consequence of which it has always been necessary for him to appoint a curate for the former place of preferment. In this capacity plaintiff dwelt at Mashreth for two or three years, at the end of which period his connexion with that parish ceased, the defendant having, as he imagined, reason to object to the inculcation and introduction by him of those doctrines, forms, and observances which are commonly known to the world under the term "Puseyism," and the interference of the diocesan was called in. Though the plaintiff did not take any part in those proceedings, simply contenting himself with the establishment of weekly sacraments, and a strict observance of the saints' days and festivals of the Church, the defendant, in the exercise of his discretion, replaced the plaintiff by another gentleman of directly opposite views, whose conduct gave as much offence to the one party in the parish, as had that of the plaintiff to the other. The favourers of Mr. Belany took active steps to procure his restoration to the post of minister, and, unfortunately, some person made a communication to that effect to the rector, who, annoyed at what he termed "his uncalled-for and undesired interference with his parish," addressed a letter to a friend of the plaintiff, wherein occurred the passages out of which this action arose. Having lamented in the letter the distressing discord which was rending his parish, and his inability to soothe the agitated minds of his parishioners, the writer proceeded to express his regret that that difficulty and discord arose from the unwarrantable interference of the late curate, Mr. Belany, whom he accused of re-visiting the parish under a "vile spirit of vexatious revenge," while he further avowed his firm belief "that he was nothing more or less than a Papist in disguise." Verdict for the plaintiff—40s. damages.

VICE-CHANCELLOR'S COURT, OXFORD.

(Before the Assessor, J. B. Kenyon, Esq., D.C.L.)

GREENWOOD V. KEEN.—This was an action brought by the plaintiff to recover of the defendant, an under-graduate of the University, and gentleman commoner of Worcester College, the sum of £3 15s. for cigars and other articles sold and delivered. It appeared that the plaintiff was foreman to Mr. Gy—mmonds, an extensive livery-stable-keeper in Oxford, where defendant had his horse standing at livery during the time the debt was contracted. Defendant had entered the three following pleas against the debt:—1st, That he was not indebted except as to 2s., a tender of which he had made: 2nd, Infancy; and 3rd, That the articles were unnecessary, and not allowed by the statutes of the University. The learned Assessor said the case must be referred to did not apply to the present case. It stated that undergraduates were to abstain from drinking wine and smoking tobacco in the houses of dealers in those articles in the city of Oxford, under a penalty both to them and to the tradesmen; but it did not prohibit the recovery of a debt for such things being sold to under-graduates. The learned gentleman awarded the defendant to pay the amount and costs.

MIDLAND CIRCUIT

The commission for the northern division of the county of Warwick was opened at Coventry on Monday morning, at nine o'clock, after which Mr. Baron Alderson attended divine service. The calendar contained a list of sixty five prisoners, nearly the whole of whom, however, were charged with minor offences. There were but few capital cases entered, two of which were undefended, and the remainder were of no public interest.

NORTHERN CIRCUIT.—LIVERPOOL, Tuesday.

(Before Mr. Baron Gurney.)

William Goodwin, aged 30, was charged with having, on the 29th of November last, at the parish of Charlesworth, in the county of Thomas Sheffield, and put him in bodily fear and danger of his life, and also with feloniously stealing from his person ten sovereigns and upwards. The prisoner was found guilty, when sentence of death was recorded against him, with an intimation that his life would be spared.

At the Stafford ASSIZES, on Saturday, the trial of the Chartists, Thomas Cooper, John Richards, and Joseph Capper, was proceeded with. Cooper addressed the jury for four hours. The principal part of his address consisted of an analysis of the evidence for the prosecution, which he undertook to disprove in several material points. He declared that his object in going to the Potteries was to urge the workmen to cease from labour until the Charter had become the law of the land. This he had admitted over and over again, but his advice to them and always had been to abstain from acts of violence, because their committing such acts was the only means by which they would be defeated in attaining that object. On Monday Cooper, who had not concluded his defence when the court rose on Saturday, resumed his speech. He proceeded to read from the Quarterly Review passages from speeches by Mr. Cobden and other members of the Anti-Corn-law League, and also resolutions of that body approving of the increase in this neighbourhood. He dilated upon these extracts with great energy and fluency, asking the jury if they could be guilty of the injustice of convicting the three humble individuals before them, whilst the members of parliament and aldermen still retained their seats and their honours after inciting the people to acts of violence and outrage. The defendant concluded an energetic speech of upwards of ten hours' duration by expressing his confidence in a verdict of acquittal. Richards and Capper then addressed the jury in short speeches, principally resting their hopes of a successful defence upon alibis, which they proposed to prove, and character. Witnesses were then called for the defence. The court adjourned at eight o'clock until nine the following morning.—On Tuesday witnesses were examined for the defence, and the trial was proceeding when the accounts came away.

(Before Mr. Baron Parke.)

Several cases of robbery on the highway were disposed of this morning, in which there was nothing worthy of particular notice, the principal question being the identity of the accused. The remainder of the day was occupied with the Mint cases, the details of which were of the ordinary kind.

WESTMINSTER SESSIONS.

These sessions commenced on Wednesday, before Mr. Walesby and the usual bench of magistrates.—The calendar contains a list of 29 prisoners, 26 of whom are charged with felony, and the remaining three with assault. Lieut. Tracy, the Governor of the new Westminster Bridewell, reported that there are at present confined within its walls 508 prisoners. The cases tried during the day were not of the slightest public interest.

POLICE.

MANSION-HOUSE.—Two respectable-looking men, named White and Younghusband, were placed at the bar before the Lord Mayor, on the following serious charge:—Mr. Clarkson said he appeared on the part of the Indemnity Marine Insurance Company. The prisoners were formerly the master and mate of the Native schooner, trading between London and Limerick. During the previous month she left London, having on board 65 chests of tea, and other valuable merchandise. When off Cowes a signal of distress was hoisted, and several pilots went off, and on reaching the vessel, said they could save her if proper assistance was rendered at the pumps. Neither of the prisoners nor any of the crew would, however, lend their aid, and the consequence was, that in a short time the vessel went down. The prisoners were apprehended in Ireland, and, on making inquiry, it was found that a great portion of the tea had been sold at Ryde, and a sum of nearly £400 was found in the shape of bills and money in the name of the master at the bankers at Ryde. The above statement having been proved by different witnesses, the prisoners were committed for a week, for the production of other important evidence. The cargo was insured for £6500, of which £3000 has been paid, and the vessel for £1000 at Lloyd's. The case created great interest.

BOW-STREET.—POST-OFFICE ROBBERY.—George Goddard, a clerk in the receiving-house of the General Post-office in Mourgate-street, was charged with stealing a sovereign, the property of the Postmaster-General, in Upper Thames-street. It appeared that some suspicion having been entertained of the prisoner, a sovereign was marked, and put in a letter directed to Bristol, and, as was expected, the prisoner fell into the snare. The letter and sovereign were found on the prisoner's person. The prisoner declined making any defence, and was fully committed for trial.

Richard Maddox, the maniac soldier, who attempted to kill his wife, in Ireland-yard, Blackfriars, was examined on Tuesday at Guildhall, before Alderman Sir M. Wood, who directed him to be remanded till Saturday, that the authorities at the War-office may in the interval be consulted. From the wife's statement, it appears he had frequently complained since his return from Egypt, where he served at the siege of Acre, of a dreadful pain at the back of his head, and that she did not think him right in his mind. Before this period he had been a kind husband.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.—Ever since the Legislature in its "collective wisdom," has prohibited street sports by heavy penalties, juvenile offenders and offences have been alarmingly on the increase in this neighbourhood. It is impossible for pedestrians to pass down King street, where the vacant space before the chapel affords irresistible inducement to schoolboy games, without perceiving whole troops of hardened urchins, especially if school hours are over, busily engaged at hustle-cap, fly-the-garter, jump-the-tuggnail, and other similar enormities. The energies of the police have been in vain directed to suppress these act of parliament abominations, but further than the capture of a fugitive hoop or an erratic peg-top, they have done comparatively little towards carrying out the judicious views of the Legislature. On Tuesday, however, policeman C 87 appeared before Mr. Maltby, with his hands on the collars of a couple of boys, who had been suddenly captured while illegally engaged in a game of trap-bat and ball.—The officer set forth by a complained street's.—Mr. Maltby said the streets must not be turned into playgrounds to the annoyance of the public.—To impress on the minds of the accused a due sense of their delinquencies, they were allowed to peruse the clauses of the liabilitres to which they had rendered themselves amenable. They were liable to break windows, they were liable to be run over, they were liable to obstruct the thoroughfares, they were liable to lose their tops and balls, they were liable to be fined forty shillings.—The boys, amidst much blubbering, vowed to eschew trap-bat and ball for ever, if allowed to go home.—Mr. Maltby, believing the signs of contrition sincere, ordered them both to be discharged.

MARYLEBONE.—On Tuesday a boy named Mellor was charged with stabbing with a knife one of his comrades, aged 15, and causing his death. The boy was not committed, but given in charge of his father, who was bound over in the sum of £50 to produce him on Monday next for further examination.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL CHIT CHAT.

CONCERT OF ANCIENT MUSIC.—The second concert was given on Wednesday night at the Hanover-square Rooms, under the direction of his Grace the Archbishop of York. The selection was almost exclusively of a sacred character. The principal singers were Miss Rainforth, Miss Dolby, Miss Birch, Miss Towers, Harrison, Phillips, and Hawkins. The Duke and Duchess of Cambridge and the Duke of Wellington were present on the occasion.

SHERIDAN KNOWLES.—It is with pleasure that we congratulate the supporters of the legitimate drama on the announcement of a new play by this most deservedly successful dramatist. The prolific author has not been long engaged upon it; but, "strike hot on the Muses' anvil" is not a bad motto; under the conviction of which Knowles has made some of his best "hits." He might bear another, too, and say, like Coriolanus, and unlike a great many others, "Alone I did it!"

MADAME EUGENE GARCIA.—This lady has, it seems, grown weary of the Princess's Theatre, and is about to appear shortly at the T. R. C. G., induced, as report says, by a liberal increase of salary offered by Mr. Bunn, namely, thirty shillings a week! It is not the first time that great house has been the tomb of mediocre aspirants. We hope that it may not prove so to Madame Garcia, and that the epitaph of her musical fame may not commence with Ci-Git.

MISS CLARA NOVELLO.—This young lady will make her first appearance this evening, Saturday, at Drury-lane, in Pacini's opera of "Sappho:" the part of the Leucadian enthusiast by the débutante, that of Climene by Mrs. Alfred Shaw. Those who have recently heard Miss Novello sing promise the musical public an unusually high and unexpected treat.

M. JULLIEN.—It appears that this amusing and ubiquitous artiste, after taking considerable trouble to get himself incarcerated, had very little trouble in getting himself released again: for he only had to disturb Louis Philippe at his dinner by a letter, which instantly induced the monarch to desist from his meal, and sign an order for the discharge of the Prince of Piccoli! Bravo, Jullien!

EXPECTED ARRIVALS.—Mesdames Damoreau Cinti, Dorus Gras, and Albertazzi are expected to arrive shortly in town. What a season to perspecta!

A NEW TENOR.—A new vocalist, with an extraordinary tenor voice, is, we learn, to appear shortly at the Princess's Theatre.

BON MOT.—Victor Hugo's new drama, "Les Burgraves," has been produced in Paris, and is performed nightly to alternate and violent expressions of confounding opinions. A saying of M. Vatout is going the rounds. When told that the principal personages in the piece were from 80 to 100 years old, Louis Philippe's bosom friend said, "C'est l'hospice des vieillard's par un incurable."

IRISH MUSIC.—Mr. White gave the first of his new series of entertainments, on this delightful theme, at her Majesty's Concert Rooms, Hanover-square, on Tuesday last, to a very numerous and fashionable auditory. There were several of the nobility present, amongst whom we observed Lord Colchester and the Earl of Shelburne. The vocalists were, Miss Dolby, Miss Flower, the Misses Lyon, and Mr. White himself, who gave several of his illustrative melodies in the Irish language with fine effect. There were no less than eight encores, and the whole affair went off with the greatest possible éclat. The next of these popular entertainments will be given on next Monday evening.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

At a meeting of the Canada Company held on Wednesday a statement of their affairs was laid before the proprietary, from which it appears that very satisfactory progress is making in the sales of land under the new principle of allowing credits by way of instalments, which operates to the purchaser's longer credit, and enabling persons of small means to acquire property by the exercise of their own labour and industry.

EASTERN COUNTIES RAILWAY.—This railway, which extends from London to Colchester, a distance of fifty-one miles, was on Wednesday last opened to the public from Brentwood to its further terminus, the first services of steam having been in operation for about three years. Sir W. Lemon left Shoreditch at eleven o'clock, A.M., and reached Colchester about two, where a large crowd was in waiting (as had also been the case at Chelmsford, Witham, and other parts on the road) to receive the visitors. The guests then proceeded to the Town Hall, where the chair was taken by Sir H. Smythe, Bart., M.P., in the absence of the mayor through misposition. About 200 persons sat down to a handsome cold collation, and the greatest harmony and good feeling prevailed throughout the hall, an edifice which is to be admired more for its antiquity than its beauty. The party returned to town without the slightest accident having occurred. The weather being remarkably propitious, the trip appeared to give great satisfaction to all concerned.

The following gentlemen are understood to be candidates for the office of Chamberlain of the City, in the event of a vacancy occurring:—Sir W. Curtis, Bart., 3rd on the list of Aldermen in standing; Mr. Alderman Brown, 4th on the list; Sir John Pirie, 16th on the list; Mr. D. W. Harvey, Commissioner of Police, in addition to other names reported.

COURT OF ALDERMEN.—A Court of Aldermen was held on Tuesday, which was fully attended by the members. The Lord Mayor nominated the Rev. A. Mony of D.D., to the Donative or Rectory of St. James, Duke's-place, in the room of the Rev. R. Povah, deceased, which nomination was unanimously confirmed by the court. The Rev. M. Gibbs, rector of Christ Church, Newgate-street, was requested to preach the Spital sermon on Easter Tuesday; and the court agreed with a report from the Gaol Committee, for enlarging Giltspur-street Compter, which was ordered to be laid before the next Court of Common Council. Communications from Sir James Graham, with the newly approved rules and regulations of the City prisons and the Borough Compter, were laid before the court, and ordered to be entered on record.

SYSTEMATIC COLONIZATION—MEMORIAL TO SIR ROBERT PEEL.—The merchants, bankers, shipowners, and others of the City of London have prepared a memorial for presentation to the First Lord of the Treasury, on the subject of systematic colonization, with the view to the adoption of some mode of relieving from it employment for many of our unfortunate countrymen, who are starving in their native land.

THE CUSTOM HOUSE FRAUDS.—The Morning Advertiser of Tuesday last contains the following particulars of a transaction in which the Custom House officers were engaged, and which, to say the least of it, looks somewhat strange. "In November last, two officers of her Majesty's Customs, accompanied by a policeman, entered the premises of a firm which has carried on business westward of Temple-bar, with unblemished reputation, for upwards of half a century: having produced their warrant, they seized fourteen gold watches of foreign make, on the ground that the duty had not been paid. No resistance being offered, the property was conveyed to the Queen's warehouse, where it was afterwards lotted for sale. The firm proceeded to memorialize the board, setting forth the facts, that the watches had been in their stock for a considerable period, and had been purchased of well-known foreign importers—that when imported they were properly and legally marked, and that those marks had been removed according to the practice of the trade; and that an engraved plate had been substituted, with the inscription—"Foreign, examined.... London"—and, further, the original foreign marked plates being owning to the watches were produced, and verified by affidavit of the workman who had removed them. The memorial concluded by praying the restoration of the property extracted. The first answer was that the firm was to be prosecuted, but on a second memorial being presented, the following answer was returned:—"Queen's Warehouse, March 3, 1843. Gentlemen,—I am directed to inform you that, agreeably to the Board's minute, dated the 1st of March, your watches will be returned to you, on your giving an undertaking not to take any proceedings against the officers. I am, Gentlemen, &c. &c. &c., F. WHITING, Pro Warehousekeeper. To Messrs. *." The italics (says the Morning Advertiser) are our own; and we ask, is it to be borne that her Majesty's innocent subjects are to have their property taken from them, detained three months, themselves subjected to annoyance, inconvenience, and loss, their reputation endangered, and yet to be debarred 'taking proceedings' against the wrong-doers, as the condition of receiving their property back."

NATIONAL SPORTS.

RACING.

Probably on the principle that painters throw in a strong dash of the gloomy to make their lights more effective—the last week of March is always a dull affair in the matter of the turf. At all events, whatever the cause, such is the effect; and, beyond an indifferent steeple chase or so, nothing occurred in the shape of running horses for money upon the surface of this sporting island during last se'nnight. The preparation for the approaching season, however, is very active, and the promise of sport at all the meetings, whose arrangements have been announced, without exception, is first-rate. In the interval the industrious are full of energy, and a large field of horses is now in the market for the Derby. But let none, as they would avoid being "put in the hole," be led into speculations at the odds we quote from Tattersall's. They state the current prices, no doubt, but their base is not the merits of the horses and none upon, they are regulated solely by the bargains those parties are enabled to offer who bought in when the market was down—down at zero. The legs who took 50 to 1 about A British Yeoman in July last can afford to throw away a few thousands to keep him up at 7 to 1, while they are enabled to hedge their money at seven hundred per cent. Wait till the close of April, and see where he will be! Many of the nominations are certainly at favourable figures for the betters' round; and, for that party, it will, probably, be a very good race. For the backers of favourites, the Yeoman and Maccabeus are about as near a pair of ruination nags as need be.

The Chester Cup, with Corsair for a Scylla, and Reaction for a Charybdis, offers pleasant sailing for the curious in shipwrecks! Any man who lays a guinea out upon it in the public market, as that market now is, ought to be locked up by his next of kin. Another fortnight will enable the amateur of racing to shape his course before a chart of his own—till then let him beware! We do not write for the professional—a gentleman with the red flag at the mast-head cares little for a bump now and then. Still the mouth may open with something likely to "cast a shadow before"—cloud or shine, it shall not escape us.

The Marquis of Granby, the Earl of Wilton, and Lord Forester have accepted the stewardship of the Croxton Park races, on the 5th and 6th of this month. The Duke of Rut and a brilliant party of fashionables from Belvoir Castle will honour the meeting with their presence.

The Ashlocore steeple chase races (Ireland) came off on Monday last. They were well attended. The race for the Kilrue cup was the principal one, and excited much interest and speculation. Regulator was the first favourite before going to the post, and Peter Simple the next. The cup was a sweepstakes of 10 sovs. each, with 100 sovs added. Fourteen horses started. It was won by Mr. Preston's br. m. Brunette; Morning Star was second, Regulator third, Regulator fourth, and the rest in a ruck. The hunt race, 50 sovs., added to a sweepstakes of 5 sovs., won by Mr. Preston's b. m. Tidings, beating nine others.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE. Since our last report the arrivals of English wheat have been on a very moderate scale, but of full average quality. Although the stands have been scantily filled with samples, the demand for all descriptions was ruled excessively heavy, and the quotations have suffered a further abatement of from 1s to 2s per quarter, since this day's discussions. Foreign wheat has proved a mere drug, and must be noted quite 1s per quarter lower. The best barley has maintained its value, but grinding and distilling sorts have been 1s per quarter. In malt a limited amount of business has been passing, at late rates. The oat trade has proved dull, at a decline of 6d per quarter, while beans, peas, and flour have had a downward tendency.

ARRIVALS.—English: wheat, 2260; barley, 1056; oats, 1340; and malt, 3910 quarter, flour, 2116 sacks. Irish: oats, 40,000 quarters. Foreign: wheat, 515 quarters.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 42s to 48s; ditto white, 47s to 54s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 42s to 46s; ditto, white, 46s to 52s; rye, 31s to 33s; grinding barley ..s to 29s; malting ditto, 30s to 32s; Chevalier, 30s to 34s, Suffolk and Norfolk malt, 56s to 62s; brown ditto, 50s to 54s; Kingston and Ware, 58s to 60s; Cheveller, 62s, Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 17s to 21s; potato ditto, 19s to 22s; Youghal and Cork, black, 17s to 19s; ditto white, 19s to 20s; tick beans, new, 31s to 36s; ditto, old, 34s to 38s, grey peas, 36s to 38s; maple, 38s to 40s; white, 38s to 40s; boilers, 42s to 44s per quarter. Town made flour, 45s to 46s; Suffolk, 38s to 40s; Stockton and Yorkshire, 36s to 38s per sack. Seconds ..s to ..s; fine ..s to ..s; Stockton and Yorkshire, 34s to 37s; ditto feed, 14s to 16s; beans, 30s to 32s, peas, 32s to 37s per quarter. Flour, America, 22s to 24s. Baltic, 22s per sack.

The Seed Market.—We have had an improved demand for both red and white clover seed, at full prices, but in all other kinds of seeds next to nothing is passing.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed, English, .. to .. per quarter; Baltic, crushed, .. to .. per cwt.; Mediterranean, .. to .. per quarter; Hempseed, .. to .. per quarter; Canary, .. to .. per quarter; Rapeseed, .. to .. per last; Coriander, .. to .. per cwt.; Carraways, 8s to 8s 9d per bushel; English rapeseed, new, £20 to £22 per last of ten quarters. Linseed cakes, English, £10 to £10 10s, ditto foreign, £7 to £7 10s per 1000, rapeseed cakes, £5 5 to £6 per ton.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread are from 7d to 7½d; of household ditto, 5½d to 6½d for the 4lb loaf.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 47s 2d; barley, 28s 4d; oats, 17s 7d; rye, 29s 3d; beans, 34s 3d; peas, 34s 1d per quarter.

Imperial Averages of Six Weeks which govern Duty.—Wheat, 47s 10d; barley, 27s 7d; oats, 17s 5s, rye, 29s 3d, beans, 32s 7d, peas, 32s 1d per quarter.

Duty on Foreign corn.—Wheat, 20s 0d, barley, 9s 0d, oats, 8s 0d; rye, 11s 6d; beans, 11s 6d, peas, 11s 6d.

FLOUR.—The market continues in a very dull state, yet we have no variation to notice in prices. Sound common cargoes are held at 34 to 36 per bbl. A small parcel sale of 130 packages of American is reported for the 11th of April.

SUGAR.—The article has met a very dull inquiry this week, and prices may be considered 5d per cwt. lower.—The arrivals continue large, particularly from the East Indies.

Coffee.—Although rather more business has been done in coffee since our last, no advance has taken place in prices.

Cocoa.—The late advance in the value of this article continues to be supported.

Provisions.—The demand for Irish butter is very dull, yet the importers are firm, and less disposition to submit to reduce. Prices, however, are quite 5s per cwt. lower. There is a large quantity of foreign butter on offer, and 112s to 114s are the highest rates of the best Dutch. Lard is dull, and rather drooping. Bacon has given way 2s per cwt.

Tobacco.—The market is steady, at 43s to 43s 3d on the spot, and 43s 6d for autumn delivery.

Potatoes.—About 1900 tons of potatoes have reached the Pool this week, which are selling slowly at from 40s to 60s per cwt.

Hops.—Kent's, 74s 6d. Ord. Tenfield, 14s 8d; Ord's Redlough, 13s 6d; Tenf-ld Moor 17s 6d; Hside, 17s; Carndon, 20s 3d; Killon, 20s; Lambeon, 22s 3d; Wylam, 15s 6d per ton. Sacks served, 5.

Smithfield.—In consequence of a comparative falling off in the supplies of fat stock, the demand here has improved, and prices have advanced quite 2d per 8lb. Beef, from 2s 10d to 4s; mutton, 3s 6d to 5s 6d, lamb, 4s 6d to 5s 8d; veal, 4s to 5s; and pork, 3s 4d to 4s 6d per 8lb, by the carcass.

COMMERCE AND MONEY.

Money is still in great abundance, and the reduced value of various commodities, rendering the mercantile bills by which these commodities are represented in the money market proportionably small in amount, the discount charged on them is at present very low indeed—the rate of from two to three per cent. per annum, according to their quality, the amount of money usually applied to these purposes thus far exceeding the amount of bills in the market for renewal. In the share market, also, the capitalist has not the same temptation now to invest his money as he had two or three weeks ago, prices of the leading railways having advanced perhaps higher than circumstances had justified. Accordingly, during this week, a general decline occurred in those of the leading railways, which may, however, in a week or two, again induce the capitalist to turn his attention to those securities. The transactions in the Consols Market have been rendered, during the week, less active than they have latterly been, and in the beginning of the week they declined nearly one half per cent., which is the natural consequence occasioned by the late rather rapid advance in their prices. Speculators, in fact, have been securing their profits by the same means as those fected. It is, however, rather hard in execution, and the tints of the flesh are not sufficiently blended. The composition shows great knowledge and mastery of drawing.

30. "Rouen Cathedral—South Portal." E. Hassell. This is one of the best views exhibited this season by Mr. Hassell, and gives an excellent representation of this venerable and beautiful cathedral.

33. "La Saldetta." E. F. Green. We have frequently had occasion to notice Mr. Green's tasteful studies. The present one is a female head, with a charming expression. It presents good drawing and much harmony in the colouring.

41. "View on the Grand Canal, Venice." C. F. Tomkins. This is a small view, with a remarkably rich and sparkling effect. It is one of the gems of the exhibition.

43. "A Ravine in the Neath Vale." J. B. Pyne. A most romantic scene, exquisitely painted in a quiet tone of colour. The effect is charming, and every part bears the impress of truth.

48. "A Scene and Characters in a Spanish Posada, in Andalusia." F. Y. Hurlstone. This may be said to be one of the finest paintings in the exhibition; and we are the more gratified to be able to say this, because we fear a very different account will have to be given of most of Mr. Hurlstone's works in the gallery. This picture combines many figures, all painted with great force and spirit. The expressions are full of meaning, and finely contrasted; and an agreeable harmony of colour pervades the whole picture.

54. "Going to Market." E. J. Boddington. A very beautifully composed landscape, replete with natural colour. The figures are introduced with much judgment.

73. "A Pifferetto." E. Latilla. This represents a recumbent figure of an Italian boy. It exhibits a great deal of character, and is, generally speaking, well coloured, but a little too laboured in the execution.

87. "The Weary Traveller," by the same, is also a picture of great merit, but it has the same fault of an excess of finish, which imparts hardness, instead of soft texture, to the flesh.

103. "Belina." A. J. Woolmer. This is one of a great number of similar pieces exhibited by Mr. Woolmer. The subject is taken from Pope's "Rape of the Lock." It possesses much fancy and elegance, but the execution is too loose and negligent.

106. "The Enchanted Garden of Armida." F. Y. Hurlstone. One of the largest compositions in the gallery. The subject is taken from Tasso's "Jerusalem Delivered." The want of force and expression are its principal defects. It has rather a pleasing arrangement of colour—and this, perhaps, is the only merit of the picture. The execution is exceedingly coarse. For a picture of such great pretension it has very little indeed to recommend it.

115. A Composition. A. J. Woolmer. A very sweet composition of a woman with a child in her lap; and may be reckoned the most faultless of all Mr. Woolmer's pictures this season. The expression of the female is beautifully delicate and amiable, and the chiaroscuro and colour are unexceptionable.

116. "Burlington Bay." A. Clint. A very excellently coloured landscape, bright and spirited. The perspective is admirable. The bay is introduced with great effect in the distance.

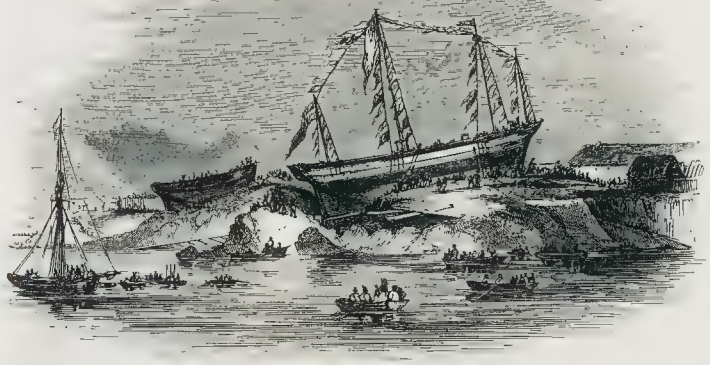
136. "Portrait of her Royal Highness the Princess of Capua." J. Holmes. We cannot say much in praise of this portrait. Though it is not destitute of elegance and fancy, this picture has a disagreeable effect, from the prevalence of its cold tints. We should think it hardly did justice to so celebrated a beauty as the Princess of Capua.

144. "Edinburgh and the adjacent Country, from Leith Roads." J. Wilson. An excellent representation of the Leith Roads, with Edinburgh very far in the distance. The whole landscape has a lively and natural air.

149. "The story of Cosmo de Medicis and Don Garzia." J. F. Heaphy. In some respects this is a most extraordinary composition. It possesses one of the principal recommendations of an historical painting in the strength and meaning the artist has imparted to the expressions. As Dr. Johnson says of Dryden's translation of Virgil, "He only is the master who keeps the mind in pleasing captivity;" it is in respect to this quality—the power of riveting the attention—that the merits of this picture are to be tested. We cannot help, however, suspecting that the artist has carried his development of expression to the extreme verge, and rendered it rather painful than pleasing to the spectator. In all other respects the picture is well painted, and exhibits a breadth of effect and a force of colour not frequently met with.

164. "Scene from the Arabian Nights." E. Jacobi. This is confessedly one of the most attractive compositions in the gallery. It is a group, most gracefully arranged, of two figures—a Mahommedan and his favourite. One great peculiarity this picture presents is in the arrangement of the light; one-half of the figures being illuminated by a lamp, and the other half by the expiring rays of the declining day. This arrangement has an unique and not altogether unpleasing effect; though it may be objected that such a contradiction of lights is detrimental to a proper concentration of effect. With regard to the other qualities of this picture, we may observe that the drawing is perfectly classical, the expressions full of intelligence, and in strict accordance with the subject, and the execution varied and expressive. The back ground alone is rather meagre, and we think, that without detriment to the general effect, a little more interest might have been given to that portion of the picture.

(To be concluded in our next.)



LAUNCH OF THE "DUCHESS OFLEINSTER" AT KINGSTOWN, DUBLIN.

It always gives us great pleasure to notice indications of increasing prosperity in Ireland, particularly in any of those great branches of commerce the cultivation of which has made England the queen of the ocean, and which is only required for Ireland in order to make her what she has been so often styled by poets, painters, and patriots, "first gem of the sea." The above engraving, with which we have been favoured by a Dublin artist, represents the launch of a fine new brig, named the "Duchess of Leinster," which took place at Mr. Fagan's ship-yard, Kingstown, on the 21st. ult., and which attracted such an immense concourse of persons of all ranks of the community as rendered the scene most magnificent and imposing.

Among the distinguished personages present on the occasion were noticed the Right Honourable the Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress, the Duke and Duchess of Leinster, the Marquis of Kildare, Lords William and Otho Fitzgerald, Lady Jane Fitzgerald, Lady Blaney, Lady Beaujolais Bury, Lord Stuart de Decies, Lord Gort, Baron de Roebeck and family, Daniel O'Connell, Esq., M.P., Sir Edward Blakeney (commander-in-chief), Major-General Sir John Burgoyne and family, Colonel Chatterton, Colonel Bradshaw, Sir William and Lady Leeson, the family of Baron Richards, and of Baron Lefroy, Sir John Kingston James, Bart., Sir Edward Stanley, &c. &c.

At half-past two the Duchess of Leinster christened the vessel by dashing a bottle of the "native nectar," a stout measure of whiskey, against her bows, reciting the words, "Success attend the Duchess of Leinster." She was then launched in splendid style, and first swam in her future element amid the roar of cannon, and the enthusiastic shouts of a myriad of spectators. A splendid déjeûner concluded the day's enjoyments.

THE DARNLEY JEWEL.

This very curious piece of the workmanship of the 16th century formed one of "the relics of singular interest" at Strawberry-hill; in the sale last spring was one of "the valuables of the tribune," or, from the crowds then and there assembled, more properly, the Strawberry "crush-room"; and well do we remember our endurance of heat and toil to obtain a glimpse of this precious jewel. It was purchased by Mr. Farrer, of Wardour-street, for a large sum, and, after an active competition amongst the bidders, has just been bought by her Majesty, at the price, it is said, of 200 guineas. It was about to be sold to a foreign collector, who is in possession of the celebrated iron ring of the unfortunate husband of Mary Queen of Scots, when the good taste of her Majesty rescued it, and it is now amongst the royal jewels of England, as formerly it was amongst the royal jewels of Scotland. It is the identical jewel worn by Lord Darnley. It was made by order of Lady Margaret Douglas, his mother, in memory of her husband, Matthew Stuart, Earl of Lennox and Regent of Scotland, who was murdered by the party who opposed him in religion. The jewel, which is of exquisite workmanship, is of fine gold, in the form of a heart, about two inches long and nearly two inches in breadth. On the surface, which opens in front, there is a coronet, in which are three small rubies and an emerald. Under the coronet there is a sapphire in the shape of a heart, with wings of ruby, emerald, and sapphire. The coronet is supported by Victory and Patience. There are also two figures on the jewel, representing Faith and Hope. The robes of all these figures, which are very elaborate, are of ruby and sapphire enamelling. There is the following legend:—

"Sal obtein Victorie in yair Pretence,
"Quha hopis stil constanly with Patience."

The coronet and little heart may be both opened up from below: within the coronet are three letters in cipher, "M. L. S.," with a crown of laurel over them. On the reverse of the coronet within are two hearts joined and pierced by two arrows, bound by a wreath with a legend, "Quabat we Resolve." When the little heart is opened a skull and two bones are seen, and two hands holding a label, from which hangs a horn with the rest of the legend, "Death sal dessolve." On the other side of the jewel is the sun shining on a heliotropium, or sunflower, beautifully enamelled; the moon and stars are also represented. There are a salamander in the flames, a pelican feeding her young with her blood, a shepherd, a traveller, a dog and a bird, and a phœnix, all emblematical, with a legend—

"My stait to them I may compaer
"For you quha is of Bontes rare."

When the whole heart is opened, on the reverse are seen two men in Roman armour fighting. An executioner holding a woman by the hair with a cuttle axe, as about to decapitate her; two frightful jaws, out of which issue three spectres in flames. The figure of Time is seen drawing a naked figure, supposed to be Truth, from a well; and a female on a throne, with a fire in which many crosses are burning. There are three legends:—"Ze seem al my Plesur," "Tyn gaves al leir," and "Gar tell my Relaes." The whole is exquisitely worked, and is one of the most extraordinary remains of the art of the age.

THE FASHIONS.

Paris, Rue Chausée d'Antin, March 28, 1848.

Mon cher Monsieur,—In the general dearth of fashionable intelligence that has so long pervaded my communications, it will be really refreshing to find something new; I do not, however, promise you that my intelligence will be very interesting, still, as the harbinger of something better for the future, I trust you will receive my description of the only toilettes that I have lately seen that are really worth the attention of your readers. I propose, in the first place, to commence with a very pretty indoor toilette, which a fashionable friend of mine has just sported, and the effect of which I hope you will agree with me in thinking very striking. This dress is a robe de chambre in green damask, the skirt open and lined with orange poult de soie, and bordered round the base by a high bias in poult de soie; the corsage is made high and open, with an orange lining, the facings of which are made to join those of the skirt; the collar is squared, and is of damask, bordered in poult de soie; double sleeves—the first long and plain, the second plain at the top, but made like a nun's at bottom; the front is relieved by ornaments embroidered in passementerie, and permitting the under sleeve to be seen; a green cordelier, terminated by a large tassel, completes the costume. The under-robe worn with this undress is of Scotch batiste, trimmed with a fall of lace, and with a corsage open at the neck, embroidered, and trimmed with narrow lace. As far as evening and ball dresses are concerned, I have little to say that is very interesting; still, however, the following costumes are deserving of notice, and I shall attempt to give you a short description of them, the more especially as they were worn by some of our ultra fashionables, whose patronage stamps the seal of distinction upon everything they patronize. The first of these dresses was a robe in jonquille satin, the skirt open throughout its whole height, the two sides springing from the point of the corsage and permitting a lining in white satin, ornamented with a trimming of English lace and knots of jonquille satin, to be seen through the opening; the corsage of this dress was plain, and open at the neck and pointed; the sleeves were very short. A second lady wore a robe of grey satin, ornamented in compartments with bouquets of flowers of different colours, the corsage open at the neck, pointed, and having three bouquets in the length of the corsage. Another costume which excited much attention was a robe in grey damask, open throughout its height, the two sides parted from the point of the corsage, and thus showing in the opening a lining of rose-coloured satin trimmed with English point lace, laid in zig zags, and attached to the grey skirts by rosettes of lace; the corsage open at the neck and pointed; the sleeves very short. To my taste, however, the most elegant of all these dresses was a robe of white crêpe, with a double skirt open from the left side towards the waist, and rounded at the bottom, trimmed completely round by a gold lace embroidery perfectly open and exposed; the under robe was in white satin; the corsage was Grecian, with a band of golden cord; short sleeves, open below and closed by little laces of gold, terminated by tassels of the same material, which fall down upon the arms. For head-dresses few things are more elegant than the turbans now in fashion, whether they are formed of silver gauze adorned with slight bands of gold threads falling on the shoulder, or the Arab turban in blue Cashmere embroidered in silver. Let me not omit to mention two or three coiffures in blue velvet and cloth of gold, ornamented on the left side with white plumes, and at the back part by a long Arab tassel with long fringes of gold and silk.

American Embassy to China.—We see by the Washington papers received by the last mail steamer from Boston, that Congress had passed an act, appropriating 40,000 dollars to defray the expense of an embassy to Pekin, for the purpose of making a commercial treaty, and Mr. Nathan Dunn, the wealthy merchant and very talented proprietor of the interesting "Chinese Collection," is proposed as the most suitable person to receive the important appointment, from his long residence of eleven years in Canton, his thorough knowledge of the Chinese character, and of the trade of that immense empire, as well as for his high integrity and moral worth. We understand that Mr. Dunn scrupulously refrained from participating in the demoralising opium trade, and when application was made to the Viceroy of Canton for permission to ship his splendid museum, his Highness promptly granted the request, saying that Mr. Dunn had never violated the laws, or been engaged in smuggling opium.—Morning Post, March 31.

Stamp Duties on Legacies, &c.—A parliamentary paper, just published, shows that in the year ending the 5th of January, 1848, the total amount of duty paid for legacies, probates, and administrations, was—in England and Wales, £2,601,960 7s. 8d.; in Scotland, £150,313 11s. 2d.; in Ireland, £114,923 15s. 6d. Total, £2,867,105 14s. 4½d. Duties received since 1797—in England, £59,643,195 6s. 11½d.; in Scotland, £3,387,910 16s. 8d.; in Ireland, £1,664,853 8s. 9½d. Total duties received since the year 1797 amount to £64,595,190 6s. 4½d.

Unrehearsed Tragedy in a Prussian Theatre.—A serious accident happened on the 13th March, at the Elberfeld Theatre, in Prussia, during one of the scenes from the opera of "Der Freischutz," in which Max brings down the eagle with his rifle. The gun to be used in its representation was one which had been borrowed a few minutes before the commencement of the performances, from a sportsman, who, in handing it to the party, expressly told him that it was loaded. The eagle was upheld by one of the stage carpenters, and Max, either forgetting or not believing that the piece was loaded, fired, and the poor fellow received the charge in his breast and right arm. He was immediately taken to the hospital, where it was ascertained that the wound was not mortal, although it is likely to keep the sufferer long on a bed of suffering.

CHAPTER IV.

THE EXPLANATION BETWEEN SIR ARTHUR AND CHARLES

NOTWITHSTANDING Lady Grange had Caroline in her room before she retired to rest, with the view of inspiring her with feelings of contempt for "that pitiful idiot" Sir Arthur; notwithstanding the angry menaces to which she had recourse, when she found the match defended by the repetition of her own precepts; notwithstanding she denounced him as "an imbecile creature,' and declared her conviction that the "pair would be the legitimate laughing stock of England,"—Caroline still remained firm.

That her ladyship would have been but too happy to have the "imbecile creature" in question herself, is a fact which cannot even with the semblance of truth be denied; nor is it less true, nor was it less natural, seeing that Sir Christopher Grange had at that important period of British history been dead two years, that this high consideration had the direct effect of increasing her indignation at the prospect of that same imbecile creature and Caroline being united; and therefore it will not, except indeed by regular philosophers, be held to be marvellous that the thought of being defeated by a comparatively inexperienced girl—the idea of having trained up a child to form a barrier between her and her hopes—should have kept her awake the whole night. She was indeed excessively restless. Her favourite pupil had been far too apt! Still she had hopes—high hopes, for although it was clear that her pupil would not be untaught, it was not quite so clear that she would not be in this case controlled.

In the morning therefore, immediately after breakfast, her ladyship left the table, when Caroline and Sir Arthur who knew what was to follow, looked at each other and smiled. Sir Arthur then took out his tablet and having written—"My dearest Caroline; are you still firm!"—said "Are you a good French scholar, Greville?"

"No," replied Greville, "I used to be, but now I have nearly lost it all."

"Caroline will probably do me the favour then to turn this into English?"

Caroline with grace received the tablet and smiled, and having written "Unchanged and unchangeable," returned it to Sir Arthur, who immediately exclaimed "Good! very good!—I knew that I might have staked my existence upon it, safely."

The anticipated message now came from Lady Grange, and Caroline obeyed the summons instantly, looking at Sir Arthur as she left the room, with an expression indicative of firmness.

Contrary to all expectation her ladyship received her with a most gracious smile, and kissed her as she entered with very great affection.

"Well, my love," she observed, with a playfulness of manner which was really very interesting, "allow me to congratulate you on your good looks this morning! You slept well I hope, dear?"

"Excellently well," replied Caroline.

"Ah," rejoined her ladyship with a sigh, "I wish to heaven I could with truth say that I did. I would have given worlds could I have slept!—Oh! Caroline, Caroline; you know not what agony I have endured on your account."

"Dear aunt, I am sorry, very sorry to hear it!"

"I would not, my love, pass another such a night for the universe. I am sure that I never should survive it. The only thing, dear, which sustained me was the confidence I reposed in your judgment, the conviction that you possessed too much sense to adhere to your expressed determination. You have reflected, dear, upon all that passed between us last evening? I am sure that you have, and I am also sure that reflection has induced you to alter your views. Come, my love now make me happy; say, Caroline, say that you will break off this most unblest match!"

"My dear aunt," said Caroline calmly, "I am sorry that I have caused you so much uneasiness—"

"I know that you are, dear; but all is forgiven."

"I am also sorry," pursued Caroline, "that the judgment which I have formed in this matter is so incompatible with yours. I have reflected upon all you have said; I have indeed reflected deeply, and the result of that reflection, my dear aunt, is, that my views are unchanged."

"They are?" cried her ladyship, fiercely. "Unchanged! And, of course," she added, with a chuckling sneer, "of course you know that his views are also unchanged?"

"I do," replied Caroline, firmly.

"Minx!" exclaimed her ladyship, starting from her seat in a rage: "This is your gratitude!—this my reward! From this moment I cast you off for ever!—Out of my sight!—I hate you!"

Caroline accordingly withdrew, and her ladyship instantly rang for her maid, whom she promptly despatched for Sir Arthur. The poor girl, perceiving her mistress's excitement, of course flew, and having delivered the message in terms much milder than those in which it had been sent, Sir Arthur proceeded to wait upon her ladyship; but as on his way he met Caroline in tears, which on learning the cause, somewhat ruffled the old knight; he on entering the room said at once "Lady Grange, I am not a child, and therefore will not submit to be schooled like a child. I have obeyed your summons because I am anxious to show no disrespect; but knowing the object for which I have been summoned, I shall save you much trouble and time by declaring that, whether it be with or without your sanction, Caroline shall be my wife!"

Lady Grange without giving audible utterance to a syllable, instantly bounced from the room, and having ordered her carriage, proceeded to dress, and thus threw the whole house into a state of commotion. It is true, Greville calmly observed that things must take their course; but he could not avoid estimating the loss he might sustain by the withdrawal of his sister's countenance from the family; and while Sir Arthur was earnestly impressing upon Caroline that her happiness would not depend upon her ladyship's smiles, the amiable Lucrece was doing all in her power to tranquillize her aunt, who would not, however, patiently listen to a word.

The carriage, as the utmost expedition had been enjoined, was soon announced, when the sisters repaired to the hall with the view of taking leave of their aunt, while Greville established himself at the gate. The trunks were brought down and placed on the box as before, and when all was in readiness her ladyship descended with all the dignity at her command.

"Dear aunt," said Caroline, "do not leave us yet."

"Oh! pray do not," added Lucrece.

Her ladyship darted a look of contempt at Caroline, and passed them. She also passed Greville at the gate with an expression of disgust, but having entered the carriage, she turned and said fiercely, "Alexander, you ought to be ashamed of yourself!"

"What am I to do?" cried Greville. "What in the name of all the gods am I to do?"

"Do!" replied her ladyship, "what are you to do? I consider my connection with the family to be a disgrace!" And having delivered herself precisely to this effect, she sunk back in the carriage, gave the signal and was off.

"Well!" said Greville with a shrug, on re-entering the house, "of course she was to go or she wouldn't have gone!"

"Think no more about it," said Sir Arthur, "she'll very soon come round. Come, my dear girls, come! banish this ridiculous affair from your minds and be happy. Charles," he added, "a word with you in the library."

Up to this time Sir Arthur had never directly intimated anything having reference to his marriage in the presence of Charles. He of course suspected that the affair was not unknown to him, and certainly that suspicion was strictly correct; he also suspected, although no allusion to the subject had been made, that Charles himself was enamoured of Caroline, having witnessed those attentions which, for the purpose described, he had paid her on the evening of his arrival, and hence, being anxious to have this suspicion either removed or confirmed, he resolved upon a mutual explanation, not only for the satisfaction of his own thoughts, but with a view to the justification of the course he had pursued.

"Now, Charles," said he, having entered the library, "the time is come for us to have a little quiet conversation on a subject which interests us both. Of course you have heard of my contemplated marriage."

"I have," replied Charles

"Oh, well. But it appears to have made you dull! I ought not, however, to be surprised at that, it being natural for every unmarried man to be somewhat thoughtful when a lady is about to be married for whom he entertains respect."

"Respect!" said Charles, who for more than one reason was anxious not to undeceive his uncle upon that point at present, "Respect

"Ay, sir! respect You don't mean to say you love my Caroline?

"I dare not say so now."

"Dare not! What, sir, do you take me for?—a tyrant? Look you, Charles: I know your disposition: I know that you would scorn to descend to falsehood: now, sir, I ask you, calmly and distinctly, whether you really love Caroline?

"If I had an affection for her once—

"An affection! What has affection to do with it? A man may have an affection for his child, for his brother, for his friend, nay for the whole of his species, sir—the whole of his species, and for every living creature besides: a dog may have an affection for his master—a dog, sir! I ask you not for whom you have an affection: you may have an affection for thousands, and a sincere affection too, I ask you, plainly and simply, sir, whether you in reality love Caroline? I perceive, I perceive, you cannot say that you do, and therefore I can now proceed to justify that step which, did you really love her, would appear too much like an act of tyranny to be pleasing. Now, I do love Caroline: I will not attempt to disguise it from you, Charles, for you are and ever shall be, if you mind how you behave yourself, viewed by me as if you were in reality my son. Well, the fact that I love her, gives me, you will admit, the greater claim; but I have moreover, proof—now don't say it's only my word ago, because I've had enough of that from other quarters—I say that I have moreover proof that she loves me! which gives me an absolute right to her! Now, for yourself: you want a wife—don't attempt to deny it: you do want a wife: you may not have made a wife before you commence practice! Very well: marry the sister"

"Her sister? Laurece "

"Ay Laurece. Marry her; and then we shall all be made happy together. We shall be happy! nothing can prevent it, unless you yourself interpose: you are desirous—fiercely, signally defeated as my rival! you must admit that: therefore marry Laurece. She's a fine girl—an amiable, elegant girl,—affectionate, beautiful, accomplished. Marry her then! What can it matter so that you have one of them, which you have"

"What if I were to use the same argument to you?

"To me it would not apply. Besides I am entitled to the choice, not only because I am your senior, though in constitution certainly that's not much, but because Caroline really is the object upon whom I have set my soul. You have no claim to her: you do not love her independently of which, and this I hold to be unexplorable, she does not love you! she can't you know: it is all perfect nonsense to suppose it: she can't love us both."

"I admit that she cannot love both of us personally!"

"I disdain to hint, sir, that she loves me for anything but myself, and I'll forever disown you. It is no offence, sir: a very gross offence, and therefore if you value my favour you will never allow another instance of that kind to escape your lips. Oh, ha! I the slightest doubt—but I'll not do her the injustice to think of it for a moment.

"You know, I presume, that I would not wantonly do anything with a view to diminish your happiness

"I know it, I know it, my dear boy, I know it. It was thoughtlessness thoughtlessness merely. Let us, therefore, say no more about it. But to business. I'll have Caroline, you'll have Laurece is that settled?

"Why, some little time for reflection I suppose will be allowed?

"Reflection? Pooh, nonsense. You'll have plenty of time for reflection when it's over. I hate these boy courtships, I have a disgust for sighing, and simpering, and quarrelling and making it up again month after month, and years after year. Let us do the thing like men, Charles, off hand and at once as if we meant it: that's the only way to do business to perfection."

"Well, then suppose I give you an answer in a week?

"I'll not wait a week for you or any man alive."

"But it need not at all interfere with your arrangements."

"Yes it will: it will seriously interfere with them. No, no, let both affairs come off on the same day"

"Well, what day do you propose?"

"To-morrow, to-morrow.

"To-morrow! exclaimed Charles, "why you give them no time to prepare"

"To prepare what?"

"Their dresses and so on. Besides "

"Now, there's nothing besides: and as for their dresses they can be made just as well after the wedding as before. The thing will be quite quiet: the whole world will not be there: half a dozen at most will be there. Now, you remain here, and I'll send Laurece to you: be quick about the matter, and then when I've settled all with Greville, we'll both start off to the Surrogate at once."

Having a most affectionate regard for his uncle, whom he had ever esteemed highly, and a none heart he will know to be warm and sound, Charles strongly disproved of his marriage with Caroline, being naturally apprehensive that unhappiness would be the result, but knowing that in all such cases opposition is worse than useless knowing that reason can never prevail while the judgment sleeps and passion reigns she made no attempt to deter him from the pursuit of the course proposed, feeling convinced, after witnessing the manner in which the last he had even had been received, that any direct observation on the subject would be productive of nothing but irritation. With regard to Laurece, he, of course, was delighted: no suggestion could have been more congenial to his feelings, but before he had time to collect his thoughts, which that totally unexpected suggestion had scattered, the door of the library opened, and Sir Arthur and Laurece were before him

"Now, sir, here's the lady," observed Sir Arthur, "say what you have to say, and don't be long about it

He then withdrew, when Charles approached, and taking her hand smiled and led her to a seat.

"What scent is this?" she enquired with an air of anxiety, for she really did not understand it

"Laurece," said Charles, who felt somewhat confused, "I have an extraordinary task to perform, and as you have heard haste enjoined, you will forgive me if in the performance of that task I should come too abruptly to the point. Laurece, continued Charles, with an intensity of expression, "I come time since proposed for you in town to your aunt, Lady Grange"

"Indeed," said Laurece, whose face and neck became crimson on the instant.

"Indeed! I was not aware of this."

"I thought not. Prudential motives doubtless induced Lady Grange to conceal it from you. Well! I was rejected of course I was rejected—but my hopes were not thereby destroyed: I still hoped and continue to hope, notwithstanding the prospect had sunk below the horizon, that eventually you would be mine: What has happened? What has happened within the last few hours? Caroline is about to be united to my uncle. But this you know: there is, however something consequent on that with which you have still to be acquainted. My uncle has just been with me, and conceiving that I was attached to Caroline, adduced certain arguments to prove that he had a greater claim to her than I had, and wished me distinctly to understand that I had been most signally defeated as her rival, which was certainly, as far as it went, very amusing; but in order to console me for the loss of Caroline, what do you think he proposed?

"I cannot tell: I cannot even conjecture"

"Laurece, he has even proposed that there be two marriages in the family, and both to come off the same day! Now would you have believed it?

"Two marriages," said Laurece, who had become extremely anxious, "but between whom"

"My uncle and Caroline—you and me. Laurece," he added, taking her passive hand in his, "believe me I would not have been so abrupt had I not been thus urged by my uncle; nor will I even now, so much have I your happiness at heart, independently of every consideration of self, pursue the subject if it be painful. I love you, Laurece, not with any hot upheaved passion, but calmly steadily, yet fondly so love you, that, could I conceive that your happiness would be enhanced by your refusing to be mine, you would not be persecuted by me. I might still continue lecturer with pleasure, I might still in imagination partake of your joys; but believe me, I would sink ere my selfish heart, though loving you firmly and fondly still."

"Charles," said Laurece, in an earnest tone, "you have said that Sir Arthur consented that you were attached to my sister—what induced that conception?

"I'll explain knowing the influence possessed by Caroline, especially with Lady Grange, under whose auspices I first appear to have been up to this happy day, I paid her certain attentions on my arrival here, which you might have noticed, with the view of inducing her to add me—"

"I see clearly," exclaimed Laurece. "But have you not before paid her certain attentions?

"Frequently; but always with that one object in view."

"Then you, never did think of addressing—"

"To Caroline? Never

"I am satisfied. But, oh! if you had but known the agony those attentions inflicted, you would have saved me, I am sure. Charles, many a bitter pang"

"Is it so? Have I not been mistaken?"

"If you have ever imagined that your love was reciprocated, Charles, you have not."

"Dear Laurece! you have indeed made me happy—most happy. It is despite the pure happiness with which you have inspired me, delightful as it is, my love to dwell upon, this subject must forget that my uncle's impatience will prompt him to interrupt us before my task is complete, if we do not proceed. Now, Laurece, my dearest love—my own Laurece—feeling as I now feel, secure in your affection, I will not allow you to accede to my uncle's wish; I will merely request that it as his wish that we should all be united on the same day."

"But what day does he propose?

"To-morrow,"

"To morrow!—oh! impossible!"

"There he is, my love," said Charles, releasing her hand as Sir Arthur rapped at the door.

"Why, what an enormous length of time you have been about this business," cried Sir Arthur, as he entered the library. "Well, he added, well? It's all settled, I presume? Eh? Not settled yet? Well, then, I have but one course to pursue. I must settle it for you. Now, give me your hands will thou have this man to thy wedded husband, et cetera, et cetera et cetera! (See Illustration.)

"I will," replied Laurece.

"Oh! you have been studying the ceremony, then! Now, sir, will thou have this woman to thy wedded wife, to love her, to cherish her, and so on?"

"I will" replied Charles

"Very well Then prepare to have each other to morrow."

"To-morrow. Sir Arthur!" exclaimed Laurece

"Ha! to-morrow. Sir Arthur!" exclaimed Laurece

"Oh, that is the point at which you have been sticking then all this time, is it?"

"Yes, said Charles, "we have been thinking

"Hold your tongue, sir. You have no voice in the matter. Laurece, my dear, take my advice: have it over at once, the sooner affairs of this kind are settled the better Now, I'll leave you together again for a time, while I go and astonish the nerves of papa. But don't for one moment think of putting it off."

He then returned to Greville, with whom he had been endeavouring to make certain arrangements of a pecuniary character; but who, feeling scorn in Sir Arthur's honour, and having been rendered by his highly cherished principle of procrastination too indolent to give himself the trouble to take any precaution for the future concerning it to be of course utterly useless, left the whole matter entirely to him

"Well, Greville," said Sir Arthur, on his return, "an increase of happiness Nothing but happiness, confidence, and love! I have to announce to you that Charles and Laurece will, with your consent, be married with us at the same church, by the same parson, and on the same day."

"Charles and Laurece! Why it's the very first I've heard of it! I'd no idea that anything of the kind was even contemplated!

"My friend, at my suggestion it has all been made up within the last half hour"

"Then, I suppose I'm to be left here entirely alone?

"Decidedly not: oh, by no means—go with us Now, then, your consent. I'll take care of them. Charles is a good fellow—an excellent fellow; they are perfectly sure to be happy

"Is there any body else in the establishment about to get married? Because if there is, you know I may as well shut up the house! Unless, indeed, I'm to follow the example"

"You will, perhaps; and you cannot do better."

"Well things must take their course—we shall see. But this is revolutionizing a man's whole establishment with a vengeance!"

"As a father, you wish, of course, to see your daughters well married?"

"Why, certainly, I do!"

"Very well, then, they will be well married. They'll both be taken care of: they'll both be made happy! therefore say no more about it, but give your consent."

"But what will my sister say?

"Greville, let her say what she pleases. The girls will no longer be under her control; they will no longer have to depend upon her smiles. She will be, doubtless, somewhat piqued for a time; but depend it, Greville, when she finds that they are not only settled and happy, but living in a style at least equal to her own, she'll be glad, if not proud, to receive them."

"Well, if it is to be so, why it is; and no more need be said on the subject. It were useless for a man to withhold his consent to a matter which must be; while if it must not, his consent will never bring it to pass."

"Very well; then it is perfectly understood that you offer no opposition. Now, will you accompany Charles and me to the Surrogate?

"Why should I go?

"Why it will look better, especially as we are unknown"

"Oh, I've not the least objection! I'll go with pleasure"

The carriage was then ordered, and Sir Arthur having explained all to Caroline —commissioned her to overcome the scruples of Laurece. This was found to be a task of some difficulty. It was, however, eventually accomplished. Laurece, although with reluctance, did consent to be married on the morrow.

Sir Arthur, Charles and Greville then started for the Licence, and Fred. was deputed by his sisters to collect the attendance in the morning of certain young friends who resided in the vicinity, when the milliners were sent for, and the minister soon, and Charles and Laurece (in pursuance of their expressed wish) were engaged in the completion of their preliminary arrangements, the gentlemen spent a jovial evening together.

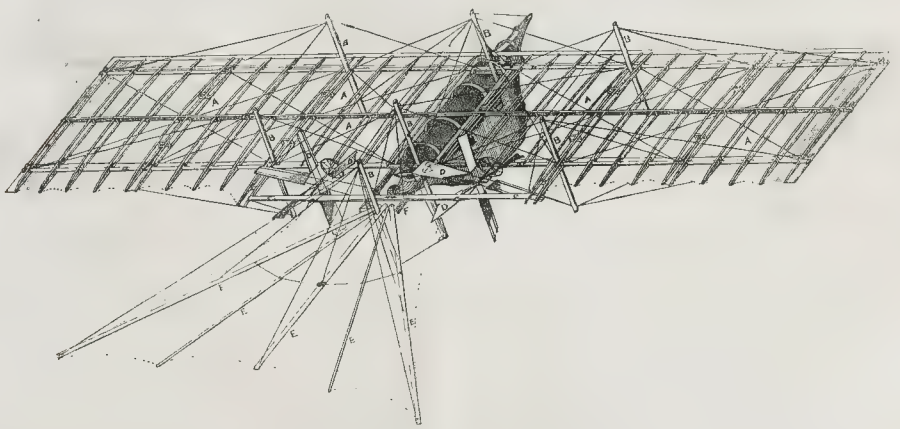
THE AERIAL STEAM CARRIAGE.

that of elastic vapour giving motion to brass and iron. In the same way, it was proposed by another inventor to move propelling wings by human power, when one of our most eminent anatomists has demonstrated that the muscular power of a man is not one-eighth of that of a bird. A pigeon has been known to fly a hundred and ninety miles in five hours and a half—a speed that no human being can ever attain;—whilst the velocity that must be imparted to the propellers for the mere support of such a machine, under the most favourable circumstances, must be vastly greater than was ever yet imparted to any machine constructed by the ingenuity of man. There is another fact, of which we ought not to lose sight in estimating the practical utility of the aerial carriage. Its frame-work, or wings, on which everything must necessarily depend, are 150 feet long, by 30 feet wide, offering an area of 4500 feet; and, when we look at the mechanical resistance offered by the air to a surface of that extent, it is hardly possible to conceive a plane so knit together by human workmanship as to preserve its stability. The fate of Mr. Cocking is still fresh in our recollection. Garnerin had descended with perfect safety, and so had Mr. Hampton, by the tension of a woven fabric, but, as soon as a framed parachute was opposed to the resistence of the air with an increased velocity, which would be the case in the present instance, the entire machine was broken into shreds. The condensing steam-engine, by which the propellers are to be worked, possesses some originality, both in the mode of generating steam adopted by the inventor, and in its subsequent condensation, but nothing that covers the inherent defect of the principle of the carriage. Want of space prevents our further examination in detail, but enough has been said to show its unfitness for the purpose for which it is intended.



A, the main frame, or wings, composed of the longitudinal pieces, a, a, a, a, a, &c., and the bow-like individual frame across them.

B, B, B, B, &c., upright posts, or standards, to the upper and lower ends of which metallic braces, shown by the single lines, are attached, supporting various points in the frame.

C, C, a longitudinal piece, which forms the outer boundary of the space required for the vanes, or propellers.

D, D, D, &c., the vanes, or propellers, mounted on shafts, as shown in the figure, and drawn by steam-engines by means of bands.

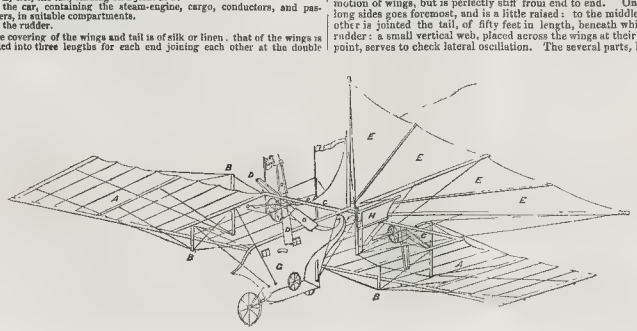
E, E, &c., the tail, turning on a joint at F.

G, the car, containing the steam-engine, cargo, conductors, and passengers, in suitable compartments.

H, the rudder.

The covering of the wings and tail is of silk or linen, that of the wings is divided into three lengths for each end joining each other at the double frames shown: this division facilitates the rapid reefing and spreading of the covering, which is effected by the cords running parallel with the longitudinal pieces, a, a, a, &c., of the wings. The tail and rudder are in like manner governed by cords proceeding from the car.

To the spectator the most striking part of the machine is the immense web which, in the most important respects, fulfils the office of wings. It consists of framework of great strength and extraordinary lightness, covered with silk or linen: its dimensions are not less than one hundred and fifty feet by thirty. It has neither joints nor the peculiar motion of wings, but is perfectly stiff from end to end. One of its long sides goes foremost, and is a little raised: to the middle of the other is jointed the tail, of fifty feet in length, beneath which is a rudder: a small vertical web, placed across the wings at their middle point, serves to check lateral oscillation. The several parts, like the main frame, are constructed with an especial view to the combination of the necessary strength, with extreme lightness: the contrivance employed for this purpose is that of upright posts, or standards, to the tops and bottoms of which various points in the horizontal frame are connected by metallic braces. These parts are all shaped so as to pass through the air with the least possible resistance.



The car, and a very light and powerful steam-engine, are suspended from the middle of the wings, and are close to its under surface: the steam-engine actuates two sets of vanes, of twenty feet diameter, and six vanes each placed at the hinder edge of the wings, and as near to each other as the joint of the tail will permit.

The novelty of the steam-engine, as we have elsewhere stated, lies chiefly, if not entirely, in its boiler and condenser. The former consists of nearly fifty hollow truncated cones, averaging about three feet in length, and of four inches and a half in their greatest width: their blunted points, of about one inch in diameter, are downwards, and the whole are arranged above and about the fire; they present about fifty square feet to the action of radiating, and about as much more to that of communicative heat. The steam is worked in two cylinders, in which it is cut off at one fourth of the stroke. Computing the power of the boiler to generate steam, by data derived from the effects of those of railroad engines, we conclude that the engine will be found of nearly twenty-horse power.

The condenser is composed of a number of small tubes, into which the steam is admitted, and which are exposed to the current of air produced by the rapid flight of the machine. The plan has been found perfectly efficient; and it dispenses with the necessity for carrying water, either to supply the place of that which is discharged as steam when it has performed its work, as in high pressure engines, or to condense it that it may be returned to the boiler. The effect of these improvements in the boiler and condenser, combined with extreme simplicity and lightness in the other parts of the engine, is such that, though the engine is of the power of twenty horses, it is worked with twenty gallons of water; and its entire weight, with its boiler filled, is not more than 600 lb.

THE OPIUM PLAGUE.

Almost simultaneously with the arrival of the Overland Mail, bringing the gratifying intelligence that our affairs in China were on the prosperous road to peace, and that the tocsin of alarm, sounded by the last mail, had been silenced down into tranquillity, a discussion was being held in the British Parliament upon a subject vitally interesting to the destinies of the Celestial Empire, and not less important to the general influence of humanity and the fervent exercise of Christian principles at home. The question involved was not simply commercial, it compassed considerations of morality, of philosophy, of religion—of far dealing towards another people of proper philanthropy among our own. It was the great question of the continuance or abolition of the immoral opium trade.

On Tuesday evening Lord Ashley—the nobleman who brought the subject before the house, and whose honourable zeal in matters affecting the Christian interests and character of his country we have so often had to record in the highest terms of eulogy—concluded an eloquent and brilliant speech with the following emphatic proposition:—"That it is the opinion of this house, that the continuance of the trade in opium, and the monopoly of its growth in territories of British India, is destructive of all relations of amity between England and China, injurious to the manufacturing interests of the country, by the very serious diminution of legitimate commerce, and utterly inconsistent with the honour and duties of a Christian kingdom; and that steps be taken, as soon as possible, with due regard to the rights of governments and individuals, to abolish the evil." Now, we do not hesitate to declare that the general terms of the position taken up in this forcible resolution are almost out of the pale of denial. They have about them a constructive truth and justice which it is nearly impossible not to admit. The trade in opium is, seriously, not a whit more justifiable than the trade in blasphemous or obscene publications, which in the English mind and heart at once calls up feelings of loathing and disgust. It distils a sleepy poison into the human frame, which enervates, intoxicates, excites—prostrating the mental powers—engendering a horrible and unnatural listlessness—and creating delusion and demoralization of such vast, broad, and sweeping character, of so wasting and ravaging a kind, as to induce, from those who witness it and are subject to its fearful influences, the most repugnant sensations of sorrow, commiseration, and dread. The opium trade is, moreover, a direct infraction of the laws of the country of which it is the curse. With that country we have opened new relations at the expense of blood and treasure—we have crowned our position with diplomatic conquests and the prowess of war—and we now seek peace and commerce upon broad, open, generous, and Christian principles, befitting the dignity of Great Britain, and the cause of civilization at large. That peace can never be prosperous, that commerce can never be flourishing so long as the trade in opium endures. The Chinese, as a nation, have a just horror of it, their authorities forbid it as a crime, and not less than criminal is its influence upon the native people. It unhinges the whole framework of society—it brutalizes, deadens, corrupts—it plucks the beautiful consciousness of moral responsibility out of the soul—it unmans, uncivilizes, unsocializes—it is in all respects wicked, dangerous, and evil; and what right, then, has a country calling itself Christian to set up such a pestilence in any foreign community by the insolent dictatorship of power, encouraging avarice and embracing gain? Would any argument justify—would any reason palliate—the unrestricted use and strength of ardent spirits among the lower, or indeed any, classes of people in this country? Yet such an evil, dreadful and gigantic as it would become, would be only as a feather in the balance against the free distribution of opium to such a people as the Chinese. That, indeed, is one of the plagues of the East; and with such disgust as it regarded by the moral and thinking among the subjects of the Celestial empire that a distrust of its promulgators has arisen, so strong as to thwart even the activity and exercise of religion, and to palsy the arm of Christianity where it would fain be busiest in reaping fruit. Lord Ashley had occasion to inform the house that, so strongly had the mischief operated with prejudice to the English, the Baptists met last week resolved upon delegating an American as their missionary to Hong Kong, on the ground that the criminal conduct of England in regard to the opium trade "had made the minds of the Chinese inaccessible to the religious efforts of English teachers." The Baptists were wrong in the passing—though not in the grounds of the resolution; it was un-English, anti-national, and, in the present new relations of the two countries, most unnecessary and unjust; but the fact, nevertheless, proves the powerful animus against us to which opium trading and opium smuggling has given birth.

We honour Lord Ashley for the boldness, energy, and manly feeling with which he came forward to grapple with the question—to grapple with its bearing upon our interests and our honour—

THE NEW ROYAL CHAPEL, BUCKINGHAM PALACE.

In the original plan for converting Buckingham House into a palace, in accordance with the taste of George IV., it was proposed to fit up the octagonal apartment of the library of George III. as a chapel for the sovereign and the royal houshold. The design was prepared, in which the compartments of the walls were to be adorned with the cartoons of Raphael from Hampton Court Palace. This proposition was, however, loudly protested against by the public press, and the idea was abandoned; the cartoons remaining where they are, in their own special gallery. At this time, some thirteen years since, the access to Hampton Court Palace was a matter of cost, whereas, at present, it is gratuitous; so that had this piece of palace decoration taken place Hampton Court would have lost its main attractions, and instead of Raphael's masterpieces being viewed by hundreds of thousands of persons, they would have been seen only by the comparatively few persons who form the palace establishment. The octagonal apartment was, however, fitted up as a chapel, but from its contiguity to the kitchen, it was inconveniently warm, and it has since been used as an armoury.

The new chapel royal has been adapted by Mr. E. Blore from the southern conservatory; its height is 25 feet; breadth, 38 feet; length, 54 feet. The cast-iron framework has been preserved with open tie-beams of elegant design; a row of fluted composite columns on each side forms an aisle which is pewed, the remainder of the area having open seats. It is lit by lofty windows at the sides, which are finished with architraves and pediments; and hereafter these windows are to be filled with stained glass. The Queen's closet, across the west end and facing the altar, is supported by Ionic columns, taken from the screen at Carlton House. The closet is lit by small semicircular-headed windows, and corresponding windows are introduced over the altar. The fittings of the pulpit, reading desk, and the royal closet are crimson velvet and gold, and the pews with the sides occupied by the lords and household, and the seats in the middle aisle are covered in crimson, the altar is at present but temporarily fitted. In the Queen's closet are two large state-chairs for her Majesty and Prince Albert, a smaller chair for the Queen Dowager, and a still smaller chair for the Duchess of Kent. The organ is placed in a gallery to the right of the door. The building is coloured throughout in light tints, as white and French white; and, relieved by the crimson fittings, the effect is chastely elegant, and Mr. Blore has been very successful in the adaptation.

The ceremony of consecrating the new chapel royal took place on Saturday, the 25th ult., the Archbishop of Canterbury officiating, assisted by the Bishop of London.

On her Majesty's arrival his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury, attended by his chaplain, the Rev B. Harrison, proceeded to the communion-table, where her Majesty's warrant was presented commanding him to consecrate the chapel. His Grace received the warrant, and directed the registrar, F. H. Dyke, Esq., to read it, and the same having been read his Grace declared that he was ready to consecrate the chapel, and proceeded with the solemn service with our love of commerce and our love of justice—and we devoutly hope that the latter and nobler principle will most readily actuate the impulses of the English heart.

The discussion must be productive of good, for it elicited on all hands a condemnation of the trade, or, at all events, failed to elicit a single opinion of approval. The only question which arose was the question of monopoly; whether it were better to leave things as they were, or to throw open the commerce with a view of restricting it! All agreed that the trade was bad, and only differed as to the best method of limiting its influences. But "what is morally wrong," said Mr. Brotherton, "can never be politically right," and, therefore, the total abolition of the traffic is what society should demand.

The debate ended in the withdrawal of Lord Ashley's resolution, at the suggestion of Sir Robert Peel, who stated that the whole subject was in course of negotiation by her Majesty's Government, and that under existing circumstances it would be well, perhaps, to leave the question for the moment at the disposal of the executive.

Let us, then, urge that executive to perform the great duty of Christianity, and no longer support the wickedness that has been engendered among a people who congregate in millions, and therefore are the more terribly corrupted with its fearful epidemic of crime. Lord Ashley deserves the best praise of all good men for having opened the eyes of English society to the great iniquity of this abandoned trade, and the termination of his lordship's masterly oration will form the most appropriate conclusion to an article which its subject has called forth. "Although I may be animadverted upon, and perhaps rebuked, for having presumed to handle so important a matter, I shall ever be thankful that I have acted as an instrument to lay this abominable evil before the eyes of the public. I shall deeply regret to have given offence to this house, or to any individual; nevertheless I shall rejoice in the disclosure, and the possible removal of the mischief. Sir, the condition of this empire does demand a most deep and solemn consideration; within and without we are hollow and insecure. True it is that we wear a certain appearance of power and majesty: but with one arm resting on the East, and the other on the West, we are in too many instances trampling under foot every moral and religious obligation. I am also sincere in my opinion that (hear hear) perhaps, will agree with me; but I do so—it is in my heart and I will bring it out—if this is to be the course of our future policy—if thus we are to exercise our arts and arms, our science and our superiority of knowledge over the world—if all these are to be turned to the injury and not to the advantage of mankind, I should much prefer that we shrink within the proportions of our public virtue, and descend to the level of a third-rate power. (Hear hear.) But a great and a noble opportunity is now offered to us of being just and generous in the height of victory. In such a spirit, and with such an aim, there is hope that we may yet be spared to run a blessed, a useful, and a glorious career; directing all our energies and all our vows—all that we have, and all that we shall receive—to that one great end of human existence, 'Glory to God in the highest; on earth peace, good-will towards men.'"

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.—PARIS, April 4th, 1843.—(From our own Correspondent.) The past week has been barren, very barren of news; the only thing worth relating is a slight drubbing of the French in Algiers and the daily increasing strength of Abdel Kader; but if we have no news we have many reports that and incidents, some of them remarkable. It is said that young Napoleon Bonaparte, son of Jerome, visited Madrid on a marriage speculation, protected by Russia. To this highly interesting news I am enabled to give a most positive denial; my private letters from Madrid of a very recent date assure me that Espartero and young Napoleon had a most hearty laugh at the credulity of the French newspaper quidnuncs.

A dinner lately given to M. de Peyronnet, ex-minister of Charles X., by M. Chaix-d'Est-Ange is the subject of general conversation in our most fashionable saloons. Three years since M. de Peyronnet languished in the prisons of Ham condemned to death; what sanguinary proscriptions must those who formerly demanded his head! By his side sat M. Thiers, his bitterest enemy; one of the company jocosely called to the recollection of M. Thiers one of his favourite expressions, "I do not believe in the power of resurrections, but I am afraid!" By the bye Thiers is preparing to make the tour of Spain. The little man is full of mighty projects, and amongst others that of destroying British influence in Spain; he imagines that his presence will suffice to restore the French domination as it existed under Louis XIV.

The bureaux of the Minister of Marine are actively engaged with the friends of Marquesas and Otaheite; several steamers and sailing craft are about to be sent out; and one of our first builders has contracted to prepare two wooden churches with bells, and twenty-four wooden houses, each three stories high. On Friday next the Minister intends presenting a law to the Chamber regulating the possession of these islands.

The marriage of the Princess Clementine with Prince Auguste of Cobourg is definitively fixed for the 30th of April. It will be celebrated with great pomp. Immediately after the ceremony the Prince and Princess leave for Germany, and will not return to Paris till the month of November; they will then take up their permanent abode at the Elysée Bourbon, Champs Elysées, the late residence of the Duchess of Berry.

Another subject of general conversation is a most disgraceful scene which took place at the Italian Opera on Thursday last. For reasons to the public unknown, Messrs Vatel and Jann, the directors of the theatre, have thought proper not to engage for the next season either Lablache or Tamburini. Lablache, at the last representation, requested that it might be mentioned on the bills that he played for the last time; the directors refused, and Lablache resolved on addressing the audience. There were two parties in the theatre; the one for Lablache, who demanded that he should explain, and the other for the directors, who called for the continuation of the piece. The Lablachers were in the minority, and obliged to give way; but I am told that the conduct of Grisi and Mario behind the scenes was anything but kind to Lablache; indeed it is reported, and I give it only as a report, that it is owing to the intrigues of Grisi and Mario that Lablache and Tamburini are not engaged for the next season. Lablache is a great favourite in Paris, and well deserves so; and I am already afraid that the directors have committed a very injudicious act in not securing his services. And by whom are two such eminent artists as Lablache and Tamburini to be replaced? Lagrua is now in undisputed possession of the Italian Opera—Tenor, Messrs. Mario, Salvi, and Corelli; bass and baritone, Messrs. Formasari, Rouconi, and Morelli: if I am not mistaken Rovelloni is well known in London. Be assured that the public will not be satisfied, and serious disturbances may be expected next season at the Italian Opera. The directors, to appease the angry feeling strongly manifested against them, have caused it to be circulated that they intend bringing out four new operas. It will not do: the Parisians are determined on having Lablache. During the past season fifteen pieces were produced at the Opera, viz.—"Lucia," "Lucrezia Borgia," "Il Barbiere," "Don Giovanni," "La Gazza-Ladra," "Otello," "Linda di Chamouni," and "Don Pasquale:" the latter decidedly the happiest production of Donizetti; it was represented sixteen times, and each time brought overflowing houses. Lablache, as Don Pasquale, and Tamburini, as the Doctor, were sufficient to ensure success. Madame Vaxton (Rosina), Madame Lamoureux, and Messrs. Corsia and Campagnoli have been engaged for next season. The engagements of Grisi, Persiani, and Nourrit have been continued. Our operas resemble much the court of Louis XV.—the reign of confusion. Anna Thillon, the friend of Adolphe, at the Opéra Comique; Madame Stoltz, the friend of M. Pillet, at the Grand Opera; and Grisi, the friend of Mario, at the Italian Opera. Madame Dupreza was forced to leave the Opéra Comique. Dupres is a Paria at the Grand Opera, having quarrelled with Madame Stoltz relative to a ball given by him; and Lablache and Tamburini are driven from the Italian Opera! Dupreza and Pillet, the director, are at loggerheads. Dupreza pretends that Pillet wants to shelve him, and Pillet that Dupreza est passé. An offer has been made to Roger to accept the tenor of the Grand Opera, acting only during the absence or illness of Duprez. Roger replied, "Je ne veux pas être la doublure de personne."

Tachioni, accompanied by Miss Corito, Edward Carey, and De Meranie, is now in Paris, having obtained a most brilliant success at Milan. It is not true that she will appear at our opera, at least no offer has yet been made to her. Rosatti is expected in Paris in the middle of May. The concert for the victims of Guadaloupe, got up by the Countess de Sparre at the Hôtel de Ville on Thursday, produced 10,000 francs (£400): all the élite of Paris were present. There was some most excellent music, chiefly performed by amateurs. The artists who on this occasion distinguished themselves were Dreyschock, the Bohemian pianist, Halfe, our talented countryman, and Offenbach, a young and most talented performer on the violoncello. This gentleman, the delight of our most fashionable saloons, is so fortunate in his composition as he is master of his instrument. M. Offenbach's concert on the 2nd instant was attended by upwards of 900 persons, the most fashionable company that have adorned the splendid rooms of M. Hertz this winter.

The sale of the Aguado Gallery produced little more than one fourth of that was expected: it was estimated at £80,000, and brought only £24,000. Many Rubens were sold for £20 and £40.

On the 31st of March the forest of Bondy was discovered on fire; after some trouble it was extinguished, but not until great damage had been done. It is supposed to be the act of an incendiary.

Two equestrian statues of the Duke of Orleans are about to be erected—one in Paris, and the other in Algiers. The Government intend bringing to France, and erecting in Paris, the triumphal arch of Djimela.

It is a curious fact that Marachetti was employed to produce both the statues of Wellington and Napoleon.

The comet was seen at Algiers on the 7th ult.

Menonnain seems the order of the day. A fellow at Jumilhac possessed the monomania of burying alive all his friends. Daily he dug graves, and invited his neighbours to dinner, and never abode in the comfortable residences he had prepared for them. His poor mother sought refuge with her daughter, but, unfortunately, persuaded by the monomaniac, she returned home, and the next morning was found buried in the garden, with her hands above the earth.

Not Lynch law, but French village law:—A mayor of a village near to La Rochelle—who is not a police magistrate—lately condemned a petty thief to parade the village with a placard on his back on which was written, in large letters, "Thief;" and on the Sunday following to stand during divine service at the church door with the same badge.

We have had most beautiful weather in PARIS, but in the south there has been much rain and many violent storms. The environs of Toulouse have been again inundated.

The remains of the celebrated Spanish general Palafox, who died a prisoner at Nancy in 1811, were disinterred on Wednesday last, and forwarded immediately to Spain.

PORTUGAL.—The Portuguese Government have proved themselves stubborn and stiff-necked to the last. They have rejected Lord Aberdeen's ultimatum, and will put themselves further in the wrong upon our remonstrances beyond their former inadmissible proposition. It remains to be seen whether a great nation like England, having taken the decided step of fixing an ultimatum, will stultify and utterly degrade itself by submitting to Portuguese dictation, and worse, to Portuguese duplicity.

The session of the Cortes, which, according to the rule laid down in the Charter, ought to close on the 15th of April next, is to be prolonged for one month more, in order to enable the Chambers to get through their financial business, for which purpose, however, a further extension will, in all probability, be necessary.

The new comet has been the innocent author of a good deal of mischief. The ignorant multitude took it into their heads that it was travelling post-haste towards them, and that a whisk of its fiery tail would soon set them all terrestrial matters for ever. The world was to have come to an end, and as there happened to be a tremendous storm of thunder and lightning the ignorant and superstitious thought that it had begun a few hours more it would be all over with them. In the neighbourhood of Bellas the people spent the whole night singing hymns in the open air, under the pelting rain.

The English barque Feronia, Taylor master, from Bristol to Palermo, out 22 days, was lost about 15 miles north of Cape St. Vincent, on the 21st inst. The master and five of the crew perished. The other three seamen escaped on shore by clinging to fragments of the wreck.

HUNGARY.—The Hungarian Diet is summoned to meet on the 14th of May, at Presburg. The general feeling of the necessity of the nobles consenting to be taxed creates the hope in Germany that an Hungarian land tax may be adopted, and that this will allow the doing away of the duties levied on the frontiers of Austria. The fiscal separation of Hungary from Austria renders the latter country reluctant to enter the German Customs' Union, for it would leave Hungary out of it, which would greatly increase the separation between that kingdom and the Imperial house.

The Augsburg Gazette represents the cabinet of St. Petersburg as having sent a courier to M. Boutenief, bidding him not to send the Sultan's letter to St. Petersburg. Two concessions are to be made by Russia about Servia, but not going the length of recognising Prince Alexander.

AMERICA.—We were enabled in our latest edition last week to lay before our readers the American news received by the packet-ship Philadelphia, in addition to which we received papers to the 17th ult. by the Great Western steam-ship, Capt. Hoskin, which arrived at Liverpool from New York on Saturday morning. The Oxford and the Patrick Henry packet-ships also arrived at Liverpool on the same day with the Great Western, but the news by the steamer being several days later embraces all that was conveyed by the other vessels. On the 27th of February a message from the President was received in the House of Representatives, in reply to a request from the latter body for a copy of any communication received from the British Government as to the construction put by the President on those portions of Lord Ashburton's letter which relate to the right of search question. Mr. Tyler, in his message, strongly declines against any pretensions, on the part of foreign powers, to visit vessels sailing under the American flag. Mr. Webster, Secretary of State, enclosed the substance of the communication from Lord Aberdeen to Mr. Fox, the British Minister in Washington, wherein his Lordship protests against the supposition that any one of the articles of the Treaty of Washington, of 1842, was intended for the British Government, and another gentleman who came passenger in the Forest, we are indebted for Mexican papers to the 15th. From an official note addressed by the Secretary of War, Lopez de Nava, to Mr. Cowley, we learn the Mexicans had evacuated their position at China, leaving in their retreat four hundred men in the hacienda of Ghalvez. The Yucatanese had set fire to the buildings, and burned down the splendid sugar mills up to that period, heretofore current, that the Mexicans had been repulsed from the Eminencia. we imagine was unfounded, as the Merida Boletin, of the 14th and 15th ult., speaks of the firing upon the city from the fortress upon the Eminencia, but retreated to their barracks, after having driven in the outposts and advanced guards with great slaughter. The loss of the Campeachans on that day was very considerable—of their colonel, Company and three men, a corporal, and sergeant, escaped. We learn verbally that several prominent men in Campeachy had been killed by the populace, in consequence of treasonable designs. The discovery of the plot had produced much confusion.

MEXICO AND TEXAS.—The war in these parts still rages, and it is hard to guess at the issue of the present commotion. American "struggles" are the seeds as plentiful in the south as they were, three or four years ago, in the north.

THE WEST INDIES.—The West India steam-ship T.riot arrived at Falmouth on Sunday morning just as the main coach was about to start. She left Tampico, Feb. 21st; Vera Cruz, 26th; Havannah, March 9th; Bermuda, 16th; Dwight, Feb. 28th (having been detained by the Spanish authorities at Government) and 180 scrons of cochineal. She does not bring a Jamaica mail.

A report had reached Tampico that a conducta from Real del Monte had been attacked by a strong band of robbers, and that the whole of the money had been carried off, amounting to 70,000 dollars. Also that two hundred Texan prisoners had made their escape on their guards overpowering them near to the city of Mexico. The Mexicans and Campeachans were still at hostilities, but nothing definite had taken place. The Mexican Government were about to send another force to the Tobasco fortress upon the Eminencia, but not very favourable, although not officially made known. No confidence existed in the Government. Santa Anna intended leaving Vera Cruz for the capital on the 27th February.

The Thetis was lying at Havannah, and to sail for the Gulf on March 10th. On March 18th the Dee was lying at Bermuda, and to leave for St. Thomas on the 19th March. The Avon arrived there with Feb. 1st mails, in thirty days from Falmouth, having become short of coals. The steamer with Feb. 15th mails had not arrived at St. Thomas March 12th. On March 2nd, the illustrious, with the flag of Sir Charles Adams, was lying at Port Royal, shortly to sail for Havannah; the Spartan remained. At Vera Cruz, 26th Feb., remained the Electra; was about to sail for Tampico and Jamaica. At Bermuda, March 16th, remained the Ringdove, arrived from Halifax, and the schooner Hornet.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The royal assent was given by commission to the Consolidated Fund, the Lords' Oaths, the Municipal Corporations, the Metropolitan Buildings, Reported Convicts, the Justice of the Peace (Ireland), and several private bills. The Slave-trade Suppression (Texas, Uruguay, and Bolivia) Bill was read a first time.—Copies of any communications which have passed between the Government of the United States, relative to the treaty of Washington, and a copy or extracts from the instructions issued to Lord Ashburton on his departure upon his special mission, were ordered, on the motion of the Marquis of LANSDOWNE.—The Earl of ABERDEEN, while granting these papers, took occasion to state that the differences supposed to exist between the Government of Great Britain and that of the United States, with regard to the interpretation of the article in the treaty referring to the right of visit, were more apparent than real; and that, at all events, no differences existed which could create any inconvenience, or lead to any unpleasant circumstances.—Lord ASHBURTON also asserted that there was, in point of fact, no difference existing at this moment between the two countries on the point of the right of visit or search. He admitted that he had gone out for the purpose of meeting that question, but the questions which were supposed to be the subjects of complaint on the part of the United States. If nothing had been done on the subject, the reason was that, from the time he had arrived until he left the States, he had heard nothing but satisfaction expressed. No complaint having been made, it was not his business to stir in the matter.—Lord BROUGHAM, on the suggestion of Lord Campbell that it would be well to wait until these papers were on the table, postponed his motion of thanks to Lord Ashburton from Tuesday until Friday.—The Earl of WICKLOW moved the second reading of the Dogs Bill, and accused Lord Campbell of having, on a former occasion, endeavoured to turn it into ridicule, by asking if it was a Government measure.—Lord CAMPBELL, amidst much laughter, denied that any case had been made out for it. "The noble earl," he proceeded, "has had a letter from some gentleman, who has been frightened by a dog, and that is all. He does not say the dog was in harness. For my own part, I should say that dogs in harness are much less dangerous than dogs out of harness."—"Hear, hear," from the Lord CHANCELLOR, and a general laugh.)—After several other jokes at the expense of the oppressed canine race, their lordships divided, when there were for the second reading.....14, and non contents 14. The Lord CHANCELLOR gave his casting vote against the motion, and the bill was consequently lost.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

On the motion that the Ipswich Dock Bill do pass, Mr. ATTWOOD moved the addition of a clause exempting vessels taking in coal from the dock dues.—The clause was opposed by Mr. Charlestone, and rejected, upon a division, by 90 to 71.—The bill was then passed.—Several other private bills were advanced a stage.—Mr. S. CRAWFORD gave notice that he would move, as an amendment to Mr. F. Buller's motion on the subject of emigration, that the measures desirable from the land and revenue sources of this country being adequate to afford employment and food to the whole population, it was compulsory upon the house to take measures for the better application and distribution of these resources, before resorting to emigration for a remedy of distress.—On the motion of Mr. T. Duncombe, a return of the items composing the £15,000 expenses incurred for the late special commission was ordered.—Lord J. RUSSELL moved for the production of correspondence bearing upon the right of visit question, and the different construction put upon the clause, referring to that right, in the Washington treaty, by the Government and the Senate.—Sir R. PEEL promised to produce the correspondence or extracts required, similar to those acceded to by the Earl of Aberdeen in the Lords, and affirmed that the apparent difference between the two Governments was not in fact a difference in matter but of principle. The right hon. gentleman added, that the bill for the adjudication of the Oregon territory had not passed the Congress; while a bill had passed enabling the Executive Government of the United States to give full effect to the treaty of Washington.—Lord J. RUSSELL gave notice that he would not move his resolutions on the subject of education till after Easter.—Mr. ROSS gave notice, for Friday, of a motion for the production of correspondence relating to the mail-coach contracts of Ireland.—An hon. member gave notice that he would, on Tuesday, move that the Attorney General be directed to prosecute the parties perpetrating the Nottingham election outrages as guilty of bribery.—On the motion for the re-commitment of the Registration of Votes Bill, Lord J. RUSSELL objected to the new clauses, which give the appellate jurisdiction to the Court of Common Pleas, as introducing a principle unconstitutional and destructive to the privileges of the house, and virtually repealing the Reform Act. The house went into committee on the bill.—On clause 44, allowing costs to the amount of 20*s.*, to be awarded by the revising barristers, Mr. G. KNIGHT proposed they should have the power of awarding to the extent of 40*s.*, and divided. His amendment was lost by 80 to 113.—On clause 57, which gives the appeal from the revising barristers' decisions to the Court of Common Pleas, which decision, on appeal, is to be binding on the committees of the Houses of Commons, Lord J. RUSSELL moved its rejection, as being essentially a new principle, and, in fact, a new bill in itself. After a long discussion the committee divided, when there were for the clause, 164; and against it, 81.—The other clauses and schedules of the bill were agreed to, after some unimportant divisions, and the bill ordered to be reported.—Adjourned at half-past one.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

Their lordships sat only a few minutes, during which several petitions were presented, and some bills on the table forwarded a stage, after which their lordships adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

On the motion of Lord C. FITZROY, a new writ was ordered to be issued for the election of a member for the Eastern Division of the county of Suffolk, in the room of Sir Charles Brooke Vere, now deceased. Mr. S. CRAWFORD presented a petition emanating from the Universal Suffrage Association of Dublin, signed by 2000 persons. This petition stated at great length the various grievances and sufferings which the great body of the people of Ireland continued to endure in common with their fellow-countrymen of England and Scotland. They ascribed their sufferings mainly to class legislation, arising from the defective state of the representation. They alluded to the recent decision of the Court of Exchequer, which decreed the repeal of the Union, and insufficient representation produced by it, and they asserted their right to demand a repeal of that measure. They prayed that the house would pass the People's Charter, which embraces representation by male adults, vote by ballot, annual parliaments, no property qualification, payment of members, and equal electoral rights. Also a petition from the University of Cambridge, in support of the complet. suffrage principles; and a petition from 1600 electors and inhabitants of Kendal, joining in like prayer.—Several hon. members presented petitions from various congregations against the educational clauses of the Factory Bill.—Mr. T. DUNCOMBE said that on the 16th of February he had moved for a copy of all orders issued by the Commissioners of Customs at the port of London, from the 1st of January, 1840; and although that return could have been prepared in seven days, it had not yet been given. He should, therefore, move that the return be made forthwith.—Ordered.—Lord ASHLEY brought forward his motion relative to the opium trade. It was couched in the following terms:—That it is the opinion of this house that the importation, the trade in and the monopoly of its growth in the territories of British India, is destructive of all relations of amity between England and China, injurious to the manufacturing interests of the country by the consequent diminution of legitimate commerce, and utterly inconsistent with the honour and duties of a Christian kingdom; and that steps be taken, as soon as possible, with due regard to the rights of Government and individuals, to abolish the evil." The noble lord, in the first instance, disclaimed all interest in the question, and also disclaimed any hostile feelings towards the East India Company. He was actuated by a desire to suppress the trade in opium, which was not only injurious to the morals of the Chinese, but had also a strong tendency to destroy British influence with the better classes of society in China. He quoted a variety of returns in order to prove that in proportion as the importations of opium into China increased, that of our cotton manufactures decreased, and the latter increased when the former diminished. This was also the case in Ireland, where the temperance movement caused an increased consumption of cotton goods, rendering the people happier and more comfortable than when their money was squandered in the purchase of intoxicating liquors. It was clear, therefore, both in a commercial and moral point of view, that this opium trade was terribly injurious. He cited a great number of authorities proving the deleterious effects of opium on the Chinese population, and also upon the population engaged in the cultivation of the drug in Assam. It appeared that in this country the people were not only enervated by the use of this narcotic, but were brought up under its influence, as a crafty, cruel, and most immoral race; and yet writers, speaking of the natives of Assam before the introduction of opium cultivated there, represent the people as a strong, manly, and intelligent race. In fact one opium cultivator was enough to demoralise a whole village. By stimulating the growth of opium this country was preventing India for its own purposes only, and not with reference to the wants and to the prosperity of its population. He was given to understand that the cultivation of the poppy was by no means so popular with the natives as it had been, and would prefer the growing of sugar, indigo, and other innocent and useful commodities, to the production of which the soil was devoted before the detestable traffic in opium was established. The smuggling of opium into China led to other and more dreadful modes of life, for the traders in it constantly fired into the Chinese vessels which attempted to prevent its introduction; and would it be believed that in the nineteenth century not only was this trade carried on by means of bribery in a most murderous trade, but the opium cappers were actually armed from the Government arsenals, and were looked upon by the Chinese as vessels of war. The East India Company, however, did not stand alone as the supporters of this vile traffic, for a committee of the House of Commons had declared that it was not expedient to discourage the trade, as so great an amount of revenue as it produced could not be raised so conveniently from any other source. In the dark ages of Somnauth, the right honourable gentleman (Mr. Macaulay) said and that to bring Christianity into contempt was high treason against the civilisation of the human race. He agreed with the right hon. gentleman and voted with him upon that occasion; and he now called upon him, in connexion with his own principles, to vote with him (Lord Ashley) in putting a stop to this un-Christian traffic. It was easy to prove that the Bible and opium could not go together. Only as late as last Wednesday, the house, in a grant, had determined not to send a missionary to China, but to transmit the Sacred Scriptures through the medium of the American missionaries, because the feeling was so strong against the introduction of the opium trade that it was hopeless to effect any good through the efforts of our own missionaries, who would be told that our traffic in opium gave a practical denial to our own belief in the doctrines we sought to impress upon them. He now came to the means by which the traffic might be suppressed. He was told by parties conversant with the details of the subject that the mere abolition of the monopoly would at once mitigate nine tenths of the evil. A more certain way, however, of putting an end to the evil would be to prohibit the growth of the poppy or the manufacture of opium in British India. It was said by some parties that the Emperor of China was not sincere in his attempts to put down the trade in opium. This, however, was highly improbable, for many reasons. If he was not sincere he would permit the growth of the drug in his own dominions, the soil of which was
